

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

AMENDMENTS TO RULES

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA <sup>1</sup>

The following rule of the Supreme Court has been promulgated as of November 15, 1921:

Rule 30.

After the return for appeal in a criminal action shall have been filed with the clerk of this court, the court in open session may dismiss the appeal where it is made to appear that the grounds thereof are manifestly without merit. The solicitor moving for such dismissal shall present a petition therefor to the Chief Justice, or the presiding Associate Justice, who, if satisfied of the reasonable grounds of the motion, shall fix a day for the hearing of the motion; a copy of the petition and of the order of the said Justice shall forthwith be served upon appellant's counsel not less than five (5) days before said date.

The court has announced a policy of strict enforcement of rule 8, and the portion of rule 13 relating to the dress of attorneys.

BUNKLEY et al. v. COMMONWEALTH.

June 16, 1921.)

1. Equity ⚡377—Courts should order jury issue of own motion in difficult case.

In cases of exceptional difficulty and conflict in the testimony, it is error for the court to fail to order an issue out of chancery on its own motion, and when an issue is properly ordered, the chancellor should abide by the verdict, unless good cause appears to the contrary.

2. Equity ⚡377—Propriety of ordering issue out of chancery is determined by sound exercise of discretion.

The propriety of ordering an issue out of chancery for jury trial is determined by the application of sound legal discretion to the circumstances, and a mistake in the exercise of such discretion is reviewable by appeal; Code 1904, § 3381, not being intended to make the directing of an issue a matter of right and not of discretion.

3. Equity ⚡379—Petition and affidavit held not to require ordering of issue.

A petition for an issue out of chancery for a jury trial, which alleged that petitioners would introduce a large number of witnesses who would contradict the witnesses of the complainant, and that there would result a great conflict in the testimony, so that it was proper the court should direct an issue, merely states the opinion of the petitioners, and does not require the ordering of the issue.

4. Nuisance ⚡84—Evidence held to show house was disorderly.

In a suit to have a boarding house declared a nuisance, and abated, evidence by the commonwealth's witnesses, showing that the house was of ill fame, and used for prostitution, which was contradicted only by evidence for the defense that witnesses, who were present on other occasions, did not see any improper acts, held sufficient to sustain the chancellor's finding that the house was of ill fame.

5. Appeal and error ⚡1008(1)—Conclusions of trial court on oral testimony entitled to substantially same credit as verdict.

The conclusions of the trial court on oral testimony are substantially entitled to the same credit as the verdict of a jury.

6. Nuisance ⚡84—Conflict in evidence held not to require special issue as to character of house.

In a suit to abate a disorderly house, evidence on behalf of defendant that witnesses had not seen any disorderly acts when they were present, and that they would not have remained in the house if they had thought it was used for prostitution, though in the sense conflicting with evidence for the commonwealth showing the house was used for prostitution does not raise such a conflict as to require the court of its own motion to order an issue out of chancery for trial by jury.

7. Statutes ⚡117(1)—Omission of forfeiture provision from title of abatement statute does not invalidate act.

Abatement Act 1916, the title to which was "An act to abate and enjoin disorderly houses to declare the same to be nuisances," is not in violation of Constitution, § 52, requiring the object of law to be expressed in its title, because the title does not include the forfeiture provisions contained in body of the act.

8. Statutes ⚡105(1)—Constitutional provision as to title liberally construed and act upheld if practicable.

The constitutional provision relating to the title of an act is to be liberally construed, and the act upheld if practicable.

9. Eminent domain ⚡2(1)—Provision against taking or damaging private property does not apply to forfeiture for unlawful use.

Const. § 58, prohibiting the taking or damaging of private property for public use without just compensation, does not prohibit a forfeiture of property imposed upon an owner, who has been convicted of using the property for unlawful and immoral purposes.

10. Constitutional law ⚡303—The abatement statute does not deny due process of law.

The statute authorizing abatement of disorderly houses as nuisances, and providing for forfeiture thereof, does not deprive the owner of due process of law, since he must be impleaded on the specific charge and afforded an opportunity to make his defense before the forfeiture can be enforced.

11. Nuisance ⚡80—Statutory abatement of disorderly houses within police power.

The enactment of Abatement Act of 1916 providing for the abatement of disorderly houses es as nuisances, was within the police power of the state.

Appeal from Corporation Court of City of Newport News.

Suit by the Commonwealth against Blanche R. Bunkley and another to have the premises maintained by defendants declared a nuisance and enjoined and abated. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jno. N. Sebrall, Jr., of Norfolk, and J. Winston Read, of Newport News, for appellants. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

SAUNDERS, J. In February, 1920, the commonwealth of Virginia, at the relation of C. C. Berkeley, commonwealth's attorney for the city of Newport News, brought its bill in equity, pursuant to the provisions of the Acts of Assembly 1916, p. 780, c. 463, alleging that Blanche R. Bunkley, alias Blanche R. Wilson, and William C. Bunkley, her husband, since November, 1918, had knowingly and unlawfully maintained and kept, and were knowingly and unlawfully maintaining and keeping a certain designated building as a house of ill fame and for the purposes of lewdness, assignation and prostitution, resorted to during said period of time by idle and dissolute persons, both men and women, for the purposes of lewdness and prostitution. The bill contained other allegations appropriate under the statute, and concluded with the prayer that the house and lot, and contents of said house, be declared a nuisance, and the same be enjoined and abated, as provided by law.

Petitioners in error filed an answer to this bill, denying all of its allegations.

Further, they filed an application for an issue out of chancery with accompanying affidavits. Upon this application the court ordered an issue, and a jury was impaneled to try the same. Thereafter the jury returned a verdict for the petitioners upon all of the issues submitted by the court.

The attorney for the commonwealth moved the court to set aside this verdict, upon the ground that the issues had been improvidently awarded, and that the said verdict was contrary to the evidence, and to enter "judgment upon the case, notwithstanding said verdict." The court having taken time to consider, concluded that the evidence sustained the allegations of the bill, declined to accept the findings of the jury, and entered a decree whereby the lot and house thereon, and the furniture and equipment of same, were declared to be a nuisance, and enjoined and abated. The equipment and paraphernalia were directed to be sold, and the house and every part thereof ordered to be closed by the officer of the court for the period of one year from date. The further provisions of the decree need not be recited.

From this decree an appeal was allowed, and the case is now before this court for review. The petition for appeal assigns the following errors:

I. The court erred in disregarding the verdict of the jury, and entering a decree sustaining the allegations of the bill and ordering the destruction of the property.

II. The said act is in violation of the Constitution of Virginia.

III. The said act is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and especially the Fourteenth Amendment thereof.

Under assignment No. I, the complainants set forth that the evidence was in the highest degree conflicting, and that, not only was an issue properly awarded in the first instance, but that it would have been error not to award such issue.

Further, that having submitted certain issues to the determination of a jury, the court should have abided by the verdict found upon those issues.

In support of these contentions, various Virginia precedents are cited.

[1] It is true that in cases of exceptional difficulty and conflict in testimony, it is error for the court to fail to order an issue out of chancery, on its own motion, and as a general proposition, when an issue is properly ordered, it is the practice, unless good cause appears for the contrary course, for the chancellor to abide by the verdict.

"The object of an issue * * * is to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor in a doubtful case." Stevens v. Duckett, 107 Va. 17, 57 S. E. 601. "But an issue is not directed merely because the evidence is contradictory." 107 Va. 22, 57 S. E. 603.

[2] The propriety of ordering an issue is determined by the application of sound legal discretion to the circumstances of the situation.

"Awarding of an issue out of chancery rests in sound discretion, subject to review on appeal. A mistake in its exercise is a just ground of appeal. * * * The * * * fact that there was an issue was directed and tried, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff, affords no reason why the court should not reverse the decree, if the order directing the issue was improperly granted." 107 Va. 23, 57 S. E. 604.

To justify the order for an issue out of chancery, "the conflict of the evidence" must be "so great and its weight so nearly evenly balanced that the court is unable to determine on which side the preponderance is." 107 Va. 20, 57 S. E. 603.

"It does not follow that an issue is necessary and proper in every case where the evidence happens to be conflicting. If this was the rule, the chief time of the chancery courts would be occupied with trials before juries, or in considering their verdicts. The circuit courts and the judges of this court are constantly called upon to decide questions of fact upon testimony of a very conflicting character." 107 Va. 22, 57 S. E. 608.

"Directing an issue * * * is not * * * a mere arbitrary discretion. * * * Such discretion must be exercised upon sound principles of reason and justice. A mistake in its exercise is a just ground of appeal, and the appellate court will judge whether such discretion has been soundly exercised in a given case." Miller v. Wills, 95 Va. 350, 28 S. E. 342.

See, also, to same effect, Catron v. Norton Hardware Co., 123 Va. 386, 96 S. E. 853.

In the case of Stevens v. Duckett, supra, the trial court awarded an issue out of chancery upon the basis of an affidavit filed by the appellee, in which it was stated that the issue to be determined would be rendered doubtful by conflicting evidence of the opposing party, and that he believed that an issue out of chancery should be directed; and also a joint affidavit by counsel for the appellee, saying that they had read the affidavit of their client; that they were fully acquainted with the points in issue, and knew that the evidence would be conflicting, and that in their opinion it would be proper to award an issue out of chancery. This court set aside the order of the trial court, and in that connection used the following language:

"We are of opinion that the circuit court, in directing the issue in this case, acted upon wholly insufficient affidavits, and failed to exercise the discretion contemplated by law in such matters. * * * The decrees complained of must be set aside." 107 Va. 23-24, 57 S. E. 604.

Also on pages 21, 22 of 107 Va., on page 603 of 57 S. E., we find the following:

"In the case before us, the affidavits of the appellee and his counsel are mere opinions that in their judgment the evidence of the opposing party would be conflicting, and an issue out of chancery proper. * * * The Legislature, by the express language of the statute, reposed in the court the exercise of discretion in determining when there should be an issue out of chancery, and it could hardly have intended, in the same breath, to require the court to surrender its judgment and discretion and transfer the decision of that question to a party to the litigation, or his counsel.

"We are of opinion that it was not intended by the statute [section 3381, Va. Code 1904] to change the firmly established rule of law, that the chancellor was to properly exercise his discretion 'on sound principles of reason and justice;' * * * Any other interpretation of the statute would * * * make the whole matter of directing an issue one of right and not of discretion on the part of the chancellor."

[3] In the instant case the petitioners, Blanche Bunkley and her husband, made application for an issue by a petition sworn to by Blanche Bunkley. This petition recited that a bill in equity had been filed against them, and that the complainant had filed an application for a temporary injunction, accompanied by the affidavits of one Eason and of other witnesses, which complainant alleged supported the allegations of the bill. Petitioners stated in said petition that they would—

"introduce a large number of witnesses who would contradict the witnesses of the complainant, and that there would result a great conflict in the testimony to be offered by the parties to the suit, presenting issues of fact which are necessary to be determined, out of a mass of conflicting testimony, in order to arrive at a correct decision of the case. That, therefore, it was eminently proper that the court should enter an order directing an issue out of chancery to be tried by a jury, and the court was asked to award such an order."

[4] The case in judgment is plainly ruled by the case of Stevens v. Duckett, supra. If it was error in the trial court to order an issue upon the affidavit filed in that case, and it was so held, then it is manifest that upon a like affidavit in the pending case the court erred in directing an issue. This case should therefore be considered on the merits as if no issue had been awarded, and the conclusions reached by the chancellor tested by the evidence. This evidence was chiefly oral. It is true that the same is conflicting, not an uncommon thing when one party affirms and the other denies, but the conflict is not of the usual character as when witnesses, present at the same time, give varying and contradictory accounts of the things that they have seen, or heard, or have had the opportunity to see, or hear. In the main the witnesses in the instant case were never present together. The witnesses for the commonwealth testify as to what they saw, or heard, in the establishment of the defendants. If credence is given to them, their testimony is undoubtedly ample to establish the allegations of the bill. The witnesses for the defense, save in a few instances, were present on other occasions. Some took their meals there, others both lodged and took their meals in the building; still others were casual visitors. One and all, they saw nothing amiss in the conduct of the proprietress or of the waitresses, white or black, tending to establish the charge that the place was operated for immoral purposes. But it will be noted that this testimony of conduct at other times and on other occasions does not directly contravene the testimony of the witnesses for the complainant, who speak of particular acts and specific conduct occurring in their presence of a lewd and immoral character, indicative of the real nature of the establishment. It is true that it may be argued that if this alleged eating and lodging house was really a house of ill fame, used for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, some of the witnesses for the defense would have observed evidences of the same, particularly when one or more of the witnesses state that they would not have boarded or lodged at the house if they had had any reason to believe that it was in part a bawdyhouse. To this extent the evidence is conflicting, though not, as stated supra, in the usual fashion.

In passing upon the evidence as a whole, there are certain features of the case to be noted which are established by undoubted and uncontradicted evidence, indeed they are derived in part from the mouth of Blanche Bunkley, alias Wilson. She was an old hand in the detestable business of turning the frailties of her own sex and the lust of men into pecuniary profit. The following is taken from her testimony:

"Q. What was your occupation on Twenty-Fourth street?

"A. I ran a house of ill fame.

"Q. What was your business there [referring to a house on Twenty-Third street]?

"A. The same as I was doing on Twenty-Fourth street.

"Q. That is, you ran a house of ill fame there?

"A. Yes, sir."

The establishment under attack in the instant case was located in the restricted district of the city, and soldiers were forbidden to visit the same, under pain of court-martial. This section was the "red light district" of the city, up to June 18, 1916, at which time, to quote the witness, Blanche Bunkley, the proprietors of bawdyhouses were notified by the police that they would have to "stop that line of business." She alleges that she stopped. Generally speaking, this was a colored neighborhood, and there was a colored dance hall near the house in question. There were four or five white girls, alleged waitresses, in the eating house conducted by Mrs. Bunkley. These were the girls referred to by the witnesses for the complainant. Four of these young women were examined, and found to be suffering from venereal diseases. Another woman who worked for appellants, a Mrs. Pollis, was taken to the detention camp. The foregoing facts are not challenged.

There were various witnesses for the complainant, male and female. One of them, a Mrs. McGowan, an investigator for the War Department, investigated Mrs. Bunkley's café. She testifies positively to conversations with the latter, establishing the real character of the café, and to conduct by the white girls equally conclusive on this point. The conversations grew out of the rôle assumed by the witness, of a member of the underworld seeking employment. According to the witness she learned from the proprietress the rates charged for an individual act of fornication, and the proportion in which the proceeds thus derived were divided. Further, she saw some of the girls giving money received from men for sexual acts to Mrs. Bunkley. All of this was denied by the latter. Eason and Shuey, also agents of the federal government, testify in most emphatic fashion as to the conduct of the alleged waitresses on their visits to the Bunkley café. If these witnesses are to be believed (and there is nothing to discredit them save the fact that they were in a distasteful but necessary rôle, if the laws against houses of this character are to be enforced), the infamous character of the Bunkley establishment is fully established. Hough, a former soldier and sailor, with honorable discharges, and at the time a member of the police force of the city of Newport News on special duty, also investigated Mrs. Bunkley's café, and, testifying from personal observation, fully confirms the testimony of the other witnesses as to the immoral behavior and lewd practices of the white inmates of this establishment. The trial court heard the testimony of the witnesses, save one, the witness Eason, whose deposition was taken a short time before his departure for his home in Oklahoma. He balanced the positive testimony of the witnesses for the commonwealth against the positive and negative testimony of the witnesses for the defendants. He heard the testimony of the defendant, Mrs. Bunkley, and of her husband (who married her while she was conducting a house of ill fame), in contradiction of the testimony of Mrs. McGowan and others, and from his opportunities of hearing and seeing the witnesses was in a position of peculiar advantage to make a fair appraisal of the relative value of the evidence submitted. In view of this evidence as a whole, he concluded that the charges of complainant's bill were established. With that conclusion we are not disposed to disagree.

"The decree of a trial court is entitled to great respect, and is generally presumed to be correct." Catron v. Norton Hardware Co., 123 Va. 387, 96 S. E. 853.

[5] Indeed, when a trial court hears a case, and reaches a conclusion upon oral testimony, that conclusion is substantially entitled to the same credit as the verdict of a jury.

[6] This was not a case of such conflict of testimony that it was error in the court not to order an issue out of chancery on its own motion. Having reached the conclusion that the issue was improvidently awarded, it becomes, of course, unnecessary for us to consider whether the trial court was justified in setting aside the verdict of the jury, and entering judgment on the evidence, though we do not mean to intimate that if this case had to be considered in that aspect the conclusion reached by the court would not be supported by the evidence.

The second assignment of error is that the statute in question is unconstitutional, on the ground that it embraces more than one object, in contravention of section 52 of the Constitution of this state, providing that "no law shall embrace more than one object, which shall be expressed in its title."

This section has been the occasion of numerous decisions by this court. The title to the act in question is:

"An act to abate and enjoin houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose."

[7] The particular defect assigned is that the provision of forfeiture contained in the act is not embraced in the title.

In Lucchesi v. Commonwealth, 122 Va. 872-881, 94 S. E. 925, 927, this court held that—

"Although a statute refers to many things of a diverse nature, the title will be sufficient if the subordinate provisions of the statute may be fairly regarded as in furtherance of and as facilitating the accomplishment of the general object expressed in the title," and that "the constitutional inhibition was not intended to hinder remedial legislation, nor to prevent the incorporation in a single act of the entire statutory law upon one general subject."

[8] The following cases are also in point:

"The Constitution is to be liberally construed in determining whether an act is broader than its title; and the act is to be upheld if practicable." Ellinger v. Commonwealth, 102 Va. 100, 45 S. E. 807; District Road Board v. Spilman, 117 Va. 201, 84 S. E. 103. "If there is a fair doubt that the single subject, object and purpose of a statute is sufficiently expressed in the title, * * * such doubt should be determined in favor of the [validity of the] statute." Commonwealth v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 118 Va. 281, 87 S. E. 622.

See, also, City of Richmond v. Pace, 127 Va. 274, 103 S. E. 647.

The title of the act is, in part, "to abate houses of lewdness," etc. The provision of forfeiture is punishment inflicted upon persons conducting houses of lewdness, and is cognate to and an appropriate part of abatement.

Assignment of error No. II is not considered to be well taken.

The final assignment is that the act in question is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and especially the Fourteenth Amendment thereof, and, as argued in the petition, with sections 11 and 58 of the Constitution of Virginia, these provisions in the two Constitutions relating to due process of law, and the taking or damaging of private property for public use without just compensation.

[9, 10] The provisions as to taking or damaging private property have no relation to a forfeiture of property imposed upon an owner who has been convicted of using the same for unlawful and immoral purposes. Nor is due process of law lacking in the case in judgment. The owner has had due process of law when he has been impleaded on a specific charge, the punishment of which, in part, is forfeiture, and has been afforded the opportunity to make his defense.

In a case arising under the statutes of the state of New York, which provided that nets, set or maintained in the waters of the state in violation of the statutes of the state for the protection of fish, might be summarily destroyed by any person, and no action for damages should lie against any person for, or on account of, such seizure or destruction, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that this provision was a lawful exercise of the police power of the state, and did not deprive the citizen of his property without due process of law.

Further, the court said:

"Nor is a person whose property is seized under the act in question without his legal remedy. If in fact his property has been used in violation of the act, he has no just reason to complain; if not, he may replevy his nets from the officer. * * * or if they have been destroyed, may have his action for their value." Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 183, 185, 142, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 503 (38 L. Ed. 385).

The act of the Legislature under consideration provides that whoever knowingly erects, uses, or maintains a building for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution is guilty of a nuisance, and the building and ground so used, and the furniture and fixtures, are also declared to be a nuisance, and shall be abated as provided. The court is authorized, once the acts forbidden are established, to order the sale of the fixtures, and to decree the effectual closing of the building or place against its use for any purpose for one year, unless sooner released.

[11] The authority of the state to enact this statute under the police power is too plain to require the citation of authorities.

The punishments inflicted by the act, supra, are appropriate, and are far short of the total destruction of the real estate. They are reasonably calculated to deter evil-minded persons from pursuing the practices which the act denounces, and should be sustained.

Various authorities are cited by appellants in support of the last assignment of error, in particular the case of Bristol, etc., Co. v. Bristol, 97 Va. 304, 33 S. E. 588, 75 Am. St. Rep. 783. This latter case deals with an ordinance of the city of Bristol, and with the extent of the judicial power in connection with the abatement of a building as a nuisance. Neither this nor the other cases cited are in point on the situation presented in the case in judgment. This is a proceeding under a statute passed by the state in the valid exercise of the police power. The action taken by the trial court upon ascertainment that the defendants had committed the acts denounced by the statute was pursuant to the express authority afforded by that statute.

We find no error in this record, and the decree of the corporation court of the city of Newport News is affirmed.

Affirmed.

JUDY et al. v. DOYLE.

1. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 706(4)—Testimony as to custom of transporting mower blades inadmissible on issue of negligence in parking truck with protruding blades.

In an action for injuries to a bicycle rider, who ran into the sharp edges of mowing machine blades projecting from defendant's truck, in riding between truck and automobile parked next to truck along side of street, in which it was claimed that defendant was negligent in parking truck with open blades protruding toward other automobile parked in close proximity, but in which there was no issue as to whether the placing of the blades in the truck so as to protrude therefrom was in itself negligence, testimony that it was the custom of careful and prudent farmers in the community to transport mower blades to their farms in such manner held inadmissible; such testimony having no bearing on question of whether parking of truck in such manner was negligence.

2. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 705(6)—Driver, who parked truck with sharp mower blades protruding toward automobile parked in close proximity, held negligent.

Driver of truck with sharp edges of mower blades projecting therefrom, who parked truck so that the blades extended toward car parked next to truck, leaving a very narrow passage between truck and such car, so as to endanger persons passing between the truck and such automobile, and who left truck unattended, without wrapping burlap or other material around the protruding blades, or inclosing them between boards, held negligent.

3. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 705(2) — Driver of vehicle must drive to the right on meeting another vehicle.

The driver of a vehicle, meeting another vehicle, must seasonably drive to the right-hand side.

4. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 705(6) — Truck driver, negligently parking truck with sharp blades projecting, liable for injuries to bicycle rider, though not anticipating accident.

Driver of truck, with sharp edges of mower blades projecting therefrom, who parked truck so that the blades extended toward car parked next to truck, leaving a very narrow passage between truck and such car, so as to endanger persons passing between the truck and such automobile, and who left truck unattended, without wrapping burlap or other material around the protruding blades, or inclosing them between boards, held liable for injuries to a bicycle rider, who ran into and was cut by blades in attempting to ride between truck and such automobile to save himself from a collision, though the truck driver, in so parking truck, did not anticipate his negligence in so doing would result in such accident.

5. Negligence  $\S$ 59—Precise injury need not have been anticipated.

One who is negligent is liable for all the consequences which naturally flow from the negligent act, viewing the case retrospectively, regardless of whether they could have been reasonably anticipated; it being sufficient if he ought to have anticipated that the accident was likely to result in injuries to others.

6. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 705(10)—Bicycle rider held not contributorily negligent in riding between parked automobiles to avoid collision.

A bicycle rider, who rode into a narrow passage between truck and other automobile parked along sidewalk to avoid being caught between two automobiles approaching him and automobile driving behind and in same direction as bicycle, and who was injured by the open mowing machine blades projecting from truck, held not contributorily negligent, precluding recovery, in action for truck driver's negligence in so parking truck.

7. Municipal corporations  $\S$ 706(6) — Truck driver's negligence in parking truck with sharp mower blades projecting therefrom, as proximate cause of injury, held for jury.

In an action for injuries to bicycle rider, who ran into open mowing machine blades projecting from parked truck in attempting to ride between truck and other parked automobile, to avoid collision with automobiles approaching him from opposite direction, the question of whether truck driver's negligence in so parking automobile was the proximate cause of the injury held for the jury.

8. Negligence  $\S$ 136(25) — Proximate cause for jury.

It is the province of the court to determine in the first instance whether or not the facts offered in evidence to prove injury are too remote from the defendant's negligence to constitute an element of the plaintiff's recovery, and where the court is unable to ascertain such remoteness, the question of proximate cause is ordinarily for the jury, to be determined as a fact in view of the circumstances.

9. Negligence  $\S$ 119(6)—Plaintiff's testimony alone considered on question of contributory negligence, where defendant failed to give statutory notice.

Where defendants failed to give the notice relating to the defense of contributory negligence required by Code 1919, § 6092, the court properly limited the evidence on the issue of contributory negligence to that introduced by the plaintiff.

10. Appeal and error  $\S$  1004(1)—Verdict not disturbed as excessive, unless prejudice or mistake is shown.

Appellate court will not disturb the verdict, unless the damages are so excessive as to warrant the conclusion that the jury must have been influenced by partiality or prejudice, or have been misled by some mistake in view of the merits of the case.

11. Damages  $\S$  132(8)—\$7,542.85 verdict for injuries to arm, permanently distorting hand, held not so excessive as to warrant appellate court's interference.

Verdict for $7,542.85 for injuries to 12 year old boy's arm, resulting in a permanently maimed and distorted hand and in the boy's being physically incapacitated for usefulness at least 60 per cent., held not so excessive as to warrant interference by appellate court.

Error to Corporation Court of Fredericksburg.

Action by John M. Doyle, Jr., by his next friend, against A. H. Judy and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

F. M. Chichester and A. T. Embrey, both of Fredericksburg, for plaintiffs in error.

Wm. W. Butzner and C. O'Connor Goolrick, both of Fredericksburg, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This action was brought by the defendant in error, an infant under the age of 12 years, suing by his next friend, against the plaintiffs in error, to recover damages for an injury to the right arm of the plaintiff, alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendants.

The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,542.85, upon which the judgment under review was rendered. The pertinent facts, and the circumstances under which the injury complained of was suffered, are as follows:

The appellants, A. H. Judy and W. G. Keckler (defendants in the trial court), operated a farm in Stafford county, under a partnership arrangement. In the discharge of certain duties in connection with the farming operations, W. G. Keckler came to Fredericksburg, on August 23, 1919, in a Ford auto-truck. While in town, he purchased for the use of the farm three mowing machine blades, which he placed in the body of the truck. Two of these blades were 65 inches long, and the third one 77 inches long.

A mowing machine blade, according to the description given, is a piece of tough steel from 65 to 77 inches, or more, in length, about five-sixteenths of an inch thick, and seven-eighths of an inch wide. In this strip holes are drilled, and sections riveted thereon.

These sections have one blunt end, are about 3 inches wide at the base, and are in the shape of the following figure:

The edges of the sections are beveled, and ground very sharp. Ordinarily about 24 of these sections are riveted on a 6-foot blade.

"At the end of the blade that is constructed to fit into the pitman is a ball, part of the ball and socket joint; the socket being on the end of the pitman." This end of the blade is called the knuckle end.

According to the testimony, the defendant Keckler placed these blades in his truck body, piled the one on the other, with the sharp edges of the sections exposed. The knuckle ends were in the forward left-hand corner of the body, and the other ends in the rear right-hand corner; "the blades being thus diagonally across the said body, and projecting from the rear." The extent of this projection is stated in varying terms. Averaging these statements, it may be said with substantial accuracy that the blades projected from 18 to 20 inches beyond the tail end of the truck body. The box constituting the rear end of the truck was 54 inches long, 34 inches wide, and 5 inches deep; the bottom of this body being 33 inches from the ground, and projecting backward over the rear axle 28 inches. Having loaded the loose blades upon his truck in the fashion described, Keckler proceeded by various streets to Caroline street, also called Main street, and the principal street of the city. He proceeded southward along this street to about the middle of the block, and parked his car at an angle of about 45 degrees to the curb line, with his front wheels against the curb. The relative location to the curbing of the truck and of the projecting blade ends, with their sharp cutting edges facing the street, are given in the following figure, which is merely illustrative, and not undertaken to be drawn to scale:

The truck was parked between two cars, "quite a large one being on the upper side of the truck, which, to one coming down the street, obscured in part the view of the truck." There was very little space between the truck and the car next down the street, and about 3 feet between it and the car next above, and up the street. These cars were parked at about the same angle as the Ford truck.

On the left side of Caroline street—that is, the east side—and opposite from and slightly below the place where the truck was parked, was a pile of brick and other debris in the street. A Ford sedan was parked near this rubbish heap, and extending into the street further than it should have done. This rubbish heap and sedan so obtruded upon the street that when cars were parked on the opposing side, as was the case at the time of the accident, the street was reduced to a mere alleyway for a short distance, so much narrowed, indeed, that in this "throttle" two cars could not pass.

Having parked his car as described supra, Mr. Keckler left the same unattended, and went off to purchase a pair of shoes. Coming, now, to the immediate circumstances of the accident, and the conduct of the plaintiff, it appears that the latter was riding a bicycle slowly and carefully down Main, or Caroline, street. Behind the boy was a motor car, also going down Main street. In front of the boy, coming up Main street, and approaching the "throttle," were two motor cars. The front car stopped in, or just at the mouth of, the "throttle." This action caused the second car to turn slightly to the left (or west) side of the street, and as it continued to move forward, it completely closed the narrow passage left for moving cars. Thus the boy was caught between the cars in front, and the one approaching in his rear. In his search for safety he swerved to the right, riding close to the cars parked on that side of the street. When he came to the opening between the defendant's truck and the car north of it, he headed in for the sidewalk, ran into the projecting blades, and was badly cut in the right arm. Dr. A. J. Wilson, a veterinary surgeon, who saw the accident, describes it, and the attendant circumstances, as follows:

"I was looking at the time up Main street for some reason, when this boy came riding down the street on a bicycle, and it appears the way was blocked, so that the boy could not get through, and I saw him turn in, go towards the sidewalk with his bicycle, and strike these blades. * * *

"Q. What caused young Doyle to turn in towards the car with the blades in it?

"A. The street was blocked; he couldn't help himself; it was the only salvation he had; he thought there was an opening he could get through to the sidewalk. The street was blocked with another team, or an automobile, I couldn't say which. * * *

"Q. And you say he turned to the right to avoid the approaching car?

"A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Did you see the boy when he turned in to escape this jam?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. At what speed?

"A. Not very fast, just creeping, moseying along. * * *

"Q. How far was the car from him—that is, the car going in the opposite direction—when he turned in?

"A. Right about behind me—might have been down Main a little; it was right close to me.

"Q. How many car lengths from him?

"A. About one car length. * * *

"Q. Tell the jury the exact position of the boy and his wheel at the time he was cut.

"A. He turned in, these blades sticking out in this way (indicating) extending behind the car, and came in contact with the blades when he turned, and of course, sticking that way the impaction with these blades severed the arteries in the boy's arm. * * *

"Q. From what you saw, please state whether or not young Doyle lost control of his machine before he struck the blades.

"A. I don't think so."

Henry Satterwhite, another eyewitness of the accident, testifies in part as follows:

"Q. Just before he came in contact with the blades, in which direction was he looking, and what did he appear to be looking at?

"A. At the cars that were coming towards him, and down Main street.

"Q. And then what did he do?

"A. He got up close to the car; he was pretty close to the cars that were parked on the right-hand side of Main street.

"Q. What did he do just before he came in contact with the blades?

"A. He must have put on his brakes; he slid down and lurched into the car. * * *

"Q. Did he lose control of his wheel, as far as you were able to observe?

"A. I don't think he did. He stopped it because he was in a close place. I am sure he did not lose control of his wheel, because when he stopped his wheel he lurched to the right side, and went to put his feet down and catch himself.

"Q. And it was then he came in contact with the blades?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Cross-Examination.

"Q. Could the little man have seen these blades, if he had been observant?

"A. I don't think anybody would have noticed them, if they had been in the place he was in.

"Q. What was that?

"A. Because, when you are in close, you are not looking on the right-hand side; you are looking out at what is in front, and trying to get out of the way.

"Q. His attention, then, seems to have been occupied with the oncoming vehicle, and not with the truck?

"A. No, sir; I do not think he could have paid any attention to the standing truck with the car coming right towards him.

"Q. When his wheel stopped, you say it kind of turned to the right?

"A. It lurched to the right.

"Q. That is, the whole wheel would have fallen to the ground, if he had not been on it?

"A. It would have fallen; but, when anybody goes to stop a wheel, they always lurch to the right, and put their foot down and catch themselves."

Dr. C. Mason Smith, describing the injuries suffered by the plaintiff, states that the large artery in the arm, called the brachial artery, and all the veins in the front of the arm, and the nerves, were severed; also the biceps muscle and tendon. In the opinion of Dr. S. L. Scott, a witness for the plaintiff, the boy is incapacitated for physical usefulness, conservatively speaking, 60 per cent.

The boy's right forearm is smaller than the left, the hand and fingers of that arm are smaller, the arm itself a little crooked, and the second, third, fourth, and fifth fingers of the hand are contracted.

The defendants filed six bills of exceptions in the progress of the trial. The first three exceptions related to certain testimony offered by the defendants and excluded by the court.

This testimony undertook to establish—"the usual manner in Virginia, and in the Fredericksburg community, in which careful and prudent farmers transport mower blades from the retail stores to their farms, and that the method of transportation adopted by the defendants with the blades in question was similar."

Apart from other objections that might be made to this testimony, it was plainly irrelevant.

[1] The issue between the parties in the instant case was not whether for the purpose of continuous transport through the streets of Fredericksburg, or along the highways of the county, the mower blades were packed in a reasonably sufficient and prudent fashion, but whether the defendant failed to use ordinary care when he parked his car with the open and protruding blades, as described, and left the same unattended. Conceding that the defendants could have fully proved that when the truck was in motion, the exposed and protruding blades were not a menace or source of danger to other travelers on the streets or highways, such evidence would in no wise have aided the solution of the precise issue presented in the instant case. There was no error in the action of the trial court excluding this testimony.

A further contention of the defendants is:

That the "defendants' truck had the right to be where it was, and in the manner in which it was," and that, this being so, the "defendants were not liable, whether the injury complained of was the result of pure accident, or the result of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, or of both of these causes combined."

[2] Undoubtedly the defendants enjoyed the right to park their car on the street, and for the extent of time allowed by law, they were entitled to the use of the space so occupied. But they had no right to occupy measurably the space between their truck, and the next car above it, with a vicious and dangerous implement liable to inflict injuries upon others exercising ordinary care in their use of the streets.

[3-5] Under the conditions of modern traffic, the streets of a city are used by many forms of motor and other vehicles, including bicycles. Pursuant to the law of the road, the driver of a vehicle, meeting another vehicle, must seasonably drive to the right hand. The rider of a bicycle, when threading his way along a congested street, filled with other speeding vehicles of a far more massive and pretentious character, must often seek safety by pursuing the very course followed by the plaintiff in the instant case, namely, by turning into the curb at the first opening which presents itself. Under such circumstances, he should not be unexpectedly confronted, in his quest for safety, with the sharp and serrated edges of exposed and dangerous implements. Ordinary prudence would suggest to the owner of a car that, if he proposed to park the same under the conditions appearing in this case and leave it unattended, he should at least wrap in burlap, or other material, the dangerous implements which he carried, or inclose them between boards in the fashion described by one of the witnesses. Doubtless the defendant, when he parked his car, did not anticipate the concurrence of circumstances which resulted in the injuries suffered by the plaintiff; but if this act of his was a negligent one, and in our judgment it was, the defendant's liability does not depend upon his ability to foresee the ensuing circumstances in precise detail. The rule of liability in cases of the character of the one in judgment was announced in N. & W. Rwy. Co. v. Whitehurst, 125 Va. 263, 99 S. E. 569, in the following terms:

"The 'forceableness,' or reasonable anticipation, of the consequences of a wrongful or negligent act, is not the measure of liability of the guilty party, though it may be determinative of the question of his negligence. When once it has been determined that the act is wrongful or negligent, the guilty party is liable for all of the consequences which naturally flow therefrom, whether they were reasonably to have been anticipated or not, and, in determining whether or not the consequences do naturally flow from the wrongful act or neglect, the case should be viewed retrospectively; that is, . . . looking at the consequences, were they so improbable, or unlikely to occur, that it would not be fair and just to charge a reasonably prudent man with them? If not, he is liable.

"This is the test of liability; but, when liability has been established, the extent is to be measured by the natural consequences of the negligent or wrongful act. The precise injury need not have been anticipated. It is enough if the act is such that the party ought to have anticipated that it was liable to result in injury to others."

See, also, to the same effect, the case of Tripp v. City of Norfolk, 129 Va. —, 106 S. E. 360, and the cases therein cited.

The question presented in this case is whether the defendants used reasonable care and skill in the exercise of the lawful right to occupy the street. Certainly, upon the facts presented, reasonably fair-minded men, to say the least, might differ over the question of the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the defendant in parking and leaving his truck with the mowing blades exposed in the manner depicted by the evidence. The court remitted to the jury under a proper instruction the determination of three questions:

First, whether the defendants, in respect of parking and leaving their truck under the circumstances disclosed, failed to use ordinary care.

Second, if the jury considered that the defendants did fail in this respect, whether such failure on their part was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

Third, whether the injury sustained by the plaintiff, was sustained on his part while exercising such a degree of care and caution as under the circumstances might reasonably be expected from one of his age and intelligence.

[6] The jury found for the plaintiff on all of these issues, and there is no ground apparent for disturbing their verdict. With respect to contributory negligence, and the degree of care and prudence to be expected of a boy of the plaintiff's age and intelligence, the jury was fully instructed. The evidence clearly shows that young Doyle was accustomed to drive motor vehicles, knew how to ride a bicycle, and was acquainted with the life and dangers of the streets of a city. It is positively established by the testimony of the eyewitnesses to the accident that the boy was proceeding at this time in the most careful and judicious manner, and that his unexpected collision with the mowing blades was in no wise due to recklessness or failure to exercise ordinary care and prudence. At the time that he turned into the curb, the plaintiff was confronted with a situation likely to occur to a bicycle rider at any time on a street crowded with traffic, and particularly likely to occur on a street narrowed, as Main street was at the place of the accident, by cars parked on both sides of the thoroughfare, supplemented by a large rubbish heap. Under such circumstances, the child might have lost his head; but the testimony shows that he did not, but proceeded with care and circumspection. Apart from the finding of the jury, we are of opinion from the evidence that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[7] The contention of the defendants that their initial negligence was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, but that this injury was directly traceable to the independent act of one Shelton, is not supported by the law, or the facts of this case. Two cars were approaching the boy. The one in front stopped. Thereupon Shelton, who was driving the second car, turned to the left and entered the "throttle," or narrow passageway between the rubbish pile and the Ford sedan on the east side of the street and the truck and the other cars on the opposing side, thus making it necessary for the boy to steer to the right, and enter the space above the truck. It is true that the mower blades were not occupying the alleyway, or "throttle"; but they were occupying in part a portion of the street which the rider of the bicycle was entitled to use for the purposes of safety, when confronted with the situation presented in the instant case, arising from the use of a congested street by vehicles moving in opposite directions. It is to be expected, and to be prepared for, that in a line of moving vehicles some one vehicle may unexpectedly stop. The drivers of other vehicles must be prepared to act according to the circumstances in which each one finds himself. Shelton, in the exercise of ordinary care, turned to the left when the vehicle in front stopped. This was the proper thing to do. The plaintiff, in the exercise of the same care, turned into an apparently open space, seeking the curb, and intending to stop until Shelton's car had passed. On his way to the curb, proceeding slowly, he ran into the exposed mower blades.

[8] It is the province of the court to determine in the first instance whether or not the facts offered in evidence, tending to prove an injury to a plaintiff, are too remote from the defendant's act of negligence to constitute an element of the plaintiff's recovery. Fowlkes v. Southern R. R. Co., 96 Va. 742, 32 S. E. 464.

But the trial court found itself unable to make this ascertainment of remoteness, and instructed the jury to determine from the evidence whether the defendants failed to exercise ordinary care, and whether this failure, if it took place, was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. This action of the court, as heretofore noted, was proper, under the circumstances, and in no wise to the prejudice of the defendants. "The true rule is that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is not a question of science or of legal knowledge. It is to be determined as a fact, in view of the circumstances of fact attending it." Railway Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256. The outstanding facts of this case are, first, the failure of the defendants to use reasonable skill and care in the exercise of the lawful right to occupy the street; second, the resulting injury to the plaintiff, through no fault of his, while lawfully using the same thoroughfare.

[9] Defendants assign as error the failure of the court to give instructions A, B, F, and G, asked for on their part. In view of the principles and conclusions heretofore announced, A and G were properly refused, since in substance they directed the jury to find for the defendants upon the theory that, on the facts established by the evidence, the defendants as a matter of law were not liable for the injuries suffered by the plaintiff. Instruction B was modified, and given for the defendants as instruction J. This modification consisted in adding, after the words "all the circumstances of this case," the words "as disclosed from the plaintiff's testimony." This addition was proper, as the defendants had failed to give the notice relating to the defense of contributory negligence required by section 6092 of the Code. Instruction F was modified in the same manner as instruction B, and given for the defendants as instruction L.

The instructions given by the court covered all the necessary features of the case, and fully and accurately presented the law to which the parties were respectively entitled. Neither in the instructions given, nor in the instructions refused, do we find error.

[10, 11] Defendants' final assignment of error is that the verdict was excessive and on that ground should have been set aside. The boy was severely injured, and is left with a maimed and distorted hand. In the judgment of one physician, he is "physically incapacitated for usefulness at least 60 per cent." There is hope of some relief from his present condition by an operation, but the success of that operation is entirely problematical. There is no evidence that the jury was moved by passion, gross error, or improper motives to the prejudice of the defendants. As this court said in Southern Railroad Co. v. Smith, 107 Va. 553, 560, 59 S. E. 372, 375:

"There is no rule of law fixing the measure of damages in such cases, and it cannot be reached by any process of computation. It is, therefore, the established rule, settled by numerous decisions extending from Farish & Co. v. Reigle, 11 Gratt. 697, 62 Am. Dec. 666, to * * * N. & W. R. R. Co. v. Carr, 106 Va. 508, 56 S. E. 276, that this court will not disturb the verdict of the jury, unless the damages are so excessive as to warrant the belief that the jury must have been influenced by partiality or prejudice, or have been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case."

It is not considered that the facts of the instant case justify such a conclusion.

We find no error in the action of the trial court, and the judgment complained of is affirmed.

(130 Va. 464)

NORTH SHORE IMPROVEMENT CO. v. NEW YORK, P. & N. R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1921.)

1. Customs and usages §17—Custom cannot change express contract.

Where a bill of lading provided for delivery of a car at a particular crossing in Norfolk, a general custom on the part of the carrier to tender delivery of cars consigned to Norfolk in Port Norfolk is not binding or admissible in evidence, for custom can never override the express provisions of the contract.

2. Carriers §100(1)—Where bill of lading calls for delivery at particular crossing, demurrage cannot be charged until delivery is so made at variance with custom.

Though it was the custom of carriers to tender delivery of cars consigned to Norfolk at Port Norfolk, yet where a bill of lading called for a delivery at a particular siding in Norfolk, the custom cannot modify the written contract of the parties, and until delivery is made at such siding demurrage cannot be charged.

3. Appeal and error §1175(2)—Judgment, incorrect in law, may be reversed by appellate court.

Where an action was tried on an agreed statement of facts, but judgment was incorrectly rendered for defendant, the appellate court may, pursuant to Code 1919, § 6365, reverse the judgment for defendant, and render judgment for plaintiff.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the North Shore Improvement Company against the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff.

Baird & White and R. Clarence Dozier, all of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Willcox, Cooke & Willcox, of Norfolk, for defendants in error.

BURKS, J. This is an action against the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, to recover the value of a carload of cement and the freight paid thereon, which cement the defendants failed and refused to deliver to the plaintiff, consignee, after it had paid the freight thereon. Neither party requiring a jury, the case was tried by the court on an agreed statement of facts, and the court rendered judgment for the defendants. To that judgment the plaintiff excepted, and the case is here on a writ of error awarded by one of the judges of this court.

The facts agreed, as far as they need be stated, are as follows:

"The car in question was shipped in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading offered in evidence by the plaintiff. Upon its arrival in Norfolk notice was given to the plaintiff of that fact and of the amount of freight due thereon. Subsequently the plaintiff paid the freight and obtained the receipt therefor offered in evidence. Later in the day upon which this payment was made, the plaintiff was notified that there was demurrage due on the car, which had accrued prior to the payment of freight, and was told that this demurrage would have to be paid before it could obtain possession of the car. The plaintiff thereupon refused to pay any demurrage charges because the car had not been delivered to Colley Avenue siding, the place mentioned in the bill of lading. The car was thereupon regularly stored and disposed of.

"It is further agreed that the car was never delivered or tendered at the Colley Avenue siding, or any other place except Port Norfolk, Norfolk county, Va., that being the place which it had been the custom of the railroad for a number of years to tender cars consigned to Norfolk. It is agreed that the president of the plaintiff company would testify that his company had only been doing business in Norfolk about 18 months, and had no knowledge of the custom in question. That the custom is to hold cars at Port Norfolk, notify the consignee that they are held there subject to its orders, and upon the payment of all proper charges, to deliver according to the orders of the consignee; * * * that the liability in this case, if any, is upon the Director General, and that the Colley Avenue siding is not owned by the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad, but was at the time in question under the control of the Director General."

The bill of lading referred to shows the shipment of the cement from Coplay, Pa., over the Lehigh Valley, New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk, and Norfolk & Western Railroads to North Shore Improvement Company, Colley Avenue siding, Norfolk, Va. The receipt offered in evidence is dated February 6, 1919, and is for $118.50 freight, and $3.56 war tax. The receipt is on a printed form, apparently intended to give notice of the arrival of goods and other information. Stamped on the face of it is the date January 30, 1919, and, "This car is held at Port Norfolk, subject to orders of consignee," and, "This car will earn demurrage from 7 a. m. Feb. 1, 1919, as follows," stating the amounts.

The agreed statement of facts shows that the plaintiff had notice of the arrival of the car and the amount of freight due thereon. It does not appear how this notice was given, or that the plaintiff had any notice of when the demurrage would begin, or that any had already accrued, or that the printed receipt was ever seen by any officer or agent of the plaintiff until the freight was paid February 6, 1919. It affirmatively appears that "later in the day upon which this payment was made the plaintiff was notified that there was demurrage due on the car, which had accrued prior to the payment of the freight, and was told that this demurrage would have to be paid before it could obtain possession of the car," and that the plaintiff refused to pay the demurrage because the car had not been delivered to the Colley Avenue siding. It thus fairly appears that at the time the freight was paid the plaintiff had no actual notice of any demand upon it for demurrage. Nor could the tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission give constructive notice of demurrage charges if the car had not yet reached its destination.

[1] The statement of facts shows that—

"It has been the custom of the railroad for a number of years to tender at Port Norfolk cars consigned to Norfolk."

But the car in question was not consigned to Norfolk, but to a designated siding in Norfolk. Furthermore, there is no sufficient evidence that this usage of the company, designated "custom," was so general as to charge the plaintiff with knowledge thereof, and it does not appear that he had actual notice. The existence of the usage, however, if known to the plaintiff, would not override the express provisions of a contract in conflict therewith. Contracts not contrary to a trade usage, and which are silent on the subject of the usage, are deemed to have been made with reference to such usage, because such is the presumed intention of the parties, provided the parties have actual or imputed knowledge of the usage. But if the contract deals with the subject of the usage and conflicts therewith, the contract prevails. Thus, if I contract for the construction of a brick wall at so much per thousand, saying nothing as to how the count is to be made, and there is a trade usage to estimate the number of bricks by allowing so many per cubic foot, I will be bound by that usage if I know of it, or if it was so general and universal that I ought to have known of it, but if I contract for the wall at so much per thousand, actual count, the trade usage is eliminated, and the contract fixes the method of ascertaining the number of bricks to be paid for. Richmond v. Barry, 109 Va. 274, 63 S. E. 1074. So here it is immaterial how general and universal the usage may have been as to cars consigned to Norfolk, or what knowledge the plaintiff may have had thereof, the usage is eliminated as a part of the agreement of the parties, because the contract of the parties (the bill of lading) called for delivery of the car at a particular siding in the city of Norfolk. The contract is in conflict with the usage, if otherwise applicable, and overrides it.

"Proof of usage can only be received to show the intention or understanding of the parties in the absence of a special agreement, or to explain the terms of a written contract. * * * In all cases where evidence of usage is received, the rule must be taken with this qualification, that the evidence be not repugnant to or inconsistent with the contract." Tilley v. County of Cook, 103 U. S. 155, 162 (28 L. Ed. 374). "No usage can be incorporated into a contract which is inconsistent with the terms of the contract." Orient M. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 1 Wall. 456, 17 L. Ed. 505.

In speaking of a written contract, expressed in clear and unambiguous language, this court has said:

"Extraneous evidence of a custom which alters or varies the terms of such a contract is, upon familiar principles, inadmissible." Sutherland v. Gibson, 117 Va. 844, 845, 86 S. E. 108.

To the same effect, see Straus v. Fahed, 117 Va. 633, 85 S. E. 969; Charles Syer & Co. v. Lester, 116 Va. 541, 82 S. E. 122. In Dixon v. Dunham, 14 Ill. 324, 326, it is said:

"No usage or custom can be admitted to vary or control the express terms of a contract, but they may be admitted to determine that, which by the contract is left undetermined. The parties, by the contract, may abrogate any custom, no matter how ancient or uniform, but such custom cannot abrogate the terms of a contract. Whenever there is a conflict, the contract must control."

Many other cases could be added to the same effect.

[2] Counsel for the defendant in error, in their brief, correctly state the case when they say:

"There is only one real question in this case: Had the car reached its destination for the purpose of demurrage when it arrived at Port Norfolk? The defendant relies only on its custom to support its contention in this case."

We have already indicated plainly our answer to the question propounded and the reasons therefor, as applied to the facts of this case.

In Scovern v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 189 Ill. App. 126 (1914), the bill of lading called for delivery of cars at "Morgan street team tracks Chicago, Illinois." The carrier transported the cars to Chicago, and placed them on a "holding and inspection track" on its line at Western avenue in said city. The consignee refused to accept delivery at Western avenue, and asked that the cars be placed on the Morgan street team tracks. The carrier insisted that the Western avenue "holding and inspection tracks" was the usual place of delivery intended by the contract of the parties; that by the rules and custom of the carrier, which were well known to the plaintiff, Western avenue was the place of delivery for all cars consigned to the Morgan street team tracks, and that the Western avenue tracks was the place of delivery fixed by the bill of lading, which, in addition to the designation of the "Morgan street team tracks" as the place of delivery, also contained the provision that the carrier was to carry the car "to its usual place of delivery at said destination." The court, however, took a different view, and held that where the bill of lading designates a certain side track in a city as the destination of a shipment, the delivery must be at the side track designated, and the fact that the bill of lading also contains a provision for carriage "to its usual place of delivery at said destination," and that under the rules and general customs of the company cars were delivered at a certain "holding and inspection track" two miles distant from the siding designated does not authorize the introduction of evidence of such custom for the purpose of establishing a destination other than that named in the bill of lading. Furthermore, that a clause in a bill of lading providing for carriage "to its usual place of delivery at said destination" does not give the carrier the right by its rules and custom to change the place of destination specifically named in the bill of lading, even though the holder of the bill of lading had knowledge of the carrier's rules and custom in that respect.

In Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Driskill (1910) 61 Tex. Civ. App. 310, 128 S. W. 466, the holding of the court is well stated in the syllabus as follows:

"Where a railroad company contracts to deliver a car of lumber to the consignee in a specified part of a city, a tender of the lumber to the consignee at its station in the city is not a compliance with its undertaking, and its failure to deliver in the part of the city specified is a breach of its contract, so that a sale of the lumber for charges claimed to be due thereon was a conversion thereof, which made it liable to the shipper for its value."

In this case a rehearing was asked by both plaintiff and defendant, but was refused in separate opinions.

In New York, etc., R. Co. v. Porter (1915) 220 Mass. 547, 108 N. E. 499, there was a consignment of coal to the private tracks of the consignee, which were under the exclusive control of the carrier. The carrier refused to make such delivery until the freight was paid, and subsequently charged demurrage. The court held that—

"Where a shipment of coal was consigned for delivery to a coal dealer on a private track, which was located on the land owned by the dealer, but under exclusive control of the carrier, the carrier was not entitled to payment of freight or to demurrage until the cars had been delivered on that track."

In the course of the opinion of Judge Loring it is said:

"In our opinion the question is whether the plaintiff was entitled to the freight before it had completed the transportation. It is plain that it was not. The case comes within the elementary proposition that in the absence of a special stipulation a man is not entitled to his pay until he has finished his job. See, for example, Adams v. Clark, 9 Cush. 215, 216, 217, 57 Am. Dec. 41."

In Lee v. Erie R. Co., 173 App. Div. 75, 77, 158 N. Y. Supp. 730, 732, it was said:

"It was a part of the implied contract duty of the defendant to place this car on the plaintiff's private track, and until it did so it had not performed its contract, and no freight or demurrage charges, although previously earned, were collectable. The contract of transportation by a common carrier includes placing the cars conveniently for loading and unloading. The incidental consignee can require the car to be placed at a convenient point for unloading and a reasonable opportunity therefor. When the consignee, as in this case, has his own track, and requires a car to be placed thereon for unloading, it is the duty of the transportation company to comply with his requirement. This was not done in the present case, nor was the car ever in a position where it could be conveniently unloaded. In New York, etc., R. Co. v. General Electric Co., 187 App. Div. 726, at page 732, 153 N. Y. Supp. 478, at page 482, it was said by this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Woodward: "We believe it may be laid down broadly that transportation by railroad of carload lots, under present day conditions, requires a convenient placing of the car for loading, and an equally convenient placing of the car for unloading, and that the mere question of whether the tracks are upon the property of the shipper or upon the right of way of the transportation company is of no consequence upon this point. Primarily, it is the duty of the transportation company to afford sidings, and a convenient place of loading or unloading, and a proper placing of the cars. If the shipper furnishes the sidings, it does not relieve the transportation company of the duty of conveniently placing the cars."

The only cases cited for the defendant in error are not applicable to the facts of the present case. In Swan v. Railroad, 106 Tenn. 229, 61 S. W. 57, it does not appear that any particular place of delivery was specified in the bill of lading, other than the city of Nashville. The consignee insisted on delivery on a siding over which the carrier had no control, as the usual place of delivery on such shipments, and refused to pay freight or demurrage unless and until such delivery was made. The consignee was of doubtful solvency, and the court said:

"The defendant company could not be required to part with the possession and control of the property until its legitimate charges were paid, and to have placed it on the plaintiff's premises, where he could unload it as he saw proper and when he pleased, was virtually to part with possession, and to surrender its lien for freight and other charges" —and this it was under no obligation to do. No such question is involved in the instant case, as the agreed facts state that the delivery siding "was at the time in question under the control of the Director General," who was the carrier.

In Citizens' Bank v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 115 Va. 45, 78 S. E. 568, the point of destination of cars of coal was Lambert's Point, and it was held that, when the cars reached the Lambert's Point terminals, where such cars were usually to await the arrival of the ship which was to take on the coal, they had reached their destination, although such terminals covered a distance of six miles. Furthermore, the shipment was a foreign shipment, controlled by the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which made the terminal yards aforesaid the destination and provided for the demurrage charge.

In Berwind-White Coal Mining Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 235 U. S. 371, 35 Sup. Ct. 131, 59 L. Ed. 275, a mere memorandum opinion was rendered. The facts were not very fully given. The shipments involved were of carloads of coal from West Virginia to Chicago, there to be reconsigned. They were not shipped to any particular point in Chicago, and the fact that they were there to be reconsigned would seem to indicate that they were to be placed at such point as was usual for such reconsignment. They were so placed. The memorandum opinion says:

"The facts are these: The storage tracks of the railroad for cars billed to Chicago for reconsignment were at Hammond, Ind., a considerable distance from the terminals of the company nearer the center of the city, but were convenient to the belt line by which cars could be transferred to any desired new destination, and the holding on such tracks of cars consigned as were those in question was in accordance with a practice which had existed for more than 20 years. Under these circumstances the contention is so wholly wanting in foundation as in fact to be frivolous."

[3] This decision rendered in 1914 affirms the Appellate Court, First District, of the state of Illinois, which is the same court that rendered the decision in 1914, in Scovern v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., supra. We find nothing in the Berwind-White Case that in any way contravenes our holding in the case at bar. By the "facts agreed" it is conceded that the car never reached the destination called for in the bill of lading, and under the law the defendant in error had no right to charge demurrage thereon. The judgment of the trial court must therefore be set aside because the law applicable to the "facts agreed" is in favor of the plaintiff in error, and this court, in pursuance of section 6365 of the Code, will render final judgment in favor of the North Shore Improvement Company (plaintiff in error) against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads of the United States (defendant in error) for the sum of $786.65, with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum from March 1, 1919, until payment, and for the costs.

W. S. FORBES & CO. v. SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error §843(4)—Propriety of sustaining demurrer to original declarations not reviewable, question being moot.

Where plaintiff under Code 1919, § 6116, excepted to the sustaining of demurrers to the original declaration, the matter will not be reviewed, the question being moot as plaintiff filed an amended declaration and did not stand on the original.

2. Sales §81(1)—Time held of essence of contract.

Where a sale contract fixes a particular time for the delivery of cotton seed oil, the price of which is fluctuating, time is considered of the essence of the contract, and failure to perform within the time limited ordinarily constitutes a breach.

3. Evidence §129(6) Evidence that in previous contract the seller waived strict performance inadmissible.

Where a contract required the buyer of cotton seed oil to furnish cars within stipulated time, evidence that in case of a previous contract the seller waived delay is not admissible; it not appearing that there was an increase in the market price, as in case of the latter contract.

4. Trial §59(2)—The order of examination of witnesses rests chiefly in discretion of trial court.

The order of the examination of witnesses rests chiefly in the discretion of the trial court.

5. Appeal and error §1058(2)—Refusal to permit witness to answer question not error, where question is subsequently allowed.

Where the same question was later allowed, the action of the trial court in first refusing to permit the witness to answer question not error.

6. Customs and usages §17—Where contract expressly fixed time for performance, it cannot be varied by custom.

Where a contract for the sale of cotton seed oil expressly fixed the time for performance, it cannot be varied by an alleged custom of the seller that in event of the buyer's failure to furnish cars within the time limited, the delay would be waived.

7. Jury §11(5)—Provisions of federal Constitution as to jury trial do not apply to state.

Const. U. S. Amend. 7, declaring that in suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, does not apply to state courts, but is applicable only to the federal court.

8. Jury §9—Jury trial cannot be taken away by implication.

The right to jury trial cannot be taken away by implication.

9. Constitutional law §48—Statute should not be declared unconstitutional unless plainly so.

A statute should not be declared unconstitutional, unless so plainly unconstitutional as to leave no doubt.

10. Jury §13(3)—Constitutional guaranty of jury trial in suit between man and man does not apply to chancery cases.

While Const. 1902, § 11, declares that in controversies respecting property and in suits between man and man, trial by jury is preferable to any other, and ought to be held sacred, jury trial is not proper in a chancery case; the word "suit" as used in the section being used in the same sense as the word "controversies," and not including chancery proceedings.

11. Trial §176—By demurrer to evidence the whole case is taken away from the jury.

By demurrer to the evidence, which is a well-established practice, the whole case is taken away from the jury, and referred to the court for decision.

12. New trial §164—On setting aside verdict, trial court is not bound to grant judgment to unsuccessful party.

Under Code 1919, § 6251, declaring that when the verdict of a jury in a civil action is set aside by the trial court on the ground that it is contrary to the evidence or without evidence to support it, a new trial shall not be granted if there is sufficient evidence before the court to enable it to decide the case, the trial court, on setting aside a verdict of the jury, is not required to render judgment for the party against whom verdict was rendered.

13. Jury §34(3)—Provision, that on setting aside verdict for insufficiency of evidence trial court shall decide the cause, not a denial of jury trial.

While Const. 1902, § 11, declares that in all controversies respecting property and in suits between man and man trial by jury is preferable and ought to be held sacred, yet in view of the practice of demurring to the evidence, and of the fact that, unless evidence raising the controversy is presented, there is no scope for the jury's function, Code 1919, § 6251, declaring that, when the verdict of a jury in a civil action is set aside by the trial court upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence, etc., a new trial shall not be granted if there is sufficient evidence for the court to decide the case upon its merits, but such final judgment shall be entered as to the court shall seem right and proper, does not work a denial of the right to jury trial.

14. Statutes §225—If two statutes can stand together, they should be so construed.

If two statutes can stand together they should be so construed.

15. New trial §164—Provision that in event verdict is set aside as unsupported by evidence trial court shall render judgment does not conflict with provision forbidding peremptory instructions.

Code 1919, § 6008, forbidding peremptory instructions directing verdict, is not in conflict with section 6251, declaring that, if verdict be set aside as contrary to the evidence, etc., the trial court shall render judgment, for the first section is intended to prevent errors by the court in the heat of trial, while the latter allows the court to act after deliberation.

16. Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$  882(17)—Party cannot complain of finding in accordance with its view.

Where defendant insisted that the contract was made with reference to the rules of an association, and an instruction on that issue was given at its instance, it cannot complain of a finding in accordance with that view.

17. Sales  $\Rightarrow$  181(1)—Buyer has the burden of showing that he furnished tank cars within the time limited.

Where the contract for sale of cotton seed oil required the buyer to furnish tank cars within time limited, the buyer, on suing for breach, has the burden of showing that he furnished the cars within the time limited.

18. Sales  $\Rightarrow$  181(11)—Evidence insufficient to show that buyer of cotton seed oil delivered tanks to the seller within time.

Where a contract for the sale of cotton seed oil required buyer to furnish tanks within time limited, evidence held, in an action by the buyer for the seller's breach, insufficient to show that the buyer furnished tanks within time.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Assumpsit by W. S. Forbes & Co. against the Southern Cotton Oil Company. A verdict for plaintiff was set aside, and judgment entered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. P. Patteson, of Richmond, for appellant.

Coke & Pickrell and R. W. Carrington, all of Richmond, for appellee.

BURKS, J. This is an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff in error, a corporation (plaintiff below), against the defendant in error (defendant below), to recover damages for failure to deliver according to contract two tanks of crude cotton seed oil. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $800, which the trial court set aside and entered judgment for the defendant pursuant to section 6251 of the Code. The plaintiff excepted, and the case is brought here on a writ of error to that judgment.

[1] The plaintiff filed an original and also an amended declaration, to which the trial court sustained a demurrer, and the plaintiff by leave of court filed a second amended declaration. A demurrer to the last declaration was overruled, and the case was tried on the general issue of nonassumpsit. The plaintiff was permitted to prove its whole case under the second amended declaration, but, having excepted to the ruling of the trial court sustaining the demurrer to the original and first amended declarations, as provided by section 6116 of the Code, it insists that we shall pass upon the sufficiency of the original and amended declarations. If there was error in sustaining the demurrer thereto it was harmless, and the question presented is moot. The statute was not intended to apply to such a case. This court does not undertake to correct harmless errors.

The contract which is the subject of litigation was made by brief telegrams of offers by the defendant, which were accepted by the plaintiff, and is substantially as follows: On March 6, 1917, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff two tanks of basis prime crude cotton seed oil, at 90 cents a gallon, f. o. b. North Carolina Mills, delivery to be made last half of March in tanks to be furnished by the plaintiffs. The defendant had a number of such oil mills and was to notify the plaintiffs at which of its mills it would make delivery.

On March 16, 1917, the defendant wrote the plaintiff from Savannah, Ga., as follows:

"Referring to your purchase of March 6th of two tanks basis prime crude cotton seed oil at 90¢ per gallon f. o. b. North Carolina Mills, calling for last half March shipment.

"Please forward immediately one tank each to the Southern Cotton Oil Co. mills located at Fayetteville, and Wilson, N. C., furnishing Mr. E. B. Borden, Jr., D. M. the Southern Cotton Oil Co., Goldsboro, N. C., with full shipping instructions furnishing copy of your advices to the undersigned.

"Yours truly,

"C. W. Bridger, Traffic Department."

It is not positively shown when this letter was received, though the plaintiff admits it might have been received as early as March 18. On March 21, the plaintiff replied as follows:

"Answering your letter of the 16th, we will arrange to send the two empty tanks, south, the first of next week, we will send them to the points mentioned, Fayetteville and Wilson supplying full shipping instructions to Goldsboro, and copy of our advices to you at Savannah."

The tank cars were not delivered to the defendant for the reception of the oil during the last half of March. One of them was shipped from Richmond March 30, but did not reach its destination till April 2. The other was shipped from Richmond April 2 and reached its destination April 5. The plaintiff relies upon a trade usage and also upon the manner of doing business between the parties operating under former contracts as an excuse for not making prompt delivery of the tanks, and offered evidence to show a well-established usage of trade in that business not to require delivery of the tanks on the exact date called for in the contract, but simply to require the date to be approximated, also to show prior dealings between the same parties in the performance of similar contracts in which approximate dates of delivery and reshipment of tank cars had been accepted as performance of the contract. These facts were sought to be established by the testimony of W. G. Hockaday, the plaintiff's sales manager and purchasing agent. But the questions put to the witness were objected to on the ground that the plaintiff was seeking to prove, "not a custom of trade, or custom of this particular trade, but he wants to take the preceding dealings to modify the express written terms of this contract." Upon this contention the trial court ruled:

"If there is a general custom of the trade, well known and acted upon by all parties, and that custom is pleaded, then you can prove that custom as a well-known custom in the trade, and it becomes part and parcel of every contract; but the mere fact that there were dealings or other contracts by which these other contracts were allowed to be changed cannot come in this case."

[2, 3] The trial court, not being satisfied that the testimony of the witness was of such character as ought to be allowed to go to the jury, sent the jury out, and permitted the witness to be examined and cross-examined at length to ascertain the facts on these points, and, having ascertained the extent of his knowledge, excluded his evidence on these questions. The testimony of the witness did not establish any trade usage on the subject that could affect the express contract of the parties, nor did it show any prior dealings that could affect such contract. While the witness testified that the plaintiff had been dealing with the defendant for the purchase of cotton seed oil for several years prior to the present controversy, his examination disclosed only two other contracts between them for the purchase of cotton seed oil, one in which the contract called for the sale and delivery in first half of February preceding the contract in suit of two tanks in which the tanks were not delivered till February 16 and 19, but were accepted and filled by the defendant. The other for sale and delivery of three tanks at a price stated "subject to market changes" in the first half of April immediately following the March contract here in litigation. Only one of these contracts was prior to the contract in suit, and that was for delivery the first half of February. The fact that the plaintiff was not held to the exact date of delivery under the February contract gave it no right to expect or demand a similar indulgence on the March contract. The circumstances surrounding the two contracts may have been entirely different. Indeed, the record shows that the contract in suit was entered into on March 6, 1917, and that between that date and March 31 there was an advance of from 5 to 10 cents a gallon in the oil. No such facts are shown as to the February delivery. In contracts of this nature, time is of the essence of the contract, and failure to perform within the time limited by the contract, as a rule, constitutes a breach. Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455, 463; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Cleveland Rolling Mill v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 7 Sup. Ct. 882, 30 L. Ed. 920; Norfolk Hosiery Co. v. Aetna, etc., Co., 124 Va. 221, 235, 98 S. E. 43. The trial court committed no error in excluding the testimony.

[4, 5] Exception was taken to the ruling of the trial court in refusing to permit a witness to answer a question, but the same question was put to the same witness at a later stage, and he was permitted to answer it. The error, if any, was harmless. The order of the examination of witnesses lies chiefly in the discretion of the trial court. Robertson's Ex'r v. Atlantic Coast Realty Co., 129 Va. —, 106 S. E. 521.

[6] Exception was also taken to the action of the trial court in refusing to permit the plaintiff to ask its only witness several questions relating to prior dealings between the plaintiff and the defendant with reference to the sale and purchase of crude cotton seed oil. As hereinbefore stated, the court permitted the witness to be examined and cross-examined at length, out of the presence of the jury, and thereby learned that he could not testify as to any usage of trade in the business that could affect the contract, and that as to contracts between the parties to this action he testified as to only two other contracts, one before and the other after the one here in litigation, and that they were separate and distinct contracts, with no other relation to each other except that they were between the same parties, for the sale of crude cotton seed oil, and deliveries were for the last half or first half of a month. Under these circumstances, the trial court refused to permit the questions to be answered. In this there was no error. As to how far a trade usage may affect an express contract, see North Shore Imp. Co. v. New York, &c., R. Co., 108 S. E. 11, decided today.

The chief complaint of the plaintiff in error is of the action of the trial court in setting aside the verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the ground that it was contrary to the evidence or without evidence to support it, and in entering judgment for the defendant, as provided in such case by section 6251 of the Code. The plaintiff in error insists that there was evidence to support the verdict, and that the court erred in setting it aside, but that if the verdict was properly set aside a new trial should have been awarded because section 6251 is unconstitutional, in that it deprived the plaintiff of a trial by jury. The plaintiff in error further insists that if section 6251 is held to be constitutional, the trial court erred in not rendering judgment for the full amount claimed by the plaintiff, instead of a judgment for the defendant. The validity of section 6251 is the storm center of the contention of the plaintiff in error and will be first disposed of.

[7-13] It is claimed that section 6251, which is copied in the margin,<sup>1</sup> denied to the plaintiff a trial by jury, which is forbidden by section 11 of the Constitution, which declares that—

"In controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, trial by jury is preferable to any other, and ought to be held sacred; but the General Assembly may limit the number of jurors for civil cases. * * *

The earlier Constitutions used the phrase "the ancient trial by jury," but the word "ancient" was stricken out by the Constitution of 1869, and has not since appeared. The provision for a jury of less than 12 was first inserted in the Constitution of 1902. These changes indicate certain departures from the "ancient" common law.

The provision has seldom been before this court for interpretation. In Watson v. Alexander, 1 Wash. (1 Va.) 340, 356, it is said:

"The Constitution declares 'that trial by jury is preferable to all others, and ought to be held sacred.' To go no farther, it may be affirmed that this mode of trial is never to be taken away by implication, or without positive words in an act of assembly. Laws for this purpose sometimes give the court an express power to proceed, without the solemnity of a jury; most usually to proceed upon motion in a summary way, by which the same thing is understood."

In Burke v. Levy's Ex'rs, 1 Rand. (22 Va.) 1, on a motion for award of execution on a forthcoming bond, it was held that where non est factum is pleaded the court may enter judgment without the intervention of a jury, or it may impanel a jury at its discretion. It was said that—

"Although that court might have called in a jury to decide the points submitted by the plea, it was not compellable to do so."

The holding is based upon the fact that the proceeding was "by action in a summary way," and Watson v. Alexander, supra, is cited as authority. In Salling v. McKinney, 1 Leigh (28 Va.) 42, 19 Am. Dec. 722, the question of the right to a trial by jury does not appear to have been raised, nor is it referred to in any of the opinions delivered, but the reporter (Mr. Benjamin Watkins Leigh) in his report of the case, says:

"This was a motion made in the circuit court of Scott county by McKinney, late high sheriff of that county, against Salling, his deputy, for the amount of a judgment which the commonwealth had recovered against McKinney in the general court on account of taxes collected by Salling, which he had failed to pay into the treasury. Salling pleaded several pleas in bar, on which issues were joined, and these issues were tried by a jury; but the jury, not agreeing, were discharged, and the cause continued to another term, when the court, dispensing with a jury [see Burke v. Levy, 1 Rand. 1], heard the whole case and gave judgment against Salling for $541.20, with interest from November 12, 1822 till paid, and costs, spreading all the facts proved in the case upon the record. From this judgment Salling appealed to this court."

The judgment of the trial court was affirmed.

In Cecil v. Early, 10 Grat. (51 Va.) 198, 202, the court, speaking of issues of fact raised in a proceeding by motion, says:

"The court may itself try the issues, although of fact, or call in a jury for that purpose, at its discretion. Burke, Adm'r, v. Leigh's Ex'r, 1 Rand. 1; 1 Rob. Pr. 600."

The right to proceed without a jury in this summary way seems not to have been doubted, and is not referred to in the opinion.

In 1 Rob. Prac. (old) 600, referred to in the opinion, the following comment is made by that distinguished author:

"The trial by jury is never to be taken away by implication, or without positive words in an act of assembly. But laws sometimes give the court an express power to proceed without the solemnity of a jury; and the same thing is understood when the power is given the court to proceed upon motion, in a summary way. Pendleton, President, in Watson, etc., v. Alexander, 1 Wash. 358. Where jurisdiction is given by motion in a summary way, and the defendants pleaded non est factum, the court may call in a jury to decide the points submitted by the plea, but is not compellable to do so. Burke's Adm'r v. Levy's Ex'rs, 1 Rand. 1."

The seventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

But this amendment is restricted to federal courts, and has no application to procedure in the state courts. Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172, 20 Sup. Ct. 77, 44 L.

<sup>1</sup> "When the verdict of a jury in a civil action is set aside by a trial court upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence, or without evidence to support it, a new trial shall not be granted if there is sufficient evidence before the court to enable it to decide the case upon its merits, but such final judgment shall be entered as to the court shall seem right and proper. If necessary to assess damages, which have not been assessed, the court may impanel a jury at its bar to make such assessment, and then enter such final judgment. Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to give to trial courts any greater power over verdicts than they now have under existing rules of procedure, nor to impair the right to move for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence."

Ed. 119; Ches. & O. R. Co. v. Carnahan, 118 Va. 46, 86 S. E. 863, and cases cited.

We are thus left free to decide the question of the validity of the statute, unhamp-ered by any prior binding authority. The statute is a new and important one, and demands careful consideration. There are many cases bearing collaterally on the ques-tion, but they cannot all be considered in an opinion of reasonable length. The statute was proposed by the revisors of the Code of 1919, and enacted by the Legislature. The revisors were carefully selected with refer-ence to the work to be submitted to them, and it is to be presumed that they gave the statute their careful consideration, and, in drafting it and submitting it to the Legis-lature, they gave their deliberate judgment as to its constitutional validity. To this must be added the judgment of the Legisla-ture in adopting it. In a peculiar sense, therefore, this court ought not to pronounce the section unconstitutional unless it is plainly so—so plainly as to leave no doubt on the subject. City of Roanoke v. Elliott, 123 Va. 393, 96 S. E. 819; Strawberry Hill v. Starbuck, 124 Va. 71, 97 S. E. 362.

The latter part of the section declares:

"Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to give to trial courts any greater power over verdicts than they now have under existing rules of procedure, nor to impair the right to move for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence."

What powers did the court then have over verdicts? The rule in this state has been so repeatedly announced that we cannot, within reasonable limits, do more than refer to a few of the decisions.

In Jackson's Adm'r v. Wickham, 112 Va. 128, 131, 70 S. E. 539, 540, it is said:

"The issue of fact thus sharply drawn was fairly submitted to the jury, and by them resolv-ed in favor of the plaintiff. No rule is better settled by the decisions of this court than that, where a case has been properly submitted to a jury and a verdict fairly rendered, it ought not to be set aside, unless manifest injustice has been done, or unless the verdict is plainly not warranted by the evidence.

"The doctrine is clearly stated by Judge Burks in Blair and Hoge v. Wilson, 28 Grat. 165, as follows: 'Every reasonable presumption should be made in support of a verdict of a jury fairly rendered, and, according to the long-establish-ed, well-settled rule of this court, such a ver-dict cannot be set aside as against the evi-dence, unless there is a plain deviation—unless the evidence is plainly insufficient to warrant the finding.'

"In Morien v. Norfolk & Atlantic Terminal Co., 102 Va. 622, 40 S. E. 907 (which is strikingly similar to the case in judgment), the court said: 'In such case the preponderance of evidence cannot influence the action of the court in considering a motion for a new trial. The jury may discard the preponderance of evidence as unworthy of credence, and accept the evidence of a single witness upon which to base their verdict, and upon well-settled prin-ciples the verdict cannot be disturbed if the evidence of that witness is sufficient, standing alone, to sustain it. Nor is interference with a verdict authorized where the court merely doubts its correctness, or would itself have found a different verdict. The admissibility of evidence is with the court, but its weight is wholly with the jury.'

"Applying these principles to the case in judgment, it is clear that the trial court erred in setting aside the first verdict."

In Bashford v. Rosenbaum Hardware Co., 120 Va. 1, 90 S. E. 625, the judgment of the trial court was reversed because it had im-properly set aside the verdict of the jury in a personal injury case where the ques-tion of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was involved, the court holding that—

"Whether a plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries has been guilty of contributory negligence is a question for the jury under proper instructions from the court, and their finding will not be disturbed where the evidence is conflicting, or is such that rea-sonable men might fairly differ as to whether there was such negligence or not. Every rea-sonable inference should be made in favor of a verdict fairly rendered, under proper instruc-tions from the court, in such a case, and it should not be set aside unless the evidence is plainly insufficient to support it."

In Palmer v. Showalter, 126 Va. 306, 101 S. E. 136, it was held that—

This court "will sustain a verdict, although it was set aside by the trial judge, unless it can perceive that there has been a plain devia-tion from right and justice, and that the jury have found a verdict against the law, or against the evidence."

These cases are but typical. Many more could be added. They manifest the great re-spect that is accorded the verdict of a jury fairly rendered. It is not sufficient that the judge, if on the jury, would have rendered a different verdict. It is not sufficient that there is a great preponderance of the evi-dence against it. If there is conflict of tes-timony on a material point, or if reasonably fair-minded men may differ as to the con-clusions of fact to be drawn from the evi-dence, or if the conclusion is dependent upon the weight to be given the testimony, in all such cases the verdict of the jury is final and conclusive, and cannot be disturb-ed, either by the trial court or by this court; or if improperly set aside by the trial court, it will be reinstated by this court. But with all the respect that is justly due to the ver-dict of a jury, and which is freely accorded to it, if there has been "a plain deviation from right and justice," even a court of law will not make itself a party to such a wrong by entering up judgment on it. The initial step of the trial court, that of setting aside the verdict, can only be taken either where there is no evidence at all to support the verdict, or else the verdict is plainly contrary to the evidence, and does not come within the rule above stated. This initial step must be taken, under the conditions stated, before the trial court can enter such judgment as to it shall seem right and proper. Such was the state of the law when this statute was proposed and enacted.

It would seem that a litigant who cannot produce sufficient evidence to prevent this initial step ought not to be granted further indulgence to produce additional evidence when the judgment of the law is against him on the case which he has been given the fullest opportunity to present. He is not cut off if he can bring himself within the rule relating to after-discovered evidence.

Assuming that this initial step has been properly taken, that the verdict has been rightly set aside, has the Legislature the power to authorize the trial court to enter up such judgment as is right and proper? Is it obliged to authorize another trial by jury? Does the Constitution guarantee a jury trial in all "suits between man and man?" Must a jury pass upon questions of law as well as of fact? No such claim can be made. We must look to the law as it existed when the Constitution was adopted and as it has been uniformly construed since that time. We think we may also safely assume that it was the substance of "trial by jury" that our forefathers sought to preserve, and not its mere form. The province of the jury is to settle questions of fact, and when the facts are ascertained the law determines the rights of the parties. This law is announced by the court or judge.

"Every judgment is the conclusion of a syllogism of which the law is the major (unexpressed) and the fact the minor premise. Such being understood to be the law—and such being the fact ideo consideratum est, and then follows the judgment as the conclusion." Tucker's Pl. p. 19.

It is the method of ascertaining the fact that is intended to be preserved by the Constitution, but if the litigant offers no evidence of the fact which is essential to the maintenance of his pleading, or offers so little in opposition to that of his adversary that a verdict in accordance with that little would be a manifest injustice to his adversary, in other words, if the litigant has offered no facts upon which a jury would be warranted in finding a verdict in his favor, then he has not presented a controversy respecting property or a suit between man and man that entitles him to the jury trial guaranteed by the Constitution. It is the function of a pleading to state facts, not law; and of evidence to support the facts alleged in the pleading. If no such evidence is offered, or none that would warrant a jury of fair-minded men in finding a verdict in accordance therewith, then the rights of the parties become a question of law, and there is no controversy to be determined by a jury, and the constitutional guaranty does not apply. The word "suit" is not always used in a strictly technical sense. Technically the word "suit," is sometimes restricted to litigation in a court of equity, and the word "action" is applied to litigation at law. As used in the Constitution, the word "suit" is manifestly used in much the same sense as the word "controversies" in the preceding part of the same sentence. It seems inconceivable that the framers of the Constitution should guarantee a jury trial in a "suit between man and man," when there was no controversy between them. In such a case no right is in jeopardy which would need such protection, and we can see no good reason why the court should not pronounce the judgment of the law upon the case as it stands. The relevancy and admissibility of the evidence, and whether or not what is offered is of sufficient probative value to go to the jury, are questions for the court, and not for the jury. So, also, under the well-settled rule in this state, it is for the court to say, subject to review on a writ of error, when a verdict does "manifest injustice" or is "plainly not warranted by the evidence." Jackson's Adm'r v. Wickham, supra.

That nothing but a question of law is involved where the facts are admitted or established is made manifest from the use of a demurrer. If all of the facts of a case are stated in a declaration, the defendant by his demurrer to the declaration says, admitting all of your statements to be true, you have not stated a case in which the law permits you to recover. No fact is in dispute, but the law is against you. Here is a trial in a suit between man and man, but without the intervention of a jury, because there is no "controversy" for a jury to determine, and yet the judgment upon that state of facts is final. It is the law's conclusion upon the facts stated. So also on a demurrer to the evidence. Here a case for recovery has been stated in the pleadings, but the proof is deficient. The demurrant says, admitting the truth of all of your evidence, and of everything which your evidence even tends to prove, and all proper inferences therefrom, you have not, as a matter of law, proved a case which entitles you to recover. Here, indeed, is a trial on the merits, and a final judgment entered as the law's conclusion upon the admitted facts, without the intervention of a jury. No jury is had simply because there are no facts to be ascertained. Every element of "a suit between man and man" is present, but, the facts being admitted, there is no "controversy" between them. There is no function to be discharged by a jury.

There is much to be said on both sides of the question submitted to our consideration, but the evolutions of society are constantly calling for new applications of principles. The principles do not change, but their application is ever changing. Nowhere is this more evident than in the application of the principles of the common law. The same is true to some extent of constitutional provisions. The substance, the substantial right guaranteed, is fixed and permanent, but its application may be varied from time to time as the needs of civilized society require. Sometimes these changes are wrought by changes in the language of the Constitution itself, as is illustrated by striking out the word "ancient" in the clause "ancient trial by jury," appearing in the earlier Constitutions, or by providing for a jury of less than the common-law jury of 12, as provided for the first time in our present Constitution. At other times there is an apparent change by construction. But in fact there is no change, only an application of the principle of the provision to a new state of facts. This is illustrated in the case of Pillow v. Southwest Imp. Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. 32, 53 Am. St. Rep. 804, and Lake Bowling Alley v. Richmond, 116 Va. 429, 82 S. E. 97. The constitutional guaranty of trial by jury had existed since 1776, but the Legislature, by an act of assembly, dispensed with it in certain cases, and a new Constitution was thereafter adopted containing the same guaranty, and it was held that the guaranty did not apply because the procedure warranted by the act existed when the new Constitution was adopted, and was not taken away by it.

The constitutional provision is not to be frittered away, but it is the principle that is thus sacred and permanent, and not the mere language in which it is couched. The principle here involved is the right to a jury trial wherever disputed facts are involved in proceedings at law between man and man. There must be a controversy over facts. If there are no controverted facts, the law determines the rights of the parties. There is no need for a jury, and neither the language nor spirit of the Constitution guarantees a jury trial.

The constitutional guaranty of a jury trial is by no means universal in its application. Although the word "suit" is used in the Constitution, it is conceded everywhere that the provision has no application to suits in chancery as they existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, as the chancery courts exercised their functions without the intervention of juries at that time, and the guaranty extended only to such cases as were triable by jury at the date of adoption. Pillow v. Southwest Imp. Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. 32, 53 Am. St. Rep.

804; Davis v. Settle, 43 W. Va. 17, 26 S. E. 557.

Demurrer to the evidence is a well-established practice in this state, and in constant general use. By this method of procedure the whole case is taken away from the jury, and referred to the court for decision.

In Reed & McCormick v. Gold, 102 Va. 37, 51, 45 S. E. 868, 873, it is said:

"The right to demur to the evidence has come down to us as part of common-law procedure along with the right of trial by jury; indeed, if there were no trial by jury, there would be no demurrers to evidence. Where the Legislature has designed to prohibit demurrers to evidence, it has done so in explicit terms, and section 2897 of the Code [section 5781, Code 1919], provides that, in an action for insulting words, 'no demurrer shall preclude the jury from passing thereon.'"

In Lynchburg Milling Co. v. Bank, 109 Va. 639, 64 S. E. 980, there was an active controversy over funds in the hands of a garnishee, and a jury was impaneled to ascertain whether the fund was liable to the plaintiff's debt. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the garnishee demurred to the evidence. The plaintiff denied the right of the garnishee so to demur. The court said:

"The plaintiff insists that it had an absolute right to a trial by jury under the statute of which it was deprived by the court's action in requiring it to join in the demurrer. But that assignment is founded on a misconception of the office of a demurrer to evidence. It does not invade the province of the jury as triers of disputed facts. But, assuming that the evidence demurred to is true, the court is called on to determine whether such evidence as a matter of law warrants a judgment for the demurree. In other words, it is a supervisory power over jury trials invoked and exercised by the courts whose duty it is to decide questions of law arising upon undisputed facts.

"In 6 Ency. of Pleading and Practice, 439, it is said: 'There is nothing in this practice which is in contravention of jury trial'—citing Hopkins v. Nashville, etc., Ry. Co., 96 Tenn. 409, 34 S. W. 1029, 32 L. R. A. 354.

"That case contains an exhaustive review of the authorities, and shows that the practice obtains in about one-half of the states of the Union, while in the United States courts and the courts of other states much more drastic methods prevail, such as directing verdicts and ordering nonsuits. The practice has come down to us from the common law, and is too thoroughly embedded in our jurisprudence to admit of serious question."

In Meade v. Meade, 111 Va. 451, 69 S. E. 330, the trial was of an issue devisavit vel non, and the statute declared that in such case "a trial by jury shall be ordered." The statute, being a valid enactment, was as binding on the courts as the constitutional provision. The defendants demurred to the evidence, which the plaintiffs claimed they had no right to do. The court said:

"It is the well-settled policy of our jurisprudence that in all civil cases juries are triers of the facts, while the law is determined by the court. It would require very clear and positive enactment to show that the Legislature had changed the power of tribunals administering the law, by depriving courts of their judicial authority and intrusting the juries with such functions. There is nothing in section 2544 to justify the contention that the Legislature has inaugurated such a policy. If the contention of appellants was sound, then a jury trying an issue of devisavit vel non would be judges of the law and facts, while the court would be stripped of its power, and would preside as a mere moderator for the purpose of preserving order during the progress of the trial. Such an anomalous state of affairs cannot receive our approval. It is imbedded in our jurisprudence that the law of the case must emanate from the court. * * *

"It can be stated in general terms that sustaining a demurrer to evidence is not in violation of a statute providing that the issue shall be tried by a jury, where the evidence is conceded to be true, and all legitimate inferences therefrom are admitted. Hopkins v. Nashville Ry. Co., 96 Tenn. 409, 34 S. W. 1029, 32 L. R. A. 354."

The court, after quoting from the two previous cases hereinbefore cited, adds:

"That a demurrer to the evidence, or the more modern practice of directing the verdict, is admissible upon the trial of an issue of devisavit vel non, see Stuart v. Lyons, 54 W. Va. 665, 47 S. E. 442; Broach v. Sing, 57 Miss. 115; Wagner v. Zeigler, 44 Ohio St. 59, 4 N. E. 705; Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 303, 25 N. E. 645.

"In the case last cited the court says: 'With reference to the statutory proceeding to contest by bill in chancery the validity of a will, it is expressly stated in the statute (Rev. St. 1874, c. 148, § 7), that the issue shall be tried by a jury; and it follows that, in regard to the action of the court in taking the case from the jury and directing a verdict against the contestant, the same rule must be applied that obtains in respect to trials in suits at law. The rule in actions at law is that when the evidence given at the trial, with all the inferences that could justifiably be drawn from it, is so insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff that such a verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant.'"

The reason why a demurrer to the evidence was allowed was because the facts were all ascertained. There were no disputed facts, and hence nothing for a jury to try. When the facts are ascertained the rights of the parties arising thereon present a question of law to be determined by the court. The same principle would seem to apply wherever the facts are definitely ascertained, regardless of the mode of procedure. The common-law method of procedure on a de-murrer to the evidence was deemed cumbersome in some of the states, and fell into disuse, and then was substituted what was regarded as the more expeditious way of directing a verdict, which has not been regarded as infringing upon the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury. This practice was not adopted in this state to any extent, but instead we simplified and retained the common-law demurrer to the evidence. For difference in the two modes of procedure on a demurrer to the evidence, see Burks' Pl. & Pr. § 257.

A case may also be taken from the jury without infringing the constitutional guaranty by a special verdict. Here the jury simply find the facts and refer the question of the legal rights of the parties to the court. The same result follows in what is termed a "case agreed" or a "special case" or "a general verdict subject to a special case." The two proceedings are similar in many respects and yet different. Burks' Pl. & Pr. § 298, and cases cited. The jury have the right to render a special verdict if they choose, but are not compellable to do so. 22 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1013.

It will be observed that each of the illustrations given is an instance of common-law procedure in which the rights of the parties are ascertained by the court, and that where the facts have once been admitted or ascertained, nothing is left but a question of law to be decided by the court. As said by Whittle, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Lynchburg Milling Co. v. Bank, supra, discussing the demurrer to the evidence:

"It does not invade the province of the jury as triers of disputed facts, but, assuming that the evidence demurred to is true, the court is called on to determine whether such evidence, as a matter of law, warrants a judgment for the demurree. In other words, it is a supervisory power over jury trials, invoked and exercised by the courts whose duty it is to decide questions of law arising upon undisputed facts." (Italics supplied.)

Again, under eminent domain proceedings, our homes may be invaded or even taken by those to whom the Legislature has delegated the power, and there may be a serious "controversy" as to the amount of damages to be paid, and yet it has been held that we cannot demand a jury trial as a constitutional right. In Lake Bowling Alley v. Richmond, 116 Va. 429, 435, 82 S. E. 91, 99, where assessors (not a jury) were authorized to assess the damages resulting from lowering the grade of a street, it was said:

"Special assessment statutes are not amenable to objection on the ground that they deprive the landowner of his right to have a jury to ascertain what will be a just compensation for the land proposed to be taken (or damaged) for a public highway, unless the Constitution in terms requires that such compensation shall be so assessed. And there is no such requirement in the Constitution of Virginia. It is true that for many years prior to April 30, 1874, the statutes of the state provided for a jury of ad quod damnum, composed of 12 qualified jurors of the vicinage, to make these assessments. But the Legislature of that year amended the former statute and substituted a commission in place of the jury to make the assessment. Acts 1874, p. 468. Since that enactment the Constitution of 1902 has been adopted, and the convention, with knowledge of the fact that the Legislature has substituted a commission for the jury of ad quod damnum in assessment cases, manifested no disposition to restore the former law. This circumstance affords persuasive evidence that the convention did not disapprove of the change wrought by the amendment referred to." Pillow v. Southwest Imp. Co., 92 Va. 144; Davis v. Settle, 48 W. Va. 17.

"Under the act of 1908, as we have seen, the landowner has an appeal of right from the award of the assessor of damages to the corporation or hustings court of the city, where the matter is heard de novo, and in that way his rights are adequately safeguarded."

See, also, Wilburn v. Raines, 111 Va. 334, 68 S. E. 993; Pillow v. Southwest Imp. Co., supra; Davis v. Settle, supra.

The practice of granting peremptory instructions directing a verdict never obtained to any considerable extent in this state, though it was said that where no other verdict could have been properly rendered, the error, if any, was harmless, and the judgment rendered thereon would not be reversed. Hargrave's Adm'r v. Shaw Land Co., 111 Va. 84, 68 S. E. 278, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 151. The right to grant such instructions was in terms forbidden in 1912. Acts 1912, c. 27, p. 52; Code, § 6003. The practice, however, is common and usual in many of the states and in the federal courts, and it has not been regarded as a violation of constitutional guaranty of a jury trial. As we have seen, while it was not the practice in this state before it was forbidden, it was harmless error if the facts were such that no other verdict could have been properly found. It did not violate the constitutional guaranty of a jury trial.

Thus far we have examined only Virginia authorities, with the result that it appears that, where there are no disputed facts, but only questions of law to be decided upon undisputed facts, there is no violation of the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury. When we look elsewhere, we find the discussion of the subject well-nigh exhausted in the majority and minority opinions in Slocum v. New York Life Ins. Co., 228 U. S. 364, 33 Sup. Ct. 523, 57 L. Ed. 879, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1029. There the question arose upon a Pennsylvania statute quite similar in substance to the Virginia statute, and the question was whether the statute, as applied in the federal courts, was in conflict with the seventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that—

The court, by a vote of five to four, held that the Pennsylvania statute was in conflict with said amendment. Mr. Justice Hughes delivered a dissenting opinion, which was concurred in by Justices Holmes, Lurton, and Pitney. The Pennsylvania court, in a long line of decisions, had held that the act did not conflict with the Constitution of that state guaranteeing a trial by jury. Under these circumstances, we have no inclination to depart from our former decisions bearing on the question, which, so far as they go, are in harmony with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Hughes in his dissenting opinion. The proposition that the entry of an involuntary nonsuit, or the direction of a verdict, does not conflict with the constitutional provision for a jury trial is so well settled that Mr. Hughes does not take the trouble to cite any authority for it, but for convenient reference we give the holding of the Supreme Court in two cases:

"Where the trial judge is satisfied upon the evidence that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and that a verdict, if rendered for plaintiff, must be set aside, the court may instruct the jury to find for the defendant, and in such case no constitutional question arises; but, if the court errs as matter of law in so doing, the remedy lies in a review in the appellate court." Treat Mfg. Co. v. Standard Steel & I. Co., 157 U. S. 674, 15 Sup. Ct. 718, 39 L. Ed. 853. "The granting by the trial court of a nonsuit for want of sufficient evidence to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff is no infringement of the constitutional right of trial by jury." Coughran v. Bigelow, 164 U. S. 301, 17 Sup. Ct. 117, 41 L. Ed. 442.

No brief analysis of the opinion would do it justice, and it is too lengthy to quote. It cites with approval a number of Pennsylvania decisions and decisions of federal courts in that state upholding the constitutional validity of the Pennsylvania statute. Among them, Fisher v. Scharadin, 186 Pa. 568, 40 Atl. 1093; Carstairs v. Bonding & T. Co., 54 C. C. A. 85, 116 Fed. 449; Smith v. Jones, 104 C. C. A. 329, 331, 181 Fed. 819, 823. The opinion of Mr. Justice Hughes is rested chiefly on the ground that the province of the jury is to decide questions of fact, not questions of law; that when no facts are shown which would warrant a jury in finding a verdict in favor of the party asking it, it is the duty of the court to enter judgment for the adverse party; that it is only the duty of settling disputed facts which is protected by the constitutional provision; that the Constitution only seeks to protect the substantial right, not mere forms of procedure; that demurrers to the evidence, compulsory nonsuits, and directed verdicts are all recognized as legitimate methods of taking a case from the jury; and that if a trial judge may lawfully direct what verdict a jury shall render, it is less objectionable to reserve his decision until after the verdict is rendered, and then in a proper case enter judgment for the adverse party, as this method "permits the judge to give a decisive law question on which the case turns a more careful examination than he could do in the stress of a trial. It seems to be admitted that if the trial judge had directed the jury what verdict to find, and they had found that verdict, a judgment entered thereon would have been free from constitutional objection. Having this in mind, Mr. Justice Hughes concludes his discussion as follows:

"It is said, however, that a new trial affords opportunity to a plaintiff to better his case by presenting evidence which may not have been available before. But we are not dealing with an application for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, or with the principles controlling an application of that sort. We are concerned with the question whether a party has a constitutional right to another trial, simply because the trial court erred in its determination of a question of law which was decisive of the case-made. Had the trial court done what this court says it should have done, it would have directed a verdict for the defendant, and if the jury, simply following the instruction of the trial court, had so found, final judgment would have been entered, and no new trial would now be granted. Still the jury would not have passed upon any question of fact, but would simply have obeyed the judge. The opportunity to better the case on a second trial would probably be as welcome, but it would not be accorded. I am unable to see any basis for a constitutional distinction which raises a constitutional right to another trial in the one case and not in the other.

"Of course, in any case, where there are questions of fact for the jury, the court cannot undertake to decide them unless a jury trial is waived. But it would seem to be an entire misapprehension to say that trial by jury, in its constitutional aspect, requires the submission to the jury of evidence which presents no question for their decision, and that, although there be no facts for the jury to pass upon, still the judgment which follows as matter of law can be arrived at only through a verdict. This is to create a constitutional right out of the practice of taking verdicts by direction. The ancient method of challenging the sufficiency of the evidence by demurrer, and thereupon either discharging the jury altogether or assessing the damages conditionally to await the decision of the demurrer (Darrose v. Newbott, Cro. Car. 143), reveals the function of court and jury in a clearer light, and shows that the idea that the judgment upon a trial where there is no evidence to sustain a finding by the jury can be reached only through a verdict could not have been entertained at the time the Constitution was adopted."

We have found no satisfactory answer to this view of the case. The object of the statute is to put an end to litigation, to obviate repeated trials and the delay and expense of litigation, and to remove the temptation to perjury by patching up the weak places disclosed at a former trial, not by after-discovered evidence, but by the same witnesses relied upon at the former trial.

It was argued before us that the power given to the trial judge to enter such final judgment as to him should seem right and proper was a substitution of the opinion of the judge for that of the jury. This power does not come into operation until after the verdict has been rightly set aside, and when it does come into operation it is not an arbitrary power, but is subject to review on a writ of error. The judgment is not the determination of any question of fact, but is simply the conclusion of law upon the facts as they appear. The meaning of the statute is that, having rightly set aside the verdict "because contrary to the evidence or without evidence to support it," the trial court shall enter such final judgment as ought to be entered, or as the law requires upon the evidence before it. This does not mean necessarily a judgment in favor of the adverse party. It may be in favor of the party obtaining the verdict, but for a different amount from that found by the jury. Compare Gunn v. Union R. Co., 27 R. L. 320, 62 Atl. 118, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, we are of opinion that a trial court is without power to set aside the verdict of a jury except upon the conditions hereinbefore set forth, and that when such verdict is properly set aside, the power to enter a final judgment conferred upon the court by section 6251 of the Code is not the power to determine any disputed fact in a controversy touching property or a suit between man and man, and is not forbidden by the Constitution of this state. Section 6251 of the Code is, in the judgment of this court, wise in its conception, valid in its enactment, and useful in its application.

[14, 15] It was also argued before us that the statute under consideration is in conflict with section 6003, forbidding peremptory instructions directing a verdict. If the two sections can stand together, they must. Black, Interp. Laws, p. 363. We find no difficulty in harmonizing them. In the stress of the trial, when the evidence is all in, and the jury are waiting for the instructions of the court, and all of the other business of the court is suspended, the judge, who is to instruct as to the law of the case, has no time to examine authorities and weigh and consider them, it may be on important questions of first impression, and the Legislature might well say that he should not at this stage of the case practically decide it on the merits by giving a peremptory instruction directing what verdict should be found. But these reasons do not apply after the verdict has been rendered, and when the motion to set it aside has been made, the judge may then take what time he needs for the examination and consideration of authorities, but more especially he can deliberately review and consider the whole evidence in the cause and determine whether or not the duty rests upon him to set aside the verdict of the jury. Compare Dalmas v. Kemble, 215 Pa. 410, 64 Atl. 559. If, however, we were of opinion that the two sections could not stand together, we should be compelled to uphold the validity of section 6251 as the later of the two acts in the point of enactment; section 6003 having been simply carried into the Code from the Acts of 1912.

In referring to the revision of 1887, Riely, J., speaking for the court in Gaines' Adm'r v. Marye, 94 Va. 225, 227, 26 S. E. 511, said:

"The Code is a revision of the statute law of the state as it existed at the time of the revision. It was adopted by the Legislature as one act, and all its parts took effect equally and simultaneously. Notwithstanding the fact that the Code is a revision of the statute law, if its various sections are harmonious and their meaning plain, resort cannot be had in construing them to the original statutes to see if any error was committed in the revision. Where harmonious, and their meaning clear, they speak for themselves, and must be interpreted and given effect as revised. If, however, there is a substantial doubt as to their meaning, the law which was the subject of the revision may be looked to in ascertaining their meaning. If they are inconsistent and cannot stand together, the original statutes, and the respective dates of their enactment, may be examined to see what was the last expression of the will of the Legislature on the subject. And this last expression of the legislative will, when ascertained, if it be embodied in the revision, must prevail in construing inconsistent and repugnant parts of the law as revised. Winn's Adm'r v. Jones, 6 Leigh [33 Va.] 74; and U. S. v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508."

To the same effect, see Black, Interp. Laws, pp. 363, 364, and the following cases cited in support of the text: Gibbons v. Brittenum, 56 Miss. 232; State v. Heidorn, 74 Mo. 410; Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Malone, 46 Ala. 391.

[10] It remains to be determined whether or not the trial court erred in setting aside the verdict because contrary to the evidence, or without evidence to support it. This depends upon whether or not the contract "was made in reference to the rules" of the Interstate Cotton Seed Crusher's Association, of which both plaintiff and defendant were members, so that they became a part of the contract of the parties, and, if so, whether the plaintiff delivered the tanks, or either of them, to the railroad company "in such time that under the ordinary course of transportation they should reach the seller before the expiration of contract time." As to one of the cars the jury found in favor of the plaintiff on both questions. The defendant insisted that the contract was made with reference to said rules, and an instruction upon the subject was given to the jury at its instance, and it cannot now complain of a finding in accord with that view. Upon the other question, that is, whether the tanks or either of them were delivered in time, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, and a majority of the court are of the opinion that the evidence relied on is insufficient to show this essential fact, and hence conclude that the trial court committed no error in setting aside the verdict and entering judgment for the defendant.

Affirmed.

GULF REFINING CO. et al. v. MILLER
(two cases). (Nos. 2164, 2165.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1031(1) — Certiorari ⇨36 — Courts ⇨189(14), 190(1) — Evidence ⇨10(1) — Judgment ⇨415 — City court of Pelham without authority to grant new trial; certiorari is exclusive remedy for correction of errors; verdict illegal, when jurors did not disclose disqualification, but question not open on certiorari; illegal verdict set aside in equity, in absence of other remedy; judicial notice taken that town is distinct from county site; injury presumed from disqualification of jurors.

The city court of Pelham, created by the act approved August 22, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 325), is not a city court within the meaning of the Constitution of this state, which authorizes certain city courts to grant new trials; nor has the city court of Pelham inherent power to grant new trials.

(a) The act creating the court fixes certiorari to the superior court as the exclusive remedy for correcting errors committed on the trial of cases in that court.

(b) If on the call of a case (an action for unliquidated damages based on tort) the judge, on request of the attorneys for the defendant, inquired of the jurors as to relationship to the parties, and two of the jurors, who were disqualified by reason of relationship to the plaintiff, failed to report such relationship, and were accepted as jurors, and participated in rendering a verdict against the defendants, and the relationship was not known or discovered by the defendants or their sole attorney until after verdict, the verdict would be illegal; but, as no ruling was made at the trial holding the jurors competent, their disqualification could not be inquired into by petition for certiorari.

(c) The acceptance of disqualified jurors, under circumstances and in an action of the character stated above, amounts to such a mistake as will authorize a court of equity to set aside the verdict rendered in the city court of Pelham, and order a new trial.

2. Action  $\S$  57(1)—Petition for certiorari not consolidated with petition to set verdict of city court aside for mistake.

Relatively to errors committed on the trial of a case in the city court of Pelham, there is an adequate remedy at law by petition for certiorari; and where such a petition is pending before the judge of the superior court, the petitioner cannot have an order consolidating that case with a petition to set aside, on equitable grounds, the verdict rendered in the city court.

3. Other grounds of demurrer.

Except as indicated in the second note, none of the grounds of demurrer were meritorious.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$  1144—Judgment  $\S$  459—Jury  $\S$  110(1)—Refusal of interlocutory injunction not error, when evidence conflicting; judgment affirmed, with directions to hear application for injunction again; defendant cannot complain of jurors' disqualification, when known before verdict, and not complained of.

At the interlocutory hearing for injunction there was evidence on one side tending to show that the defendants and their sole attorney did not know of the disqualification of the jurors until after the verdict. There was evidence on the other side tending to show that the defendants were informed of the relationship while the case was under consideration by the jury and before verdict. Under this conflict of the evidence, the judge did not err in refusing the injunction.

(a) But as it is probable that the judgment of the court was based on an erroneous view of the law, as indicated by its dismissal of the petition on demurrer, the judgment refusing the injunction will be affirmed, with direction that the court again hear the petition for injunction in the light of the rulings above made.

George, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Suit by the Gulf Refining Company and others against Sanford Miller. A temporary injunction was refused, and the petition thereafter dismissed on demurrer, and plaintiffs bring error. Judgment sustaining demurrer reversed in part and affirmed in part. Judgment refusing injunction affirmed, with directions.

Sanford Miller instituted in the city court of Pelham an action for damages against the Gulf Refining Company, a corporation, and J. F. Jones, the agent in charge of the local business of the corporation. The action was founded on alleged negligence of the defendant in selling to the plaintiff gasoline on his application to buy kerosene. It was alleged that, after procuring the gasoline, the plaintiff filled his lamp under the belief that it was kerosene, and when he undertook to light the lamp an explosion occurred, and the plaintiff was burned, thereby sustaining painful and serious personal injury. On the trial before a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $12,190.07. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which the trial judge refused to entertain, on the ground that the city court of Pelham did not have jurisdiction to grant a new trial. Thereafter, and within the time prescribed by law, the defendants presented to the judge of the superior court a petition for certiorari.

While the petition for certiorari was pending, the same defendants instituted an equitable action in the superior court against Sanford Miller, alleging all that is stated above, and among other things the following in substance: When the case was called for trial in the city court of Pelham, the defendants (plaintiffs in this equitable suit) requested the court to "purge the jury as to disqualification," which was done. "The list thus obtained and put upon defendants, petitioners herein, contained the names" of two persons who had qualified as jurors in the case, and the persons so qualifying were accepted, and both served as jurors and participated in rendering the verdict. After the verdict had been rendered and judgment of the court entered thereon, petitioners learned that the two jurors above mentioned were disqualified on account of relationship as "third cousins" of the wife of the plaintiff in the damage suit, a fact concerning which neither of the plaintiffs in the equity suit nor their counsel had any knowledge or information prior to the judgment of the court. The attack upon the verdict on account of disqualification of the jurors could not be raised by certiorari, because it did not involve any ruling or error of law committed on the trial, and it could not be raised by motion for new trial, because the city court of Pelham was a statutory court, and did not have jurisdiction inherently, under the laws or Constitution of the state, to grant new trials; it being provided in the act creating the court that the exclusive method of appealing from any finding or judgment of the court is by certiorari to the superior court.

Under the circumstances the only way to obtain an adjudication of the alleged disqualification of the jurors is by petition to a court of equity; and unless the court of equity takes jurisdiction, the petitioners, without fault on their part, will be deprived of a substantial right of having their case passed upon by an impartial jury. As exhibits the petitioners set forth copies of the record in the application for certiorari and in the motion for new trial, and finally allege generally that they have a valid and meritorious defense to the suit filed against them in the city court. The prayers were that the court of equity take jurisdiction, and that the petition for certiorari be consolidated with the case, and that a new trial be granted, and that the defendant be restrained and enjoined from enforcing the judgment in the city court. At an interlocutory hearing the judge refused to grant a temporary injunction, and subsequently during the appearance term rendered a judgment sustaining the general and special demurrers on each and every ground taken. The plaintiffs filed separate bills of exceptions to the judgment refusing to grant an interlocutory injunction and to the judgment sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the petition, properly assigning error on the judgment in each instance.

W. Carroll Latimer, of Atlanta, and E. E. Cox, of Camilla, for plaintiffs in error.

J. J. Hill and O. B. McElvey, both of Pelham, and H. H. Merry, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The city court of Pelham was created by special act of the Legislature (Acts 1905, p. 325) in the town of Pelham, in the county of Mitchell, and given limited civil and criminal jurisdiction over "all that portion of Mitchell county embraced in the 1194th district, G. M., of said county." The judge is given authority to hear and determine all civil cases of which the court had jurisdiction; but any party in a civil case is entitled to a trial by a jury, upon entering a demand therefor in writing by himself or his attorney on or before the call of the docket of the court to which the case was made returnable. Where a jury trial is demanded, lists of the names of 18 jurors are required to be furnished, and each side is allowed 3 peremptory challenges, thus leaving 12 jurors to try the case. Judicial cognizance is taken of the fact that the town of Pelham is a town separate and distinct from Camilla, which is the county site of the county and not included in the 1194th district, being the territory over which the city court of Pelham has jurisdiction.

The city court of Pelham thus established, though called a "city court," is not such a court, within the contemplation of the Constitution of this state, as has inherent power to grant new trials. Welborne v. State, 114 Ga. 793, 40 S. E. 857. In section 36 of the act it is expressly declared that—

"From said city court of Pelham there shall be no appeal, but all errors committed by the said city court of Pelham or the judge thereof, in judgments or rulings, or otherwise in the handling of cases * * * may be corrected by writ of certiorari, returnable to the superior court of Mitchell county."

It thus appears that the city court of Pelham was without inherent power under the Constitution to grant new trials, and the express provision for correcting errors committed in the court was restricted to the remedy of certiorari to the superior court. The last-mentioned remedy will apply to any error of law committed by the judge, but could not apply to correct such a mistake as allowing disqualified jurors to serve on the jury, where the disqualification was unknown to the court, the parties, or their attorneys, after due diligence and without fault of the party or his attorney; no issue ever having been presented as to the qualifications of the jurors and no ruling made by the court. If the city court of Pelham could entertain a motion in arrest of judgment, it could not grant such a motion on account of a mistake of the above character, because the mistake does not appear on the face of the record.

Under the circumstances there is no provision of law for attacking the verdict on the ground of the disqualification of the jurors, and without the aid of equity an injured party would be remediless. Civil Code, § 4584, declares:

"The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction may be set aside by a decree, for fraud, accident, or mistake, or the acts of the adverse party unmixed with the negligence or fault of the petitioner."

In Wade v. Watson, 133 Ga. 608, 66 S. E. 922, it was held:

"The superior court, in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction, upon appropriate pleadings, has power to set aside a judgment of the Supreme Court which was obtained by fraud practiced upon the court in the procurement of the judgment by means of an entry of acknowledgment of service placed on the bill of exceptions by some one other than the defendant in error or his counsel, and without authority or consent of either of them."

The question there under consideration involved the setting aside, by a court of equity, of the judgment of another court of competent jurisdiction, on account of fraud. In the course of the opinion the case of Kohn v. Lovett, 43 Ga. 179, was cited and applied. After quoting from that decision it was said:

"The ruling cited is relevant to the present case principally because it holds that equity may interfere to prevent the enforcement of the judgment of another court, and even a judgment of the Supreme Court, where it appears that it was obtained by mistake unmixed with laches on the part of the party injuriously affected thereby. When it is considered that the power to correct on account of mistake also involves the power to correct on account of fraud, the ruling quoted leaves no room for further discussion upon the proposition that it is in the power of the superior court, in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction and upon sufficient equitable pleading, to set aside a judgment of the Supreme Court on account of fraud which resulted in the procurement of the judgment."

The allegations of the petition make a typical case for equitable relief on the ground of mistake. The defendants in the damage suit requested the judge to purge the jury. There was compliance with this request on the part of the judge; and that the jurors were allowed to serve without their disqualifications being ascertained before verdict was on its facts a mistake upon the part of everybody, and certainly upon the part of the court and the defendants and their attorneys. If the disqualification was known to the jurors or the plaintiff and concealed by them, their fraud in concealing it, coupled with the mistake of the defendants in innocently allowing them to serve, would be ground for equitable relief, just the same as if their disqualification as jurors had been overlooked by mistake of all the parties. The action was for unliquidated damages, and the defendants were entitled to a qualified jury to fix the amount of damages that should be awarded, as well as to determine the defendants' liability for such damages. As the jurors were disqualified and served on the jury, injury will be presumed. Georgia Railroad v. Cole, 73 Ga. 713. The petition set forth a cause of action, in so far as it undertook to set aside the verdict rendered in the city court of Pelham, and it was erroneous to sustain the demurrer in its entirety.

[2] 2. As to all the alleged errors committed at the trial, the defendant had an adequate remedy at law by petition for certiorari; and the demurrer was properly sustained as to so much of the petition as sought by consolidation to draw the petition for certiorari into the equitable cause.

[3] 3. In the light of what is said in the first division, there was no merit in any other grounds of demurrer.

[4] 4. At the interlocutory hearing for injunction the evidence was conflicting as to the time at which the defendants were informed of the disqualification of the jurors. The evidence in behalf of the defendants in the damage suit was to the effect that neither they nor their sole attorney at law learned of the disqualification until after the verdict was returned. There was evidence for the plaintiff in the damage suit to the effect that the defendants were informed of the disqualification of the jurors after the case was submitted to the jury and before a verdict had been returned. If the defendants had knowledge of the disqualification, it was their duty to complain before the verdict was returned, if they desired to do so. If they did not complain, and took the chance of a verdict being in their favor, they would not be heard afterwards to complain of the disqualification of the jurors. Georgia Railroad v. Cole, supra; Miller v. State, 139 Ga. 716, 78 S. E. 181. The matter of settling the conflict of evidence as to the time when these defendants learned of the disqualification of the jurors was a question on interlocutory hearing, for determination by the trial judge, and his discretion in refusing the injunction will not be disturbed. As the judge sustained the demurrer to the petition, and in view of the language of the order refusing the injunction, it is probable that he was of the opinion at the interlocutory hearing that the petition did not state a cause of action, and based his decision in refusing an injunction on that erroneous understanding of the law, while, if he had been of the opinion that it stated a cause of action, he would not have refused the injunction on account of the conflict of evidence above mentioned. Under the circumstances, while affirming the judgment refusing the injunction, direction is given that the judge again hear the application for injunction, in the light of what is said in this opinion.

On the bill of exceptions assigning error on the judgment sustaining the demurrer, the judgment is reversed in part and affirmed in part. On the judgment on the bill of exceptions assigning error on the judgment refusing an interlocutory injunction, the judgment is affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concur, except GEORGE, J. I dissent from the ruling in the second headnote, upon the ground that the case is within the general rule that equity, having assumed jurisdiction for one purpose, will take jurisdiction for all purposes. The judgment on demurrer should, as I think, be reversed generally.

Courts  $\Rightarrow$  217.—Writ of error in case originating in city court held within jurisdiction of Court of Appeals.

The writ of error in this case complains of a judgment rendered by the judge of the superior court, refusing to sanction a petition for certiorari to review and correct a verdict and judgment rendered in the city court of Pelham, in an action for unliquidated damages on account of personal injuries founded on tort. The action does not involve any constitutional question, and is not otherwise of such character as, under the amendment to the Constitution as proposed by the act of 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 19) and ratified at a general election, would confer on the Supreme Court jurisdiction of the writ of error. The Court of Appeals has jurisdiction of the writ of error, and the case will be transferred to that court for decision.

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

Courts  $\Leftrightarrow$  217—Proceeding held one for change of venue, and reviewable by Court of Appeals.

A proceeding by an indicted person to require the clerk of the superior court to transmit the indictment to the Superior Court of another county, to which previous indictments claimed to involve the same transaction had been transferred on change of venue, was a case involving only a change of venue, and a writ of error to review the denial of the petition was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals, and not of the Supreme Court, under the constitutional amendment of 1916 (see Acts 1916, p. 19), where no constitutional or other question conferring jurisdiction on the Supreme Court was raised.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Criminal prosecution by the State against Joe Ruffin. A petition to direct the clerk to transmit the indictment to the superior court of another county was denied, and defendant brings error. Case transferred to the Court of Appeals.

Archibald Blackshear, of Augusta, and Lawrence & Abrahams, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Thos. L. Hill, of Savannah, and A. S. Anderson, Sol. Gen., of Millen, for the State.

HILL, J. This case came on to be heard in Chatham superior court, on the petition of Joe Ruffin, praying that the clerk of the superior court of Jenkins county be directed to transmit to the superior court of Chatham county an indictment found by the grand jury of Jenkins county on March 15, 1921, charging the petitioner with the offense of murder, in order that appropriate action might be had on the indictment by the superior court of Chatham county, and that, pending consideration of the petition, the petitioner be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Chatham county. It was alleged in the petition that the petitioner had been indicted by the grand jury of Jenkins county on March 15, 1921, for the murder of one Edmund Scott in said county on April 13, 1919; that the indictment so found charged the petitioner with the same criminal act as that charged against him in two previous indictments found by the grand jury of Jenkins county at the September term, 1919, on which indictments he had been fully acquitted upon his trial in the superior court of Chatham county, a change of venue from Jenkins county to Chatham county having been granted, and that, by reason of the acquittal on the two previous indictments which involved the same transaction, as charged by the indictment found on March 15, 1921, Jenkins superior court had no jurisdiction to try him upon the last indictment, but that the superior court of Chatham county did have jurisdiction. Upon consideration of the petition the judge of the superior court of Chatham county rendered the following judgment:

"I am of opinion that I have no power or jurisdiction to pass on the issues involved; the power or jurisdiction being vested in the superior court of Jenkins county, and the judge thereof. Order is denied."

To this judgment the petitioner excepted.

Properly construed, this is a case involving a change of venue, of which class of cases, since the constitutional amendment of 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 19), the Court of Appeals, and not this court, has jurisdiction. Scoggins v. State, 24 Ga. App. 677, 678, 102 S. E. 39. No constitutional or other question is raised by the record which would confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court; and it is therefore transferred to the Court of Appeals.

CHENEY et al. v. RAGAN et al. DANIEL et al. v. JENKINS et al. BOARD OF COM'RS OF CALHOUN COUNTY et al. v. DOZIER et al. (Nos. 2546, 2575, 2587.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1921.)

Counties ¶35(1, 3)—Order for election on removal of county site should not specify proposed new site; election invalid when place specified; declaration of result of invalid election will be enjoined in equity.

Where an election is held upon the issue as to whether there shall be a change or removal of the county site of a named county in this state, the petition for the election should be for an election for the removal of the county site, and the order calling the election should show that it is one for the removal of the actual county site, without specifying a particular place to which it shall be removed, so as to leave to the qualified voters free choice between the place where the county site is actually located and any other place in the county. And where the order for the election specifies the place to which the proposed removal shall be made, so as to make the contest between the actual county site and a particular designated place, and an election is held under such order, the election is invalid.

(a) A court of equity will intervene, upon petition filed in time, by writ of injunction to prevent the declaration of the result of such election.

(b) The court erred in refusing to dismiss the petition for mandamus, and in granting the mandamus.

(c) The court did not err in granting the injunction against the issuance of county warrants to managers of the election in question, and in restraining payment of the same.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; R. C. Bell, Judge.

Suit for injunction by C. W. Cheney and others against K. McK. Ragan and others; application of C. J. Jenkins and others for writ of mandamus against Harper Daniel and others; and suit by Sallie Dozier and others against the Board of Commissioners, etc., of Calhoun County, and others. Judgment for defendants in the first case, for the relators in the second case, and for the petitioners in the third case, and the unsuccessful parties bring error. Judgment in the first two cases reversed, and judgment in the third case affirmed.

Cheney and others filed their petition seeking an injunction which would restrain the defendants from holding a special election involving the removal of the courthouse from Morgan, Calhoun county, Ga., to the town of Edison, in that county, and from consolidating the returns for that special election; petitioners contending that the proceedings preliminary to the election were void for the reasons pointed out in the petition, that the petitions calling for the election under the statute were themselves illegal, and that the proposed election itself should be declared void. The court upon the hearing of the case refused an injunction, and the plaintiffs excepted upon numerous grounds.

In the second case above stated Jenkins and others sought a mandamus absolute, to require the managers at the same election to consolidate the votes cast at the election, and to declare the result. A demurrer to this petition was overruled, and to this order the defendants excepted. They filed a joint answer assigning various grounds in support of their contention that a mandamus absolute could not properly be granted against them; and the relators demurred to this answer, on general grounds. This demurrer was sustained, and the respondents excepted. No question of fact being involved in the case, the court entered a final judgment granting a mandamus absolute. Error is assigned upon this judgment.

In the third case above stated a petition was filed seeking to enjoin the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Calhoun county from issuing a county warrant or warrants to any of the superintendents of the election already referred to for holding and conducting said election, which was alleged to be illegal and void, and to enjoin the Bank of Leary, the county depository (the office of the treasurer of the county having been abolished), from paying out of the county funds any warrant or order that might be issued to the superintendents of the election. The petitioners in all of the cases were citizens and taxpayers of Calhoun county.

These three cases were argued together, and each of them brings under review the principal question involved; that is, whether the special election under consideration was illegal and void.

In No. 2546:

J. H. Dorsey, of Morgan, Glessner & Collins, of Blakeley, and W. I. Geer, of Colquitt, for plaintiffs in error.

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, A. L. Miller and E. L. Smith, both of Edison, J. M. Cowart and B. W. Fortson, both of Arlington, and Pottle & Hofmayer, of Albany, for defendants in error.

In No. 2575:

J. H. Dorsey, of Morgan, W. I. Geer, of Colquitt, and Glessner & Collins, of Blakeley, for plaintiffs in error.

A. L. Miller and E. L. Smith, both of Edison, Pottle & Hofmayer, of Albany, and B. W. Fortson and J. M. Cowart, both of Arlington, for defendants in error.

In No. 2587:

B. W. Fortson, of Arlington, Pottle & Hofmayer, of Albany, and Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

J. H. Dorsey, of Morgan, Glessner & Collins, of Blakeley, and W. I. Geer, of Colquitt, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). As these cases were argued together, they are decided together, as each of them involves one question which is the principal question in each of the cases; and, where any one of the three cases involves a distinct question that must be decided, that will be indicated by special reference to the case in which the question is raised.

1. The legality of the election to determine whether there should be a removal of the courthouse of Calhoun county or not is brought in question in each of these three cases. Certain subsidiary questions are also raised, the greater part of which it is not necessary to decide, in view of the conclusion we have reached as to the main question—that is, the legality of the election. And the determination of that question involves, in the first place, a construction of sections 486 and 488 of the Civil Code, which relate to the change of county sites and the indorsement on the ballots cast in the election held for that purpose. Section 486 relates to the petition that shall be made to the ordinary for the removal or change of the county site, the order to be granted by the ordinary and the notice thereof, and the persons qualified to vote in such election, and the period at which such elections may or may not occur. Section 488 is in the following language:

"At said election all voters in favor of removal, and to what place, shall indorse on their ballots 'For removal,' and those who are opposed to removal shall indorse on their ballots 'Against removal,' and if two thirds of the votes cast at said election are in favor of removal to any one particular place, the General Assembly next convening after said election may provide for the removal of said county site by appropriate legislation."

And a construction of this latter section is made necessary by one of the principal questions raised in these cases; and that is whether an election called by an order granted by the ordinary, in which order it is recited that an election is called for the determination of the question as to the removal or change in the county site from the actual county site to a named town, and in which it is further recited that all voters in favor of removal of the county site shall have indorsed on their ballots "For removal of the county site to Edison, Georgia," and those voters who are opposed to the removal shall indorse on their ballots "Against removal," was a valid election upon the question of the change or removal of the county site. After a careful consideration of all the provisions and terms of section 488, the conclusion forces itself upon us that an election held in pursuance of the order referred to was not a valid, legal election. In section 488 it is declared that at an election for the purpose of changing the county site all voters thereat in favor of the removal shall indorse on their ballots "For removal," and to what place. The language of the statute prescribing the indorsement on the ballots is somewhat confused, as is readily seen by reading section 488; but by transposing the expression "and to what place" so that it shall follow the clause containing the words "For removal" the express declaration of the statute is made plain, and lays down the rule that the voters in favor of the removal must indorse on their ballots "For removal" and "to what place" the removal shall be made. And this is the construction given to the section of the Code in the case of Wells v. Ragsdale, 102 Ga. 53, 29 S. E. 165, where it is said:

"The meaning and intention of this provision of the act is not complied with by a simple indorsement upon the ballot of the voter 'For removal.' It must go further, and express the wishes of the voter as to the place to which the county site shall be removed; and, unless such expression is made, such vote cannot be counted for removal."

And that it was not the intention that the choice of the voters at such election should be limited to one particular place is shown by the further provision in this section that—

"If two-thirds of the votes cast at said election are in favor of removal to any one particular place, the General Assembly next convening after said election may provide for the removal of said county-site by appropriate legislation."

Counsel representing the defendants in the first case insist that, even if it was the purpose of the Legislature, in elections like this, to submit merely the question of the removal of the existing county site, without limiting the choice of the voters between that place and some designated place, as was done in the present instance, nevertheless a call for an election to determine whether there should be a removal of the existing county site to a place designated in the order is not invalid, as the voters would be at liberty to indorse upon their ballots the place to which the county site should be removed. We cannot agree with this contention. We think it is clear that it was the intention of the General Assembly, in elections like this, that those voters who were in favor of a removal should have free choice between the actual county site and the one to which they desired a change to be made. They have the right under the statute to express an unrestricted choice, and the call of an election in which they should have the right to express this choice should not be misleading. The duty should not be imposed upon the voter to construe the statute conferring the right to make a choice and decide that he had a right to make a choice not indicated in the order calling the election. In State ex rel. v. County Commissioners, 22 Fla. 29, it is said:

"It is clear that the election prayed for and ordered, and given notice of, was one as to whether Sanderson should continue to be the county site, or the county site should be changed or removed to McClenny. The statute provides that the place receiving a majority of the number of votes cast at such election shall be the county site 'for ten years.' The purpose of the statute is that when an election is held under it the several voters of the county shall have the right to vote for any place in the county they may respectively deem the best place for the county site. The election to be ordered is 'for the location of the county site' of the county, and not merely whether it shall be removed to a named particular place or remain where it is. No such limited issue is to be submitted to the people. It is not contemplated that any voter shall be restricted either by the petitioning voters, or by the county commissioners, to voting for one of any two or more particular places, and any election in which such restriction is made is entirely contrary to the spirit and purpose of the act. It is clear that no election has been ordered which called for an expression from the voters of Baker county of their choice as to which, of all points, place, or localities in it, the county site should be changed to. It will not do to say that the voters could have voted for any place other than Sanderson or McClenny. No such election was called, and it cannot be assumed that it was understood by the electors to be any election other than as between Sanderson and McClenny. It is a fact that in the case of Lanier v. Padgett, 18 Fla. 842, an election was held, and Sumterville received a majority of the votes over Leesburg, the then existing county site, and no fraud was alleged in the election; yet, as the petition did not ask a change of location, the election was declared to be illegal, and this, too, although it appears that the order was for an election locating the county site as contemplated by the statute. In State ex rel. v. County Commissioners, 19 Fla. 531, it appears that a large vote was polled at this election. The doctrine of these cases is that the provisions of the act in question should be strictly observed. 19 Fla. 532, 533. When an election of this kind is to be held, fairness and a proper enforcement of the law require that nothing should be permitted so fully calculated to mislead the electors as to their rights or in such patent antagonism to the true spirit of the law."

And this reasoning of the court seems to us to be sound and conclusive. And hence we conclude that the election sought to be enjoined was not such an election as is contemplated and provided for in the statutes under consideration, relating to elections upon the issue as to whether there shall be a removal of a county site. The preliminary and essential steps to the holding of such an election in this case were not complied with, because the order for the election was not such as contemplated by the statute; and we can reach no other conclusion than that, so far as it affected the question of removal, the election was illegal and void.

2. And under the questions made by the pleadings we must now decide whether or not a court of equity would interfere by injunction to prevent the consolidation of the vote and the declaration of the result of the election. This court has more than once adverted to the general principle that a court of equity ordinarily will not interfere with the holding of an election, by virtue of the exercise of the political power, for the determination of issues and matters submitted to popular vote under the provisions of the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof. But there are exceptions to this general principle. The case of Mayor, etc., of Americus v. Perry, 114 Ga. 871, 40 S. E. 1004, 57 L. R. A. 230, was one in which an application was made by the chairman and members of the board of police commissioners of the municipality, and by citizens and taxpayers of the city on behalf of themselves and other citizens and taxpayers, to enjoin the mayor and council of the municipality and others from carrying into effect certain ordinances adopted by the mayor and council, which, if void, had the effect of abolishing the board of police commissioners and the office of chief of police. One of the questions raised was whether a court of equity would intervene in such a case and enjoin an election under an ordinance which the petitioners claimed was invalid. The contention was made in the case by demurrer that a court of equity would not interfere in a matter of this character; and this court said:

"The ordinances, so far as they attempt to abolish the board of police commissioners and to deprive it of the powers which the charter conferred upon it, are ultra vires and void, and there is nothing in the petition to show that the board of police commissioners is either failing or refusing to exercise the powers confided to it by the General Assembly. On the other hand, it appears, not only from the petition, but from the answer itself, that the board is attempting to exercise those very powers and would exercise them but for the obstructions placed in its way by the mayor and council. Under such circumstances the mayor and council have no authority whatever to elect a police force, and the election of such officers would bring about the question as to whether the persons so elected were entitled to demand compensation from the city; and while, under the view we have taken of the case, such persons would have no right to receive compensation, the fact that they were elected and were attempting to discharge the duties of the offices for which they were chosen would result either in the money in the city treasury being illegally used in paying their claims, or in requiring the money of the municipality to be used in defeating their claims for compensation; and to prevent this any taxpayer would have a right to appeal to a court of equity to enjoin the mayor and council from proceeding further to do any act which would have the effect to bring about either result. The plaintiffs bring their petition, not only as members of the board of police commissioners, but also in their capacity of citizens and taxpayers; and in this latter capacity they are entitled to be heard, the case being one where the municipal authorities are going beyond their powers and doing acts which, if carried into effect, would either result in a misappropriation of public funds or entail upon the taxpayers of the city the expense of litigating with persons who might hold claims against the city under the invalid ordinances."

And in the case of Mayor etc., of Macon v. Hughes, 110 Ga. 795, 38 S. E. 247, it is said:

"It is contended that the court below was without jurisdiction to grant the injunction prayed for, for the reason that a court of equity will not enjoin the holding of an election, which is a political and ministerial function, and consequently not controllable by the courts. The general rule undoubtedly is that courts of equity will not interfere in matters of elections. To say that this rule is without exception seems to be purely arbitrary. Why should not such an election as the one now under consideration be enjoined? It is not an election in which a public office is involved, the right to hold which may be easily and effectually tested by the writ of quo warranto, but it is an election to determine whether or not given territory shall be annexed to the city of Macon. The city authorities have no power to call the election, their ordinance attempting to do so is absolutely void, and any election held thereunder would be likewise void. Some of the petitioners are residents and taxpayers of the city of Macon, and they predicate their right to the injunction on the ground that illegal expenses will be incurred by reason of the election, of which expenses they will be required to bear their proportionate part. This was a sufficient ground for the granting of the injunction at their instance."

See, also, Wells v. Ragsdale, supra.

The present case under its facts should be excepted from the general rule that courts of equity will not interfere with elections. Nor are we concluded upon this point by the case of Vornberg v. Dunn, 143 Ga. 111, 84 S. E. 370. It is true that in that case it appeared that the election held was for a change of the county site to a designated place, and it was claimed that the voters were thereby prohibited from exercising their unrestricted choice as to the place of their preference. But the petition in the case was filed to enjoin the collection of a tax after the Legislature had acted in accordance with the provision of the Constitution and after it had enacted that the county site of Murray County be removed from Spring Place to Chatsworth; and the court did not decide in that case nor pass upon the question of whether or not the declaration of the result of the election should be enjoined, where the election was void and failed to comply with the statute in such cases provided. In the present case steps were taken to enjoin the declaration of the result of the election before that election became a part of or in any way interwoven with a legislative enactment; and in that respect it differs essentially and fundamentally from the case of Gaskins v. Dorsey, 150 Ga. 638, 104 S. E. 433. The decision in that case dealt with a petition for injunction which sought to restrain the publication of a certain proclamation by the Governor, authorizing the qualified voters of the state of Georgia to vote upon a certain proposal of the General Assembly of Georgia to amend the Constitution of the state so as to create a new county, and further to enjoin the Governor from placing upon the official ballots for the election to be held any provision for the ratification or rejection of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, and also to enjoin the Secretary of State from proclaiming the result of any election upon the ratification of the proposed amendment. And this court held that the trial court did not err in refusing to grant the injunction, because, considering the steps necessarily taken in the course of legislation and submission of the proposed amendment to the people, an amendment to the Constitution is in its formative stages until the electorate of the state have cast their ballots thereon in a general election; that, while the amendment is in such formative state and in the course of progression from the proposal to the general election and ratification, it is analogous to ordinary legislation by the General Assembly, which is in its formative state or state of progression from the time of the introduction of a bill until it is finally passed by the requisite constitutional majority and has received the signature of the Governor; that the judicial power will not be exerted, by writ of error or otherwise, to stay the course of legislation while it is in process of enactment; and that this principle is applicable both to ordinary legislation and the analogous course of an amendment to the Constitution from the time of the introduction of the act proposing the amendment until the electors have acted. It will be readily seen that there is a fundamental difference between the case of Gaskins v. Dorsey, supra, and the present case. The election in the present case, while it might become the basis of action by the General Assembly, had in no way become a part of the legislative enactment, but the petitioners acted promptly and attacked the election in limine. And though the election was held at the time and places specified in the order, no injunction having been granted to restrain the election, the court should have granted the injunction prayed against the consolidation of the votes and the declaration of the result, and the refusal of the injunction to restrain the declaration of the result was error.

It necessarily follows from what we have said that the court should not have granted the mandamus requiring the superintendents of the election to declare the result.

Judgment reversed in the first two cases, and affirmed in the third.

GALES v. STOKELEY et al. (No. 2306.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trusts  $\S$  77—Implied trust does not arise from contributions towards purchase price subsequent to conveyance.

A resulting or implied trust which arises solely from the payment of the purchase price of land is not created, unless the purchase money is paid either before or at the time of the purchase. Trusts implied from the payment of the purchase money or a part thereof must result, if at all, at the time of the execution of the conveyance, where there is, in obtaining such conveyance, no fraud or concealment to the injury of the person paying such purchase money. Hall v. Edwards, 140 Ga. 765, 767, 79 S. E. 852, and authorities cited, and see Houston v. Farley, 146 Ga. 822, 824, 92 S. E. 635.

2. Petition properly dismissed.

Accordingly, under the facts alleged, the court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer and in dismissing the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Oglethorpe County: W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Suit by Betsy Gales against E. M. Stokeley and others. Judgment dismissing the petition, and plaintiff brings errors. Affirmed.

The petition makes substantially the following allegations: Prior to April 3, 1879, William A. Alexander contracted to purchase a certain tract of land, but because of advancing age and feeble health he was unable to perform the obligations of the contract. A parol agreement was made between Alexander and his children and stepchildren, whereby his children and stepchildren were to become substituted as purchasers and were to live upon and work the land and pay for the same with the proceeds of their labor, and were each to have an equal undivided interest. For convenience, title was to be taken in the name of the two stepsons, Howard and Jerry White, who were the only male members of the family that were of age. Under the arrangement these two were to have the management of the place. Pursuant to this agreement, a sum sufficient to discharge the purchase money was borrowed upon security of the land, and title to the same was taken in the name of the two stepsons of Alexander, on June 3, 1882. Pursuant to the above-mentioned agreement, the two stepsons and the children of Alexander (including petitioner) entered into possession of the land. On or about January 22, 1901, Jerry White sold his entire interest in the land to Howard White. Petitioner has lived continuously upon and been in possession of a portion of said land. Through the labor of herself, her children, and other persons under her control, and by the delivery to Howard and Jerry White of certain cotton, cotton seed, and corn, and the payment of certain sums of money, she contributed toward the payment of the purchase price at least $100 per annum from the date of the above-mentioned agreement up to and including the year 1917. Through the sale of portions of property and the application of various amounts, which were largely the proceeds of contributions made by petitioner, payment of the purchase price was completed shortly prior to the death of Howard White, which occurred in 1917. Howard White always admitted and recognized petitioner's interest in said property, and often stated to petitioner and others that he would make a legal provision which would protect the rights of petitioner and establish her interest in the property, and during his last illness he promised petitioner and stated to others that he would make a will which would adequately protect her rights, and would devise to her such portion of the property as would compensate her for the contributions made by her; but he died without having made this provision and without having accounted to petitioner for the contributions made by her. Petitioner is illiterate, and, being unable to read or write, she trusted fully Howard White to perform his obligations to her, and did not take from him any receipts, contracts, statements in writing, or other paper evidencing her interest in said land. There has been no administration upon his estate, but his widow and sole heir, Igenia White, has taken possession of all his property and has arranged to sell to Stokeley the property in which petitioner claims an interest. Stokeley has acted with knowledge of petitioner's rights in the premises, and a sale of said property would render the estate of White insolvent.

The prayers are for injunction to restrain the carrying out of the proposed sale or other change in the status of the property; for decree establishing the title of petitioner to one-eighth undivided interest in said land, and fixing the amount of the value of all contributions made and payments rendered by petitioner to Howard and Jerry White, and that the judgment therefor be declared to be a special lien against the property mentioned and all other property belonging to the estate of Howard White; that Howard White be declared to have been a trustee of all of said property for petitioner, subject to be discharged by the conveyance of a one-eighth undivided interest and the payment to her in money of the balance contributed by her over her proportionate share of the purchase price; that all of said property be sold, and distribution of the proceeds be made to petitioner in accordance with the equitable interests and priorities found and decreed in her favor, and to the other persons who may be found to have interests therein; for the appointment of receiver to preserve the status of the property; for general relief and process. There were other allegations and prayers relating to other parties, but these could not be material unless the petition set out a cause of action against Igenia White.

The petition was demurred to generally upon the grounds: (a) want of equity; (b) it fails to set forth a cause of action; (c) the action set forth is based upon a stale demand, and petitioner's rights, if she ever had any, are barred by gross laches and long delay in asserting them; (d) the facts and circumstances alleged are insufficient in equity to raise or create an implied trust; (e) the petition seeks, by an alleged parol agreement, to ingraft upon an absolute and unconditional deed an express trust; (f) it does not appear how much or what part of the purchase price of said lands petitioner contributed in labor and money, and it is impossible for the court to determine what interest she would be entitled to recover; (g) it affirmatively appears that no part of the purchase price of the lands in question was paid or contributed by petitioner at the time of or before the execution of the deed from the original vendor to Howard and Jerry White, and that the said lands were not purchased or paid for with money, labor, or other things of value contributed by the plaintiff. The demurrer was sustained and the petition dismissed, because of which exception was taken by the plaintiff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bills and notes  $\S$  534—Obligations to pay attorney's fees may be enforced in attachment proceedings; "return day."

The statutes prescribing procedure in attachment suits make provision for "a return day" within the meaning of the statute prescribing the conditions on which agreements to pay attorney's fees in addition to the stipulated principal and interest may be enforced; and such agreements may be enforced in an attachment suit under conditions specified in the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Return Day.]

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Action between A. W. Watters & Co., Incorporated, and J. H. O'Neill and others. Judgment for the latter, and the former brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified a question to the Supreme Court. Question answered in the affirmative.

The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following question:

"In attachment proceedings to recover an indebtedness evidenced by promissory notes, is there a day which corresponds to the 'return day' as contemplated in section 4252 of the Civil Code of 1910? In other words, in such a suit, where the notes contained the usual stipulations for the recovery of attorney's fees and where the requirements of the above Code section as to notice have been complied with, and where the plaintiff in attachment is entitled to a common-law judgment in personam against the defendant (the attachment having been abandoned) for the principal and interest sued for, is he entitled also to recover attorney's fees?"

J. Mallory Hunt, of Atlanta, and L. H. Covington and Nathan Harris, both of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

Denny & Wright, of Rome, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. Civil Code, § 4252, declares:

"Obligations to pay attorney's fees upon any note or other evidence of indebtedness, in addition to the rate of interest specified therein, are void, and no court shall enforce such agreement to pay attorney's fees, unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same: Provided, the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent, or attorney notifies the defendant in writing, ten days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought."

While this statute denounces the promise to pay attorney's fees, it does so with the proviso that the obligor shall spare the obligee the necessity of further litigation by paying the amount of principal and interest due under the terms of the contract on or before the "return day" of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of same, if the holder of the obligation shall notify the defendant in writing, 10 days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring the suit and of the term of court to which the suit will be brought. "Suit," as employed in this statute, manifestly contemplates any form of action for recovery of the debt in a court having jurisdiction to render judgment on the demand where there is provision for "a return day." This court has recognized that a proceeding in court by statutory attachment is a suit. Baker v. C. Aultman & Co., 107 Ga. 339, 33 S. E. 423, 73 Am. St. Rep. 132; Fincher v. Stanley Electric Mfg. Co., 127 Ga. 362, 56 S. E. 440. In Davenport v. Richards, 138 Ga. 611, 75 S. E. 648, referring to the above-quoted section of the Code, it was said:

"It is clear that the obligation to pay the attorney's fees was void and could not be enforced, unless the debtor failed to pay the debt

'on or before the return day of the court' in which the proceedings to collect the same were brought. The expression 'return day,' as used in the statute, means the same as filing day, or the last day on which suits may be filed so as to be returnable to the next term. Everett & Son v. First's Sons & Co., 126 Ga. 662, 55 S. E. 916. * * * Two things are necessary to negative the positive legislative declaration that an obligation to pay attorney's fees upon a note or other evidence of indebtedness is void, to wit: Notice by the holder of his intention to bring suit, and of the term of court to which the suit will be brought; and a failure upon the part of the debtor to pay the debt on or before the return day."

Under such construction it was held that the provision for attorney's fees could not be enforced in statutory proceedings for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, there being no provision in the statute for a "return day." The statute relating to foreclosure of chattel mortgages provides for issuance of an execution under which the property shall be levied on (Civil Code, § 3286) and sold, upon the filing with the clerk of court the mortgage or a copy thereof with an affidavit attached as prescribed. It will be perceived that this is a summary remedy, and that the f. fa. is final process which may be levied immediately, without any provision for the holder of the note to give notice as prescribed in Civil Code, § 4252. The statutes providing for suits in attachment are quite different, as will be shown. There are several articles of the Code providing for suits in attachment. The first is in Civil Code, § 5055, which declares:

"Attachments may issue in the following cases: 1. When the debtor resides out of the state. 2. When he is actually removing, or about to remove, without the limits of the county. 3. When he absconds. 4. When he conceals himself. 5. When he resists legal arrest. 6. When he is causing his property to be removed beyond the limits of the state."

Succeeding sections provide how attachments based on such grounds are to be obtained, and procedure for the return and trial of attachment suits. In Civil Code, § 5063, it is declared that, when the amount shall exceed the sum of $100, the attachment shall be made—

"Returnable to the next term of the superior or county court of the county where the defendant resides, or where he last resided; but if such superior court shall sit within twenty days, or such county court shall sit within fifteen days, next after issuing such attachment, it shall be made returnable to the next term of the court thereafter."

Similar provisions are made for the return of attachments to justices' court in cases where the debt does not exceed the sum of $100, except that the limit of time is 10 days before the term to which the case is returnable. Article 3, which commences with Civil Code, § 5083, relates to attachments for purchase money. It provides for the issuance of attachments:

"In all cases of sale of lands, where the vendor has not executed a deed of conveyance to the purchaser for the same, but has given bond for titles or other evidence of the contract, and the purchase money has not been paid, and the vendee shall become liable to attachment, attachment may issue against him at the instance of the vendor, upon complying with the provisions of this Code in relation to attachments."

(The attachment in the case to which the question propounded by the Court of Appeals relates was sued out under this section of the Code.)

In Civil Code, § 5084, provision is made for the issuance of the process of attachment in behalf of any creditor whose debt is created by the purchase of property generally. There is no provision in either section 5083 or section 5084, expressly stating when such attachment suits shall be made returnable; but, referring to those sections, it is said in Civil Code, § 5087, which is the last section in article 8:

"So much of this Code as regulates the proceedings in relation to remedy by attachment, as is not in conflict with the three preceding sections, shall apply to and control proceedings under this article."

This makes the language relating to "return" hereinbefore quoted from Civil Code, § 5063, applicable to such cases. Article 4, which commences with Civil Code, § 5088, refers to attachments against fraudulent debtors. Attachments under this law must also be returned as provided in Civil Code, § 5083, for it is declared in section 5092, referring to attachments against fraudulent debtors:

"Such attachments, when issued and served, shall be returned and disposed of as attachments are now returned and disposed of, and be subject to the same defenses, and may be taken out upon the affidavit of the agent or attorney of the creditor, if he can, by his own oath, make out a case which will satisfy said judge."

The attachments above referred to are in each instance merely mesne process, and never become final until after judgment. They are required to be returned to a court, and procedure is provided for a hearing and disposition of the case in court. As indicated above, the statute prescribes certain numbers of days which must intervene between the issuance of the attachment and the term of court to which it is made returnable, the number of days varying according to the character of the court to which the attachment is returnable, being 20 days when returnable to the superior court, 15 days when returnable to a county court, and 10 days when returnable to the justice's court. This in effect provides for a "return day" as contemplated in Civil Code, § 4252, first hereinabove mentioned in regard to the enforcement of obligations to pay attorney's fees. The "return day" for an attachment suit, within the meaning of that statute as construed in Davenport v. Richards, 138 Ga. 611, 75 S. E. 648, is the last day within which the attachment could be issued, returnable to a given term of the court. While the statutes relating to procedure by attachment differ from Civil Code, § 5562, which relates to the bringing of ordinary suits, they are similar at least to the extent that in each provision is made for a "return day" for issue to be joined, for a full hearing for both parties on the validity and correctness of the claim, and that there is no final process in the case until after judgment. Such being the character of the statute relating to suits by attachment, an agreement expressed in a promissory note to pay attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest stated in the note can be enforced in a suit by attachment under conditions as provided in Civil Code, § 4252. This sufficiently answers the question propounded by the Court of Appeals.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1921.)

1. Wills ~~§~~ 594—Provision in case of death of devisee without "bodily heirs" means children.

James D. Starnes brought suit to recover described land. His petition alleged that in 1906 he married Hattie Stephens, who died in 1909, leaving no children; that the plaintiff is her sole heir at law; that there has never been any administration upon her estate; and that she left no will. The petition further alleged that John R. Stephens, the grandfather of Hattie Stephens, devised the land in question to Hattie Stephens; the material parts of said will being as follows: Item 3: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my beloved wife, Susan Stephens, all of my property of every description, personal and real estate, money, notes, and accounts, to have and to hold, use, and enjoy the same with the income from the same for and during her natural life." Item 4 (in so far as material): "After the death of my said wife I give, bequeath, and devise * * * to my granddaughter, Hattie Stephens," the land in question. Item 7: "Upon the death of my said wife, I desire and direct that all of my personal property, including whatever money in her possession arising from the income from the same, shall be converted into cash, and equally divided among my grandchildren to wit: Savannah Stephens, John F. Stephens, and Hattie Stephens; it being understood that if any of said grandchildren should die without bodily heirs, all the property devised to the one so dying under and by this will shall be equally divided between those that survive." John R. Stephens died in 1905, and Susan Stephens, the life tenant, died on or about December 1, 1918. Held:

"Bodily heirs," or words of similar import, are held to mean children. Civil Code 1910, § 3660; Stanley v. Reeves, 149 Ga. 151, 155, 90 S. E. 378.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bodily Heirs.]

2. Wills §545(4) — Remainderman held to take absolute or defeasible fee dependent on surviving life tenant or dying without bodily heirs.

Under the will Hattie Stephens, wife of the plaintiff, took a remainder in fee, either absolute or defeasible, depending upon whether she survived the life tenant, at whose death the estate vested, or died "without bodily heirs" prior to that event.

3. Wills §634(8)—Heir of remainderman who survived testator, but died before life tenant, held to take nothing.

She survived the testator, but predeceased the life tenant, "without bodily heirs." Accordingly the court did not err in sustaining a general demurrer and dismissing the petition filed by the husband, seeking to recover the land as the sole heir of his wife. Compare Nottingham v. McKelvey, 149 Ga. 463, 100 S. E. 371.

MILLER v. STATE. (No. 2594.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §686(1, 2)—Refusal to permit defendant to reopen case to rebut testimony brought out on cross-examination of state's witness not abuse of discretion; trial judge has large discretion regarding reopening of case.

The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to reopen the case and to admit evidence offered by the accused to show that the deceased was a man of violent character; this evidence having been offered after the state and the defendant had closed and the state had offered evidence in rebuttal of the defendant's evidence, and not being in rebuttal of any new matter brought out by the state.

2. Criminal law §938(1)—Homicide §319 —Newly discovered evidence in murder case held not such as would probably produce different result; applications on ground of newly discovered evidence not favored.

In view of all of the facts appearing on the trial, this court is not reasonably convinced that on another trial there would probably be a different verdict because of the alleged newly discovered evidence.

3. Homicide §171(1) — Refusal to exclude evidence as to conduct of crowd following killing held not error.

Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to rule out the evidence of a witness for the state, as follows: "That a large crowd had gathered around the scene after the homicide had been committed, and tried to prevent movant from leaving the scene, together with officials of the street car company." The criticism was that "it did not illustrate any issue in the case." This ground of the motion does not show error.

4. Homicide §307(4)—Instruction held not to limit jury to consideration of crime of murder.

Error is assigned on the following instruction to the jury: "You are the judges of the law and the facts, and are to render a general verdict of guilty or not guilty." Movant complains that this charge was harmful to him, for the reason that "the charge in the indictment was that of murder, and limited the jury to the consideration of this crime alone; whereas, under the evidence and the law, the crime of voluntary manslaughter was involved." The court fully and fairly instructed the jury in regard to the law of voluntary manslaughter, and explained that under a certain state of facts, if believed by the jury, a verdict finding the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter would be authorized. The exception in this ground of the motion is therefore without merit.

5. Criminal law §922(1) — Instruction concerning duties of jurors and importance of jury trial held not ground for new trial.

Complaint is made that the court erred in a lengthy instruction to the jury regarding the manner of selecting jurors by jury commissioners; how they were drawn for service in the court; that they were not volunteers, but had been drafted for public service to their country as soldiers are drafted for their country's defense; that jury trial is the sheet anchor of American liberty, has stood the test and strain of a thousand years, and has come down to us from our Anglo-Saxon fathers across the seas; stressing the importance of honesty and uprightness in all relations of life, the duty resting upon them to measure up to these high principles, the sanctity of their oaths as to the questions that were propounded to them on the voir dire, and the oath administered upon being sworn to try the case, etc. The criticism is "that this portion of the charge was harmful to him, because it was argumentative and calculated to unduly influence the minds of impartial jurors." While subject to some criticism, at least that it was not indispensable to the issues of the case, we cannot say that the charge contained any misstatements of the law, or untruths, or misconceptions in regard to the moral principles under discussion. We do not think it subject to the specific criticism made by movant, and therefore it will not require a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial.

6. Instruction on reasonable fears held sufficient.

Several of the grounds of the motion for new trial complain of the instructions of the court in regard to the law of voluntary manslaughter. After a careful consideration of these grounds we are satisfied that they contain in substance a fair statement of the law on that subject, and that no error is shown. It would conserve no useful purpose to set out these grounds in full, since no new or novel question is raised. Suffice it to say that the chief criticism is that thereby the accused was deprived of his defense of justification, based on the ground of reasonable fears. The jury was fully instructed in regard to the law of reasonable fears, as provided in Pen. Code 1910, § 71.

7. Criminal law § 761(9) — Instruction that certain facts were undisputed in murder case held not erroneous.

Movant insists that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "The fact that a pistol, held in the hands of the prisoner at the bar, aimed at and towards the deceased, from which bullets were shot, penetrating his body and causing a wound from which he soon thereafter died, is not in fair debate in this case. The pistol was held by him, and its trigger pulled by him, and the man is dead as a consequence." Under a fair construction of all of the evidence and the prisoner's statement, we think these facts are undisputed, and therefore the statement of them by the court was not error. Atkinson, J., dissents.

8. Other grounds of motion.

The remaining grounds of the motion are either expressly abandoned, or are without merit, and therefore show no cause for the grant of a new trial. The evidence authorized the verdict.

Atkinson, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

G. G. Miller was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Cobb & Foster, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., of Atlanta, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen. for the State.

GILBERT, J. [1] 1. Evidence was introduced by the state for the purpose of showing the killing by the accused as alleged in the indictment, and the circumstances attending the same, whereupon the state closed its case. The accused then offered evidence, and made his statement, contending that the same showed a justification for the killing. The state then introduced a witness, Manning, in rebuttal, and on cross-examination by counsel for the accused he testified as follows:

"I have known Bussey approximately four or five years. I know his general character for peacefulness and violence; he was always a peaceful boy. I never saw him in an argument in my life; he didn't drink whisky, that I know of; he wasn't drinking on this occasion, that I know of."

The state again closed its case; whereupon the accused called in his own behalf a witness, D. R. Sewell, and through his counsel propounded the following question:

"Do you know his [F. S. Bussey's] general reputation?"

The court refused to allow the witness to answer the question, making the following statement:

"The state has put in its case and closed. You put in your case and closed the evidence. It is true that I permitted you to ask the witnesses who were on the cross-examination, called in rebuttal, that question. This is a matter of general defense; there is nothing suggestive of rebuttal in it; and to bring in this question at the end of the case doesn't quite seem to be proper, and I'll not admit it."

Counsel for the accused then said:

"Our reply is that we hadn't an opportunity to ask this witness such a question."

Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to allow the witness to answer the question propounded, and in this assignment the following criticism is made:

"Movant insisting that the witness, if permitted to answer, would answer as follows: That 'the reputation of F. S. Bussey for violence was bad; that he was of violent temper, and frequently engaged in fussing and fighting.' Movant shows that this testimony was in rebuttal to that of the state's witness, W. L. Manning, who testified that he had known the said Bussey approximately four or five years, and that he knew his general character for peacefulness and violence, and that he was always a peaceful boy, and that the judge was then and there informed as to what the answer of the witness D. R. Sewell would be if he had allowed him to answer at all."

Assuming, without deciding, that this evidence would have been admissible if offered at the proper time, it was not reversible error to refuse to allow the evidence at the time and under the circumstances detailed above. It was not in response to any new fact brought out by the state in its rebuttal evidence. To permit the defendant, on cross-examination of the state's witness introduced in rebuttal, to bring out new and independent facts not sought by the state, but in response to questions by counsel for the accused, and then to require a reopening of the case to allow defendant to rebut such evidence brought out by him, would be to put it within the power of the latter to arbitrarily prolong the case. Moreover, it would require the court to permit the state thereafter to again open its case for the introduction of further testimony, if obtainable, to meet the new issue thus raised. Had the state brought out in rebuttal new evidence material to the issue, this, of course, would entitle the defendant to an opportunity, if desired, to explain, contradict, or disprove it. It is a well-recognized principle that the trial judge has a large discretion in regard to reopening a case for the introduction of new evidence after both parties have closed their case. In this instance there was no abuse of discretion.

[2] 2. One ground of the motion for new trial was based on alleged newly discovered evidence. The affidavit of the newly found witness, in so far as material to the present consideration, is as follows:

"That on the evening of December 17, 1920, he boarded an Irwin street car at the corner of North Pryor and Houston streets at about 6 o'clock, his destination being the Atlanta Stove Works, which is situated on said car line at the corner of Irwin and Krog streets; that when said car reached the corner of Houston and Courtland streets it stopped; that there was an automobile parked on Houston street at the corner of Courtland, and there were several people congregated around this car; the motorman who was driving the car on which I was riding got off of his car, and went back to where the crowd around the automobile was standing. I heard the driver of the automobile, whom I afterwards learned was Bussey, order the motorman, whom I afterwards learned to be Miller, to go back to his car. Miller replied that he would go back when he got good and ready. I heard some man tell Bussey to go on and get in his car and go on away. Just as Bussey got one foot on the running board of his car, he turned to Miller and said, 'You God damn son of a bitch, I will get you yet.' With that Miller ran to Bussey, and they grappled. Bussey got Miller down over the radiator of his car. I saw Bussey throw a knife to the ground and reach into his hip pocket; when he did that Miller shot him twice. I left the car and went up to within 15 feet of the fight, and plainly heard what happened."

The only new fact is that the witness saw the deceased "throw a knife to the ground." Applications for new trials on account of newly discovered evidence are not favored by the courts. This well-known rule was forcefully and elaborately stated in the case of Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 512, 527. In the opinion the essential facts to be established are stated, and many authorities are cited.

The rule was restated in Young v. State, 56 Ga. 403, where, after stressing the necessity for great caution in the grant of new trials on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it was said:

"Courts are not obliged to grant a new trial for newly discovered evidence, unless they are reasonably convinced that on another trial there would probably be a different verdict."

These principles have been adhered to by this court without deviation. In order to weigh the importance of the newly discovered evidence it is necessary to consider the evidence and the statement of the accused had upon the trial. The evidence developed on the trial showed that a collision occurred between a street car and an automobile which Bussey, the deceased, was driving; and that when another street car, operated by the defendant as motorman, approached the scene of the collision, the defendant got off his car and went around one or two other street cars which were standing between his car and the street car which had collided with the automobile, for the purpose, as he claimed, of assisting in the investigation of the accident; and that the difficulty between the deceased and the defendant then arose, and the shooting followed. That the accused shot and killed Bussey is fully established by the evidence for the defendant, as well as that of the state. The defendant introduced more than one witness who swore to facts substantially in accord with the witnesses for the state, showing these facts beyond controversy. There was conflict only in regard to who brought on the difficulty. The witnesses for the state testified, in substance, that the defendant brought on the difficulty by using vile and profane epithets to the deceased, and when the deceased resented them the accused struck him with his fist, and when the deceased, without a weapon, had engaged the accused in the fight, the accused drew his pistol, which had been concealed on his person, and shot the deceased. The witnesses for the defendant in the main testified that the deceased brought on the difficulty by the use of vile and profane epithets to the accused, and when the accused retorted by similar expressions the deceased assaulted and beat the accused with his fist, and during the fight the accused drew his pistol and shot the deceased. The accused, in his statement, detailed the facts as similar to those stated by the witnesses introduced by him. He also said, among other things, as follows:

"Just as I got up there, this crew got his number; it was leaving, and I turned around, and just as I turned around Bussey came running up to me, cursing me, says, 'You get out from around here; get out.' He says, 'Well, you little consumptive you, I'll spill you all over the street,' and made a threatening motion towards his pocket, which I took to mean that he was fixing to pull out a gun. Well, I put my hand in my overcoat pocket where I kept mine. Now, this car line, where I run on, goes through West Fair, Chestnut street, clean to Lee street, almost to West End avenue. There is nothing out there but negroes, and they have troubled we street car men—I never had any to amount to anything with any of these people—but going out Irwin street we go through a dense negro populated settlement, and I put this in my overcoat pocket, where I can get it; if a man has one where he can't get it, he might as well not have it, the way I always figured it. If you are going to have it, have it where you can get it. And when he begun to talk about making me sell out and run from him and one thing and another, I just kinder stood my ground. I didn't want him to have the satisfaction of running me away from up there. I went up there, perfectly legitimate work for me to go up there on. I thought the distance this car was from the automobile, he had went that distance since he had hit him, it would have been a bad accident."

Nowhere in the evidence, either for the state or for the accused, or in the statement of the accused, does it appear that the accused killed, or claimed to have killed, the deceased in defending himself against the use of a knife by the deceased, or the fear that the deceased would use a knife. It appears without contradiction that the deceased, in the presence of all, had emptied his front pant's pocket, and had assured the accused that he was unarmed, without even a pocket-knife, and asked him to fight it out in their shirt sleeves, without weapons, in a fair manner. The alleged newly discovered testimony shows, if anything, that the deceased intentionally discarded the knife and refused to use it. The accused interposed the defense that the deceased reached toward his hip-pocket, and, acting under the fears of a reasonable man that he was about to draw a pistol, he shot him in his own defense. After a careful consideration of all the facts adduced upon the trial, we are unable to see any reason for the grant of a new trial because of the alleged newly discovered evidence. If a new trial should be granted and the newly discovered evidence should be introduced, it would require a considerable strain of the imagination to conceive of a different verdict in the case on that ground. This is especially true when we consider that part of the statement of the accused quoted above. It is established out of his own mouth that he habitually carried a pistol in the performance of his duty as a motorman on the trolley car where he was employed. Thus he establishes for himself that he belonged to that class of persons who believe it necessary for self-protection to dally carry upon his person a dangerous and deadly weapon in the handling of his passengers. He offered no explanation for this, save that his car traversed a "dense negro populated settlement," and "they have troubled we street car men." This amounts to no excuse whatever. If, on the contrary, it justifies a conductor or motorman on a street car to carry a pistol contrary to the law of the land, citizens otherwise law-abiding are likely to conclude that they must, in travelling on street cars, go armed for self-protection. Furthermore, according to his own words, as quoted above, and as showing his trend of mind, he says:

"I put this [the pistol] in my overcoat pocket, where I can get it; if a man has one where he can't get it, he might as well not have it, the way I always figured it. If you are going to have it, have it where you can get it."

For one entertaining these views nothing is more natural than for his mind unnecessarily and altogether too quickly to arrive at the conclusion that the other man is about to draw a weapon whenever his hand goes toward a pocket. The fact that the accused habitually was armed when on duty challenges the quality of his courage, and the claim that he killed under the fears of a reasonably courageous man. The absolute inadequacy and futility of such justification, standing alone, is shown by Chief Justice Warner in the case of Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 210, 218. There the killing of one who threw his hand to his hip pocket, and under the provocation of vile epithets, was denounced as murder. See, also, Vernon v. State, 146 Ga. 709, 715, 92 S. E. 76.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Appeal and error — 327(4)—Not dismissed for failure to serve party having no interest.

The motion to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that two of the defendants in error were not served, is without merit, as one of them was served, and the other had no interest in the case.

2. Executors and administrators — 76—Tenancy in common — 33—Grantor of undivided interest in consideration of grantor's agreement to pay share of proceeds of sale has no lien or interest; court cannot order receiver to pay general claim of estate of which she is administrator.

The fact that a receiver in an equitable suit holds a fund decreed to belong to an estate which is represented in the case by an administrator will not authorize the court to order the receiver to pay out of such fund the claim of a general creditor of the estate, who has no lien of any character on the fund, nor any interest therein, either legal or equitable.

Error from Superior Court, Rabun County;
J. B. Jones, Judge.

Suit by Henry Talmadge & Co. against W. J. Green and others, in which F. A. Green, administratrix, was made a party, and in which the defendant S. S. Hall, who filed no plea or answer was permitted to intervene after judgment. Judgment in favor of Hall, and the administratrix brings error. Reversed.

On April 1, 1903, W. J. Green and S. S. Hall purchased a described lot of land in Rabun county, and on April 3, gave their note to George L. Prentiss for $4,500, which sum they borrowed from him to be used in paying for the land, and to secure the debt executed to him a mortgage on the premises. On the same day Green and Hall, for an expressed consideration of $4,500, conveyed to Prentiss a one-third undivided interest in the land, subject to the mortgage. On February 4, 1904, a written agreement was executed between Green and Hall as follows:

"This agreement, made this the 4th day of February, 1904, between W. J. Green, of the county of Rabun, state of Georgia, party of the first part, and S. S. Hall, of the county of Rabun, state of Georgia, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the first part, for and in consideration that the party of the second part shall execute to the party of the first part a deed to his one-third undivided interest in lot of land No. 44 in the First land district in said county and state, agrees:

"(1) That as soon as said lot No. 44 in said district and county, or any part thereof, may be sold, the proceeds shall be applied to pay off a certain mortgage note which George L.

Prentiss holds against W. J. Green and S. S. Hall for the sum of $4,500.

"(2) After said note is fully paid off, the said party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part, from the proceeds of said sale, one-third of the amount left after paying off said note, and one-third of all future amounts derived from said sale, until the party of the second part shall have received the amount of $5,000, provided that in no event shall the party of the second part receive more than the said sum of $5,000 from the proceeds of the said sale."

This agreement was signed under the hands and seals of the parties. On the same day Hall, for the expressed consideration of $15,000, conveyed by warranty deed, subject to the Prentiss mortgage a one-third undivided interest in the land to Green. This deed recited:

"The grantee agreeing to satisfy said mortgage from the proceeds of the sale of said lot No. 44 and First district."

On June 13, 1910, Prentiss transferred the note and mortgage to Henry Talmadge & Co., and on February 27, 1911, Talmadge & Co. instituted statutory proceedings against Green and Hall to foreclose the mortgage. Green filed an answer setting up an equitable defense, in which he claimed, among other things, that in a settlement with Prentiss the latter had agreed to pay off the mortgage. Prentiss was thereupon made a party defendant. Hall filed no plea or answer. Green died pending the suit, and the administratrix of his estate, his widow, was made a party in his stead. On the trial, February 28, 1917, a verdict was rendered as follows:

"We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, Henry Talmadge & Co., against the defendant George L. Prentiss as indorser and transferee [transferor] of the note sued on, the sum of forty-five hundred ($4,500) dollars principal, thirty-four hundred and thirty-four dollars and thirty-seven cents ($3,434.37) interest to date, seven hundred and ninety-three dollars and forty-four cents ($793.44) attorney's fees, with costs of suit. We further find that George L. Prentiss is the owner of one undivided one-half interest in the lands covered by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed in this suit, and that said mortgage be foreclosed against said undivided one-half interest. We further find that the estate of W. J. Green is the owner of one undivided one-half interest in said land, which is not subject to the lien of said mortgage. We further find that Charles A. Rafter has no interest in said land."

On the following day, and at the same term of the court, Hall presented his intervention, setting up the contract between him and Green, which is quoted above, alleging that no part of the sum of $5,000 due him thereunder had been paid, and that—for an equitable adjustment of the rights of all the parties, he therefore prays that his lien be set up in the formation of the decree in this case, and that his said lien for the sum of $5,000 be decreed as a purchase-money lien against the administratrix of said W. J. Green, and against said property, to be paid out of the proceeds of a sale of said W. J. Green's interest, and for such other relief as he may be entitled to in the premises; and further, that this case be kept open until after said sale."

The court by order allowed the intervention and ordered that the case be kept open until after the sale of the property and the final adjudication of the rights of the parties. Mrs. Green, administratrix, excepted pendente lite to the order granted on the intervention. On May 23, 1918, a decree was entered in accordance with the verdict. By agreement of counsel for all parties a receiver was appointed to sell the entire property, the interest of both plaintiffs and of Green's estate. Mrs. Green, the administratrix of the estate of her husband, was appointed receiver. The property was sold by the receiver in November, 1919, for the sum of $15,000, and she received the proceeds of the sale. In August, 1920, Hall's intervention came on for trial, and the case was by consent submitted to the court for decision without a jury. The judge rendered a judgment in favor of Hall for $5,000, less some deductions for costs to be paid out of the sum of $7,500, which was one-half of the proceeds of the sale belonging to the estate of Green. Mrs. Green, as administratrix, excepted to the judgment, and assigned error also upon her exceptions pendente lite.

Defendants in error moved in this court to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that neither Prentiss nor Charles A. Rafter, both of whom were alleged to be substantial parties defendant, was served with the bill of exceptions, nor had they acknowledged service thereon.

R. E. A. Hamby, of Atlanta, and Thad L. Bynum, of Clayton, for plaintiff in error.

McMillan & Erwin, of Clarksville, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The motion to dismiss is without merit, as Prentiss, a nonresident, appears to have been served as provided in Civil Code 1910, § 6161. And it was decided in Rafter v. Henry Talmadge & Co., 147 Ga. 407, 94 S. E. 229, that Rafter had no interest in the subject-matter of this litigation.

[2] 2. A vendor has no equitable lien for the purchase money of lands in this state. Civil Code 1910, § 3873. Hall, under the terms of the contract he had with Green, at the time he conveyed to the latter his one-third interest in the land in question, had no lien, either at law or in equity, on the land or the proceeds of the sale thereof by Green. Nor did he have any interest or claim to the land, equitable or otherwise, nor in the proceeds of its sale. He conveyed his entire interest in the property to Green, with warranty of title, except as to the Prentiss mortgage, in consideration that Green was to pay him one-third of the proceeds of the sale of the land, provided the amount to be paid should not exceed $5,000. Hall held merely a written obligation against the estate of Green, as evidenced by the contract. The court erred in adjudging that the receiver should pay to Hall the amount of his claim out of the fund in the hands of the receiver belonging to Green's estate. Spence v. Solomons Co., 129 Ga. 31, 58 S. E. 463. See, also, Atlanta & Carolina Ry. Co. v. Carolina Portland Cement Co., 140 Ga. 650, 79 S. E. 555; Gartrell v. McCravey, 144 Ga. 249, 86 S. E. 932. The administratrix of that estate was entitled to such fund, and the fact that she was the court's receiver did not deprive her of the right to have the fund awarded to her to be administered by her as administratrix. The matter stands exactly, in this respect, as if another had been the receiver, and she, as administratrix, were contending for the fund. Equity will not interfere with the regular administration of estates upon an application of any person interested therein or having a claim against it except where there is danger of loss or other injury to his interests. BARFIELD v. BIRRICK. (No. 2183.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1921.)

1. Ejectment  $\Rightarrow$  81, 110—Issue arising on pleadings stated; not error to charge that question is one of boundary.

The issue in ejectment, or in statutory complaint for land, arising upon the declaration and plea of not guilty, is: Did the plaintiff at the date suit was commenced have a legal title to the premises, or to any estate or interest in them, or any part thereof, coupled with the then present right of entry as against the defendant? Nevertheless, where it appears that the plaintiff and the defendant are coterminal owners, and that both derive title from a common grantor, it is not erroneous for the court to instruct the jury that the question resolves itself into one of boundary, and to fail to instruct them that the plaintiff in order to recover must show title in himself to the premises.

2. Boundaries  $\S$  37(5), 41, 46(1)—Unascertained or disputed boundary may be established by executed parol agreement; instruction not erroneous for failure to charge that boundary must be unascertained where evidence showed fact; evidence held to warrant finding that agreement was executed.

An unascertained or disputed boundary line between coterminous proprietors may be established by parol agreement, if the agreement be accompanied by actual possession to the agreed line, or is otherwise duly executed. The failure of the court to instruct the jury that the line must be unascertained or disputed is not error requiring the grant of a new trial, where, as in this case, the evidence shows unequivocally that the boundary line between the coterminous proprietors was in fact unascertained.

3. New trial  $\S$  108(2)—Newly discovered evidence that boundary monument was placed pending suit held not to require new trial.

The alleged newly discovered evidence is not of such character as would likely produce a different result on another trial. The evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action by Joseph Birrick against H. L. Barfield. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Thomas S. Felder, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

L. D. Moore, of Macon, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. Joseph Birrick filed his suit against H. L. Barfield, to recover a strip of land, irregular in shape, running north and south along the western boundary of a tract owned by the plaintiff, as shown by a diagram attached to the petition. By an amendment the plaintiff described the land as a strip located between the line of an old wire fence built by C. M. Orr (one of the plaintiff's predecessors in title) and a new fence built by the defendant, and varying in width from a point to 22 feet, as shown by the diagram attached. On the trial of the case the jury found for the plaintiff "the premises in dispute." The defendant made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. In addition to the usual general grounds—that is to say, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it, is decidedly and strongly against the weight of the evidence, and is contrary to law and the principles of equity and justice—the motion for new trial contains nine grounds. Eliminating for the moment the general grounds, three questions are raised. In two grounds of the motion exceptions are taken to certain charges of the court. In effect the court instructed the jury that the controlling question in the case was the location of the boundary line between the lands owned by the plaintiff and the lands owned by the defendant in the suit. It is insisted that the controlling issue in the case was one of title, and that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show by preponderance of the evidence that he had legal title to the premises in dispute. In another ground of the motion error is assigned upon the court's failure to instruct the jury that before the plaintiff could recover he must show title in himself to the land. It is elementary that a plaintiff in ejectment, or in an action for land, must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of that of his adversary. The issue is: Did the plaintiff at the date the suit was commenced have legal title to the premises or to any estate or interest in them, or any part thereof, coupled with the then present right of entry, as against the defendant. It is also settled that on the general issue the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff. Civil Code,  $\S$  5582; Fullbright v. Neely, 131 Ga. 342 (8), 62 S. E. 188; Taylor v. Meeks, 133 Ga. 385, 65 S. E. 850. These general principles are applicable in an action for land, though the particular question between the parties resolves itself, under the evidence, into one of boundary. Nevertheless we are of the opinion that the assignments of error indicated above are without merit, in view of the following: By the fourth item of Mrs. Lockett's will, probated and admitted to record in 1888, the testatrix devised her plantation to her two nephews, William D. and John W. Mims, "to be divided between my two nephews William D. and John W., so that each shall have an equal number of acres, the dividing line to begin at the gate that is between me and the Jas. T. Nisbet's woods near where the ginhouse formerly stood, and to run in a northerly direction below my spring and through the Bivins field to R. E. Bowman's line in such a way that each division of the place so divided shall contain the same number of acres," the half lying east of the dividing line to go to William D. Mims and the half lying west of said line to belong to John W. Mims. It appeared without dispute that William and John Mims agreed upon a dividing line, and that the same was surveyed and marked out by the county surveyor under their direction. In January, 1893, William sold his half to C. M. Orr and J. W. Cabaniss, and Orr built a wire fence the entire length of the line. John was then living on his half of the land and saw the fence being built, and himself testified that he thought the fence was on the line, that he knew it was at one end, and supposed it followed the line all the way. He further testified that upon the completion of the fence he connected his fence, using the fence built by Orr as the line fence on the north side of his place, and that on the south side of the place he cultivated up to the fence on the west side and Orr cultivated up to the fence on the east side, and this continued from 10 to 12 years, during which time Mims and Orr recognized the fence as the dividing line between them. Orr and Cabaniss conveyed the land purchased from William Mims to the Exchange Bank; and the bank, through its receivers, conveyed the land to Wright in 1907, and Wright took possession in January, 1908. Wright conveyed to the plaintiff and surrendered possession in January, 1918. John Mims conveyed his portion of the land to Wright on December 20, 1912, the deed reciting that the land conveyed was bounded on the east "by land of C. M. Orr, or formerly C. M. Orr." Wright thus became the owner of both the William Mims and John Mims lands. Wright conveyed the John Mims tract to the plaintiff in error, Barfield, the deed reciting that the tract conveyed was bounded on the east "by lands formerly owned by C. M. Orr, but now owned by W. H. Wright." The grantor in this deed, Wright, testified that when he sold to Birrick he told him that the old wire fence (built by Orr) was the line. It will thus be seen that both the plaintiff and the defendant claim under the will of Mrs. Lockett, as common grantor. Mrs. Lockett devised the east half of her plantation to William D. Mims. Title to the east half of the land passed by mesne conveyances to the plaintiff. The west half of the plantation was devised to John W. Mims, and title to the west half passed by mesne conveyances to the defendant (plaintiff in error). It was therefore not erroneous to instruct the jury that the question for them to determine is: "What is the true dividing line between these two tracts of land?" (the charge excepted to). In view of the evidence in this case it is manifest that the failure of the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show title in himself, is not error requiring the grant of a new trial.

[2] 2. In four other grounds exceptions are taken to certain charges of the court relating to the establishment of a dividing line by coterminous landowners: (1) By parol agreement accompanied by possession to the agreed line, or otherwise duly executed; and (2) by acquiescence for seven years by acts or declarations of the owners of adjoining land, as provided in the Civil Code, § 3821. It is settled that an unascertained or disputed boundary line between coterminous proprietors may be established by parol agreement, if the agreement be accompanied by actual possession to the agreed line, or is otherwise duly executed. Farr v. Woolfolk, 118 Ga. 277, 280, 45 S. E. 230; Osteen v. Wynn, 131 Ga. 209 (3), 62 S. E.

37, 127 Am. St. Rep. 212; Gornato v. Wilson, 141 Ga. 597 (2), 81 S. E. 860. In effect the court instructed the jury that, if William D. Mims and John W. Mims agreed upon a dividing line, and if the line as agreed upon was surveyed, marked out, and recognized by them, the line thus established would be binding upon the parties and their subsequent grantees. It is insisted that the charge was error because the court failed to instruct the jury that the line must have been unsettled or disputed. Mrs. Lockett owned a single tract of land. By her will she devised the east half of the tract to William Mims and the west half to John Mims, and directed the manner of its division. It is true that there was no dispute concerning the will or its meaning. In Shiver v. Hill, 148 Ga. 616, 97 S. E. 676, the trial court instructed the jury that a parol agreement between coterminous landowners as to the boundary line between them would operate to establish a line, where the boundary line is "unascertained, unsettled, and not agreed to between the parties, and is disputed." The charge was held not to be error requiring the grant of a new trial. The writer dissented, regarding the dispute as a "false quantity." It appears that in the principle of law announced the court was not really in disagreement. The majority regarded a boundary line which was in fact uncertain or unascertained as in dispute, considering the words "uncertain," "unascertained," and "disputed" as practically synonymous, while the writer thought the language of the trial court in that case was misleading, inasmuch as the evidence showed that the owners of distinct portions of a single tract of land, by parol agreement, undertook to fix or establish an original dividing line between them. The true rule is clearly stated in the opinion of Osteen v. Wynn, supra, where it was said:

"Where there is room for controversy as to the location of a dividing line, the coterminous proprietors, independently of the cited Code section, may orally agree upon the line; and if the agreement is accompanied by possession to the agreed line, or is otherwise duly executed, such agreement will be valid and binding, and the line thus defined will thereafter control their deeds."

Inasmuch as the evidence in the record shows unequivocally that the dividing line between the east and west halves of the Lockett plantation was in fact unascertained, the failure of the court to instruct the jury that the parol agreement, if duly executed, would bind the parties provided the line was indefinite, uncertain, or disputed, is not error requiring the grant of a new trial.

Under the evidence in the record the jury was authorized to find, if indeed they were not required to find, that the parol agreement was duly executed. See Hart v. Carter, 150 Ga. 289, 103 S. E. 457.

[3] 3. On the trial of the case the plaintiff testified that the north end of the line between his land and the land of the defendant was marked by an iron post. After verdict, the defendant, as he contends, discovered that the iron post had been "placed" by the plaintiff after the suit was begun, for the purpose of furnishing false evidence of the line between his land and that of the defendant. In the last two grounds of the motion a new trial is prayed because of this newly discovered evidence. Section 5961 of the Civil Code provides that—

"Any judgment, verdict, rule, or order of court, which may have been obtained or entered up, shall be set aside * * * if it shall appear that the same was entered up in consequence of corrupt or willful perjury," and "it shall be the duty of the court in which such verdict, judgment, rule, or order was obtained or entered up to cause the same to be set aside upon motion and notice to the adverse party; but it shall not be lawful for the said court to do so, unless the person charged with such perjury shall have been thereof duly convicted, and unless it shall appear to the said court that the said verdict, judgment, rule, or order could not have been obtained and entered up without the evidence of such perjured person."

It is not claimed that the plaintiff in this case has been convicted of perjury. The newly discovered evidence is cumulative and impeaching in character. The plaintiff's testimony was not essential to his case. On the controlling issues in the case other evidence is of such character as to practically demand a verdict for the plaintiff, and it cannot be said that the newly discovered evidence would likely produce a different result on another trial.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  523(2), 524—Affidavits and documents must be incorporated in bill of exceptions or attached as exhibits.

"Affidavits and documents introduced in evidence on the hearing before the trial judge must be incorporated in the bill of exceptions seeking to review his judgment, or attached thereto as exhibits, duly and properly identified, or be embraced in an approved brief of evidence and brought up as record. The mere filing of affidavits and documents in the office of the clerk of the court does not make them parts of the record in the case." Anderson v. Anderson, 124 Ga. 147, 52 S. E. 161; Scott v. Wage Earners' Loan, etc., Co., 147 Ga. 576, 94 S. E. 1021; Weathers v. Paga Mining Co., 147 Ga. 463, 94 S. E. 579.

2. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  713(1)—Copies of affidavits and documents not part of record not considered.

"Where the questions made by the assignments of error in the bill of exception necessarily involve a consideration of the evidence, and none of the methods above indicated has been adopted, but copies of affidavits and documents have been sent up as parts of the record, they cannot be considered." Anderson v. Anderson, supra.

3. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  684(3)—Judgment not disturbed when evidence not authenticated.

The bill of exceptions assigns error on a judgment granting an interlocutory injunction, and recites that "said case was heard upon affidavits and three plats and one deed." The plaintiffs in error specified, "as material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, the following parts of the record, to wit: "The petition, the temporary restraining order, answer of defendants, certain affidavits, deeds, plats, and map, certified copy of the minutes of the city of Manassas, and the judgment continuing in force the restraining order originally passed. The bill of exceptions did not otherwise refer to any evidence submitted at the hearing. The clerk transmitted copies of certain affidavits and other documentary evidence which were not made a part of the bill of exceptions by reference or exhibit, nor were they set forth in any brief of evidence approved by the court. The judge certified that the bill of exceptions was true, and that it specified all of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and ordered that the parts of the record so specified be transmitted to the Supreme Court; but the certificate contained no reference to any evidence introduced at the hearing. Held: It affirmatively appears from the bill of exceptions that the case was one involving a consideration of the evidence; and, no evidence having been brought up so authenticated as to authorize its consideration by this court, the judgment of the trial court will not be disturbed. Pierce v. Felts, 146 Ga. 716, 92 S. E. 212.

FISH, C. J. On January 7, 1871, Stephen A. Corker conveyed a described tract of land to Augustus H. A. Bell "as trustee of Elizabeth C. Bell, wife of Isaiah A. Bell, and their children born or to be born." The habendum clause was:

"To have and to hold [said land] for the sole and separate use of said Elizabeth C. Bell and her said children, during her natural life and the life of the said Isaiah A. Bell, if he should survive her; and at her death, then for the use of the said Isaiah A. Bell and children born or to be born, and after the death of the said Elizabeth C. and Isaiah A., then to such children as they may leave surviving them, share and share alike, * * * to have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land, and all and singular the premises and appurtenances thereunto belonging, as aforesaid, and every part thereof, unto the said party of the second part as such trustee, and his successors in office."

Isaiah A. Bell and Elizabeth C. Bell had only two children born to them, Henry Bell and Fannie Bell, who became Mrs. Fannie Brinson, both of whom were in life at the time of the execution of the deed. Isaiah A. Bell died in 1906; his wife, Elizabeth C., and the two children, surviving him. Henry Bell died in 1911, leaving several children surviving. Mrs. Elizabeth C. Bell died in 1918. Mrs. Fannie Brinson is still in life. The children of Henry Bell brought this action against Mrs. Fannie Brinson for a partition of the land embraced in the aforementioned deed, the petitioners contending that under the terms of the deed they were entitled to a half interest in the land. The case was submitted to the judge for a decision without a jury, on an agreed statement of facts as above set forth. The judge on the trial refused the relief prayed, and decreed the title to the land to be in Mrs. Brinson. The petitioners excepted.

The ruling was not error. In accordance with the unambiguous terms of the deed, viz., that "after the death of the said Elizabeth C., and Isaiah A., then [the land to go] to such children as they may have surviving them, share and share alike," Mrs. Fannie Brinson, the only child left surviving them, is entitled to an estate in fee in all the land to the exclusion of the children of her brother, Henry, who died after the death of his father, Isaiah, but prior to the death of his mother Elizabeth. *Luquire v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1921.)

1. Constitutional law  $\S$  251, 268—Criminal law  $\S$  635—Exclusion of spectators in rape case not in violation of Constitution; statute not unconstitutional as construed and applied; federal constitutional amendments inapplicable to states; court in excluding spectators not limited to grounds specified in motion.

Where, on the trial of one accused of rape, it is made to appear to the court that the female alleged to have been raped, on account of her youth and highly nervous condition, is unable to give her testimony before a crowd of spectators, and that the due administration of justice is thereby impeded, the trial judge may clear the courtroom, during the examination of the female, of all persons except court officials, the jurors on the panel, the defendant, his counsel, his father, brother, and two sisters, the prosecutrix, her counsel, relatives of the prosecutrix, disinterested members of the bar, and representatives of the press, without infringing upon defendant's right to a public trial, as guaranteed by article 1,  $\S$  1, par. 5, of the Constitution of this state, or without violating the defendant's right to due process of law as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

(a) Civ. Code 1910,  $\S$  5885, which provides, "During the trials in the superior courts, and all other courts and trials occurring in this state, of any case of seduction or divorce, or other case where the evidence is vulgar and obscene, or relates to the improper acts of the sexes, and tends to debase the morals of the young, the presiding judge shall have the right, in his discretion and on his own motion, or on motion of plaintiffs or defendants or their attorneys, to hear and try the said case after clearing the courtroom of all or any portion of the audience," as construed and applied by the trial judge in the case at bar, is not violative of article 1, § 1, par. 5, of the Constitution of this state, which declares that "every person charged with an offense against the laws of this state \* \* \* shall have a public \* \* \* trial."

(b) The provision of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," and the provision of the Sixth Amendment to that Constitution, which declares that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed," etc., refer to powers exercised by the government of the United States, and not to those of the individual states.

2. Criminal law §1169(9)—Permitting victim of rape to testify that she did not consent held not to require a new trial.

The objection to the evidence of the female alleged to have been raped, that she did not indirectly consent to sexual intercourse, the objection being that the witness cannot draw a conclusion without stating the facts upon which the same is based, is without merit, where it appears that the witness had already stated the facts fully upon which her statement was based.

3. Criminal law §825(2)—Further Instructions as to consent should have been requested on trial for rape.

More elaborate instructions, if desired, on the question of consent, should have been specifically requested, in view of the general charge and the defendant's contention that he did not have carnal knowledge of the female alleged to have been raped, either with or without her consent.

4. Criminal law §683(1, 2)—Admission of evidence not in rebuttal after defendant rests is discretionary; evidence held proper in rebuttal.

After the defendant has made his statement and rested his case, the admission of evidence not in rebuttal of defendant's statement is a matter in the sound discretion of the court.

(a) The evidence examined, and held to be in rebuttal of the defendant's statement.

5. Criminal law §555, 795(1), 824(3)—Court should charge on included offense when conviction thereof authorized; failure without request to charge on included offense not ground for new trial, when evidence authorizes conviction as charged; evidence held to excuse failure; jury cannot arbitrarily reject part of testimony.

Where a charge of an offense of graver character includes (without additional averment) a minor offense, it is the duty of the trial judge to instruct the jury upon the law applicable to the lesser offense, where the evidence under any view thereof will authorize a conviction of the lesser offense. Where, however, the evidence, if credible, proves the completed offense as charged in the indictment, the failure of the judge, without appropriate request, to instruct the jury upon the law applicable to the lesser offense, is not cause for new trial, though the jury would have been authorized to convict of the lesser offense in view of the defendant's statement.

(a) The evidence examined, and held to prove, if credible, the offense of rape as charged in the indictment, and sufficient, in connection with other evidence in the record, to support the verdict.

GEORGE, J. The defendant was indicted for the offense of rape at the May term, 1920, of Glynn superior court. He was put upon his trial on July 21, 1920, at the May adjourned term, and the jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of the offense of rape, with a recommendation to mercy, fixing the penalty at from 10 to 20 years in the penitentiary. The defendant filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

The female alleged to have been raped did not formally appear as prosecutrix, but for convenience she will be so referred to. The prosecutrix was 16 years of age on January 27, 1920, before the commission of the alleged crime on March 31, 1920. She was about 5 feet in height and weighed only 100 pounds. For some time she had been employed as cashier in a retail drug store, and was usually on duty until 10 o'clock in the evenings. She had met the defendant at the home of a friend, a few days before the night of March 31, 1920. The conduct of the defendant on this occasion was entirely proper. On a few occasions thereafter he spoke to her pleasantly in the drug store. On the night of March 31, 1920, he drove his automobile to the drug store and asked the prosecutrix if he might drive her home. She accepted the invitation, and at ten o'clock he returned for her. Instead of driving directly to prosecutrix's home, the defendant took her around what is known as "the Boulevard." On the drive he requested her to remove her gloves, and she removed the glove from the hand nearer the defendant. He attempted to hold her hand and she objected. At a point on the roadway he stopped the automobile, threw his arms around the prosecutrix, and, according to her testimony, had sexual intercourse with her, forcibly and against her will. The defendant then drove the prosecutrix to her home. They reached home about 15 minutes to 11 o'clock. Prosecutrix's mother met her at the door and asked where she had been. She replied that she did not know, and the defendant made a like reply. The prosecutrix said to her mother, "Mother, this is Mr. Moore," calling the defendant by his name, but not intending (as prosecutrix contended) to introduce the defendant. He shook hands with the mother and bade the prosecutrix good-bye with the statement that he would see her the next day. Just as the mother closed the door, the prosecutrix said to her, "Mother, he has ruined me." The prosecutrix's father was not at the time at home, although she had stated to the defendant that her father was at home, and that if she told him what had happened he would kill the defendant. Her father returned home at 11 o'clock; and the family physician was immediately called to administer to the prosecutrix. The physician testified that he saw the prosecutrix within an hour or two after the commission of the alleged offense, and that he found an abrasion on her knee, a torn or ruptured hymen, oozing of blood, bruised mucous membrane, and that there was blood and a starchy fluid having the appearance of semen on her underclothes. The blood upon the prosecutrix's clothes was not caused by menstrual discharges, according to the testimony of the physician, the prosecutrix, and the mother. The defendant rested his case upon his statement. He said that he took prosecutrix to ride; that she put her arm around him in the car; that he kissed her and pinched her thigh without objection from her; and that he suggested sexual intercourse, but that she stated to him that if she should consent he would not speak to her again. Whereupon, according to the defendant's statement, he replied that if she believed him to be that kind of a man he would take her home. He denied having sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix either with or against her consent. He also stated that when she reached home she formally introduced him to the mother, and that he engaged in conversation with the mother and the prosecutrix, finally bidding the prosecutrix good-bye with the statement that he would see her the following morning, and that he did in fact drive by her home early the next morning, and saw and spoke to her. The foregoing are the main facts in the case; but the evidence of the prosecutrix relating to the conduct of the defendant at the time of the alleged assault upon her, and the nature, character, and extent of the assault and injury to her person, will be set out more at length in the consideration of the special assignments of error.

[1] 1. After the jury was impaneled, special counsel for the prosecution moved that the courtroom be cleared of all parties except officers of court, bailiffs, constables, and parties directly interested, at least during the taking of the testimony of the prosecutrix and possibly of her mother. In making the motion counsel stated:

"We are making this request due to the extreme youth of this young woman, and our information both from her people and physicians as to her extremely nervous state; and we deem it almost essential, in order that she may go through this investigation, that the public be excused."

To this motion counsel for the defendant objected, upon the ground that the defendant was entitled to a fair and public trial under the Constitution, but stated that they had no objection to the exclusion from the courtroom of minors and females not connected with the case. The court ruled that he would clear the courtroom of every person except "officers of court and parties at interest." All persons, except "the officers of court, defendant's father and two sisters, one brother, the jury trying said case and the members of the bar, relatives of the prosecutrix and newspaper reporters," were thereupon excluded, by direction of the court, from the room during the taking of the testimony. To this order and ruling of the court the defendant excepted, upon the grounds: (1) That the court acted arbitrarily, without hearing evidence concerning the age and condition of the prosecutrix, and the nature and character of the evidence to be given upon the trial; and (2) that the order of the court was too sweeping, and deprived the defendant of a public trial, as guaranteed him by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of Georgia. Particular reference is made to the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides, among other things, that no person shall be deprived of "life, liberty, or property, without due process of law"; to the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides, "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed"; to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"; and to article 1, § 1, par. 5, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia, which provides that "every person charged with an offense against the laws of this state * * * shall have a public and speedy trial by an impartial jury." In this connection section 5885 of the Civil Code of 1910, which reads as follows: "During the trials in the superior courts, and all other courts and trials occurring in this state, of any case of seduction or divorce, or other case where the evidence is vulgar and obscene, or relates to the improper acts of the sexes, and tends to debauch the morals of the young, the presiding judge shall have the right, in his discretion and on his own motion, or on motion of plaintiffs or defendants or their attorneys, to hear and try the said case after clearing the courtroom of all or any portion of the audience"—is declared to be unconstitutional because violative of the provisions contained in the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and to the provision of the Constitution of this state quoted above.

The provisions of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States do not affect the case. It is settled that the first ten amendments to that Constitution refer to powers exercised by the government of the United States, and not to those of the individual states. Loeb v. Jennings, 133 Ga. 796 (3), 67 S. E. 101, 18 Ann. Cas. 373, and cases cited in the opinion. Nor is the case affected by the due-process clause contained in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. See Loeb v. Jennings, supra, headnotes 3, 7, and corresponding divisions of the opinion. Although we are of the opinion that no federal question is involved in the case, we hold that the act and order of the court in excluding the spectators as complained of in this case is not violative of the due-process clause (Fourteenth Amendment) of the Constitution of the United States. Provisions respecting a public trial, similar to that of our Constitution above quoted, are found in the federal Constitution, as we have seen, and in the Constitutions of the states, with the exception of New York, so far as we are advised. It was said by Spear, J., in the case of State v. Hensley, 75 Ohio St. 263, 79 N. E. 463, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 280, 116 Am. St. Rep. 736, 9 Ann. Cas. 111, that—

"The necessity for such provisions arose from the flagrant abuses which disgraced some of the courts of England prior to our American Revolution."

Reference to the Court of Star Chamber is generally made, though it would seem that the secrecy of the trial in the Court of Star Chamber was not the primary cause which led to its abolition by the Long Parliament in 1641. 16 Charles I, c. 10. The name, origin and jurisdiction of this court are involved in more or less obscurity. It is certain that it was an ancient high court exercising wide civil and criminal jurisdiction. It consisted of the king's privy counsel sitting as a court only, with the addition of certain judges. It sat without the intervention of a jury. It could proceed on mere rumor. The procedure adopted was that of the courts of chancery. Though at one time highly regarded, it finally resorted to the practices of the Spanish Inquisition, and could and did administer torture. It is doubtless true that some of the trials in this court were conducted in secret. It is certain that the accused was not entitled to a jury; that he was not entitled to know his accuser; that he was not entitled to be confronted with the witnesses against him, because the witnesses were examined by interrogatories, as was the practice in the chancery courts, and not in person in open court. Exercising the prerogative of the crown, it could define and punish offenses (including political and press offenses) not recognized by the common law. See 1 Holdsworth's (W. S.) History of English Law, 271 et seq.; Jenks' Short History of English Law, 166 et seq. Be this as it may, provisions respecting a public trial similar to that of our Constitution quoted above, were undoubtedly made to protect the rights of persons accused of crime. No universal rule applicable to all situations has, however, been stated. It is said in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (6th Ed.) 379:

"It is also requisite that the trial be public. By this is not meant that every person shall in all cases be permitted to attend criminal trials; because there are many cases where, from the character of the charge and the nature of the evidence by which it is to be supported, the motives to attend the trial on the part of a portion of the community would be of the worst character, and where a regard to public morals and public decency would require that at least the young be excluded from hearing and witnessing the evidence of human depravity which the trial must necessarily bring to light. The requirement of a public trial is necessarily for the benefit of the accused, that the public may see that he is fairly dealt with and not unjustly condemned, and that the presence of interested spectators may keep his triers keenly alive to a sense of their responsibility and to the importance of their functions; and the requirement is fairly observed if, without partiality or favoritism, a reasonable proportion of the public is permitted to attend, notwithstanding that those persons whose presence could be of no service to the accused, and who would only be drawn thither by a prurient curiosity, are excluded altogether."

In Myers v. State, 97 Ga. 76 (5), 77, 25 S. E. 252, 253, it was held:

"While every person accused of crime is entitled to a public trial, it is not necessary to its legality that a great multitude should be in attendance, and the presiding judge should not permit the bar or courtroom to become so crowded as to impede the progress of the trial by rendering it difficult for the jurors to enter or leave the box, or by preventing the free movement of counsel and witnesses; more—over, the jury should not be in such close and constant contact with the audience as that remarks of bystanders as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, or other indications of public feeling for or against him, may reach their ears or come under their observation. The bar at least should at all times be kept sufficiently open and clear for the prompt and orderly dispatch of the business of the court."

The exception there considered was not taken to the action of the judge in excluding the spectators who overcrowded the courtroom but to his refusal to exclude them.

In Tilton v. State, 5 Ga. App. 59, 62 S. E. 651, it was held:

"Every person accused of crime is entitled to a public trial. The presiding judge, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may, without violating this right, exclude from the courtroom during the trial, for any sufficient special reason, such portion of the spectators as fall within the class to which the reason applies. However, where the judge, without further reason than that the testimony will relate to matters ordinarily indecent to be mentioned, orders, over the objection of the defendant, that 'the courtroom be cleared of every one not connected with the case,' he abuses his discretion and violates the defendant's right to a public trial. Prejudice to the defendant is conclusively to be presumed from such an order, and a new trial necessarily results."

In the opinion by Judge Powell, section 5385 of the Civil Code is quoted, but it is pointed out that no attack upon the constitutionality of the statute was made. The whole question for decision in that case was: "Did the judge abuse his discretion?" The conclusion reached by the Court of Appeals, broadly stated, is that the accused may insist upon the trial being absolutely open and public except in so far as there is some sufficient reason for excluding certain persons or classes of persons. Judge Powell cites and discusses a number of cases from other jurisdictions. Among the cases cited is that of State v. Hensley, supra. That was a rape case, and the trial judge, in view of the testimony to be given by witnesses continued the trial during the taking of the testimony in a small courtroom to which no one was admitted except the jury, defendant's counsel, members of the bar, newspaper reporters, and one witness for the defendant. It was held that the order of the court exceeded its power in the premises, and that the enforcement of the order was a denial to the defendant of his constitutional right to a public trial. Other cases cited in the opinion in the Tilton Case, supporting in principle the ruling made in State v. Hensley, supra, are: People v. Hartman, 103 Cal. 242, 37 Pac. 153, 42 Am. St. Rep. 108; People v. Murray, 89 Mich. 276, 50 N. W. 595, 14 L. R. A. 809, 28 Am. St. Rep. 294; People v. Yeager, 113 Mich. 228, 71 N. W. 491. In the case last cited the Michigan statute, allowing the judge in certain cases to exclude from the courtroom "every person except those necessarily in attendance," was held to be unconstitutional as applied to a criminal case. The cases cited to the contrary are: Grimmett v. State, 22 Tex. App. 36, 2 S. W. 631, 58 Am. Rep. 630, a rape case, where the spectators, during the taking of the testimony of a female became so boisterous with laughter as to interfere with the court and to confuse the witness, attorneys not connected with the case and jurors not on the panel being allowed to remain; People v. Kerrigan, 73 Cal. 222, 14 Pac. 849, where the defendant became unmanageable and began to use profane and abusive language to the judge and officers of the court, so that the trial could not proceed until the spectators were excluded; Stone v. People, 3 Ill. (2 Scam.) 326, where, on account of noise and confusion on the outside of the courtroom, the judge ordered the doors to the courtroom locked, but directed that the officers permit any one to pass and repass who wished to do so; Lide v. State, 133 Ala. 63, 31 South. 953, where the spectators began to applaud the argument of state's counsel; State v. McCool, 34 Kan. 617, 9 Pac. 745, where all females were excluded from the courtroom, upon the statement of one of the attorneys in the case that he was about to refer to certain evidence which could not be discussed in their presence; State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 542, 5 S. W. 257, 330; Jackson v. Commonwealth, 100 Ky. 239, 38 S. W. 422, 1091, 66 Am. St. Rep. 336, where it was held that the size of the crowd might properly be limited to the seating capacity of the courtroom; U. S. v. Buck, 4 Phila. 169, Fed. Cas. No. 14,680, where it was held that dangerous persons who would be likely to interfere with the due administration of justice might be excluded from the courtroom; and State v. Callahan, 100 Minn. 63, 110 N. W. 342, where the prosecutrix in a rape case, after long and public examination, became so embarrassed by the presence of the crowd that the judge ordered the spectators to leave the room temporarily. By a divided court this was held to be no abuse of discretion and no denial of the constitutional right to a public trial. In the case last cited, Lewis, J., who delivered the opinion of the majority, after reviewing the case, said:

"Applying these principles, and conceding that a sweeping and unlimited order clearing the courtroom throughout the trial would be error, we are of the opinion that it affirmatively appears from the record that the prosecutrix was seriously embarrassed by the presence of a crowd of spectators, and that by reason of the situation the court and county attorney were unable to elicit from the witness such clear and definite statement of the facts as seemed necessary in such a case. We think it fairly appears from the record that the situation was a temporary one, and that the order was made simply to relieve the condition with reference to that particular witness; and, while the record does not expressly show that the order was thereafter rescinded, limited, or modified, yet the fair inference from what transpired is that it was not enforced when not necessary. Such being the state of the record, we hold that there was no interference with defendant's constitutional right to a public trial."

In the recent case of Davis v. U. S., 247 Fed. 394, 159 C. C. A. 448, L. R. A. 1918C, 1164, it was held that an order of the court directing that the courtroom be cleared of all spectators excepting relatives of the defendant, members of the bar, and newspaper reporters, deprived the defendants of a public trial as guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In that case the crime for which the defendants were indicted had connection with a train robbery, and the trial, which was held at Muskogee, Okl., excited more than ordinary interest. At previous sessions the courtroom was crowded with spectators, and the court had found it necessary to direct the bailiffs to clear the aisles so that witnesses would not be impeded when called. Ill feeling had developed between defendants, their relatives and friends, and some of the witnesses for the prosecution; and the court had placed the latter in the care of an officer. On the evening of the night session (when the order to clear the courtroom was made) an encounter occurred in a restaurant, in which a relative of one of the defendants hit a witness for the prosecution across the face with a newspaper. This was reported to the court, also that one or more of the witnesses in the courtroom was intoxicated. It did not appear, however, that the courtroom was crowded beyond its seating capacity when the order to clear it was made, or that any person was making a disturbance or threatening to do so, or that there was any well-founded apprehension that a disturbance would occur. By the favor of the court officers, about 25 people were allowed in the courtroom. Two female relatives of the defendant, newspaper men, and about 10 members of the bar were also allowed to remain after the giving of the order. Other citizens, against whom no objection appeared on account of character or condition, sought and were denied admission, although there was space in the courtroom for the accommodation of such citizens. In the course of the opinion it was said:

"As the expression necessarily implies, a public trial is a trial at which the public is free to attend. It is not essential to the right of attendance that a person be a relative of the accused, an attorney, a witness, or a reporter for the press, nor can those classes be taken as the exclusive representatives of the public. Men may have no interest whatever in the trial, except to see how justice is done in the courts of their country. The qualifications of the broad scope of the constitutional provision and of like provisions in the Constitutions of the states are few, and are based upon considerations of public morals and peace and good order in the courtroom."

The constitutional provision guaranteeing the right of public trial is intended to protect persons accused of crime. While the public have the privilege to attend the trial of a criminal case, the purpose of the provision is to secure a right, not to the public but to the defendant. Manifestly, the state has the right to enforce its laws, and to this end it may enact any needful legislation, having due regard to the constitutional rights of the persons accused, including the right to a public trial. In the case at bar, court officials, the jurors on the panel, the defendant, his counsel, his father, brother, and two sisters, the prosecutrix, her counsel, relatives of the prosecutrix, disinterested members of the bar, and representatives of the press were permitted to remain in the courtroom during the taking of the testimony of the prosecutrix. While disinterested attorneys and representatives of the press are not the exclusive representatives of the public, it is equally certain that they are not officers of court nor the representatives of the state as against persons accused of crime. The trial of a criminal case, conducted in the presence of the defendant, his relatives, disinterested members of the bar, and representatives of the press, cannot be said to be a secret trial; and we are of the opinion that section 5885 of the Civil Code, quoted above, as construed and applied by the trial judge in the case at bar, is not violative of article 1, § 1, par. 5, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that—

"Every person charged with an offense against the laws of this state . . . shall have a public and speedy trial."

It is true that the judge did not require proof of prosecutrix's age, of her condition, or of the nature and character of the testimony to be given. The age and condition of the prosecutrix was perhaps apparent to the trial judge, and he must have known the general nature and character of the evidence to be given. Though the motion to exclude spectators was based upon special grounds, the court was authorized to act upon any good and sufficient reason apparent to him. We cannot say that the reasons upon which the court acted were not sufficient reasons. The court was advised by counsel (and we cannot say that it was not also apparent to the court) that the prosecutrix, on account of her youth and highly nervous condition, would be unable to give her testimony before the large crowd of spectators. In such circumstances the due administration of justice would have been impeded. The order of the judge clearing the courtroom of all persons except those named above was not an abuse of discretion.

[2] 2. On the trial of the case counsel for the state asked the prosecutrix whether or not she "directly or indirectly consented for this defendant to have sexual intercourse" with her. To the question the prosecutrix answered in the negative. It is contended that the prosecutrix should not have been permitted to give an opinion or to draw a conclusion without stating the facts and circumstances upon which the conclusion was based. Under the facts and circumstances of this case, the error, if error at all, in admitting the testimony, is not of such gravity as to require the grant of a new trial. From the record it appears that the question was propounded at the conclusion of the direct examination of the prosecutrix. She had detailed the facts and circumstances of the case. After she was permitted to answer the question, she was subjected to a rigid cross-examination, and again went fully into all the facts and circumstances upon which she based her answer.

[3] 3. The failure of the court to charge the jury on the question of consent is assigned as error in one ground of the motion for new trial. It will be noted that the defendant denied having sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix, either with or without her consent. The court gave in charge to the jury the definition of rape as contained in the Penal Code 1910, § 93. At one point in his charge he instructed the jury that the burden was upon the state to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did unlawfully and with force and arms make an assault upon the prosecutrix and did have carnal knowledge of her "forcibly and against her will." If the defendant desired further instructions on the subject of consent, an appropriate request should have been made.

[4] 4. The prosecutrix and her mother were examined in chief, and the state rested its case. After the defendant had concluded his statement, the state was permitted to call the family physician, who made an examination of the prosecutrix on the night of the commission of the alleged offense. The testimony of the physician was objected to upon the ground that it was not in rebuttal of anything contained in the defendant's statement. The testimony of the physician is found in the record, and has been referred to already in this opinion. This evidence directly tends to contradict the statement made by the accused. Even if not strictly in rebuttal, the admission of the evidence after the defendant had made his statement and rested his case was a matter in the sound discretion of the court.

[5] 5. Finally, it is insisted that the court erred in failing to charge the law of assault and battery. There was no request for such a charge, and the defendant in his statement contended that he did not make an assault of any character upon the prosecutrix. He did, however, admit that he kissed the prosecutrix, and put his hands upon her thigh. The admission was coupled with the distinct statement that no objection to this conduct was made by the prosecutrix. However, it is insisted that the offense of assault and battery is necessarily included in the charge of rape, and that under the evidence the jury was authorized to find the defendant guilty of assault and battery only. This contention is based upon the following testimony of the prosecutrix:

"He [the defendant] caught hold of my hand, and I told him he was not going to hold hands with me. He caught hold of it again, and I took my hand and pulled it back this way and told him that he would have to take his hand off mine. * * * The car was out on the boulevard when he stopped it. It was a dark night. There were no lights around there. There were no people. He said the car stopped. I don't know whether he stopped it or not. It stopped still. He says the car has stopped, and moved over toward me. I thought he was going to get out, but he grabbed my body and tried to kiss me. I was fighting him and moving my head, and done everything I could to keep him from kissing me. He just kept on trying to kiss me. Then he pulled me toward him and put his hand under my dress and stuck his finger in me. I started screaming just as loud as I could. The way he had me, I could not do a thing. He was right on me where I could not move. After he stuck his finger in me, I hardly knew what happened. He had sexual intercourse with me. I remember him trying to wipe the side of my leg off, and I told him to take his hand away. * * *"

"The first intimation from [the defendant] that he wanted to be rude with me was when he caught hold of my hand and when I told him to turn it loose. * * * I did not pay any attention to that, and we went on talking. * * * He put his arm around me, his right arm. He was driving just as fast as he could. I told him to take his arm from around me. He said that was all right. When the car stopped, he said, 'The car has stopped.' I thought he was going to get out and crank the car. I kept him from kissing me. He got over from behind the steering wheel and says, 'The car has stopped.' He grabbed me and tried to kiss me. He was kind of leaning over me. Before I knew he was right on top of me. The last I remember I was sitting up in the seat, trying to keep him from kissing me. When he first grabbed me, he grabbed me with both arms, around the shoulders. I was frightened. He held me tight. The next thing I knew he had run his hand up me and stuck his finger in me. Then he got on top of me. The last I remember I was sitting up. I was almost senseless, but I fought as hard as I could. I screamed continuously. I hollered the time he grabbed me. I never got off the front seat. I was in the same position when I came back to my senses. I tried to choke him. * * * I could not kick him, but I put my foot over the side door trying to get out. He was on top of me, and I got up on the seat, and he jerked me back. I tried to get my leg up over the door. I did not try to open the door, because he was on top of me and I could not. * * * The last I remember, he grabbed me; just how he had me I don't know. After he stuck his finger in me and got on top of me, I don't remember. He put something else in me much larger than his finger. I could not kick him; he was on me. I was fighting him, trying to shove him off. I don't know how long he was on me. I fought all the time. I remember fighting. I shoved at him and fought at him, tried to choke him, did everything I could, tried to get him up from on top of me. * * * When he grabbed me and tried to kiss me I was scared to death, and when he ran his hand up under my dress it liked to have scared me to death. I couldn't hardly get my leg over the door. I tried to push him off, but not with my foot. I tried to keep his hand out. I tried to keep my dress down."

The mother of the prosecutrix testified that on the night of the commission of the alleged offense, and after the offense was alleged to have been committed, she gave the prosecutrix a douche, using an ordinary syringe. On cross-examination the physician testified that the insertion of the tube might produce a rupture of the hymen, and that the insertion of the finger without cover would have a tendency to cause the same result. It is to be noted, however, that the physician testified to other injuries to the person of the prosecutrix, which in all reasonable probability could not have been produced by either of these means.

It is conceded that a verdict of assault, or of assault and battery, or of assault with intent to commit a rape, may be founded upon an indictment for rape. An assault or assault and battery is necessarily involved in every case of rape. Speer v. State, 60 Ga. 381, 382; Goldin v. State, 104 Ga. 549, 551, 30 S. E. 749; Watson v. State, 116 Ga. 607, 43 S. E. 32, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1. Where a charge of graver character includes a minor offense, if the evidence will justify a verdict finding the defendant guilty of the minor offense, it is the duty of the judge to instruct the jury as to the principles of law applicable thereto. The graver offense must either necessarily include the minor offense, or the indictment must charge the essential elements of the minor offense. To state the rule as strongly as possible, the jury should in all cases be instructed that the defendant may be convicted of the lesser offense necessarily involved in the graver offense, where the evidence submitted, under any view thereof, will authorize conviction of the lesser grade. Sutton v. State, 123 Ga. 125, 51 S. E. 316. The mere failure of the court to charge the jury on the law of assault and battery, on the trial of one indicted for the offense of rape, is not cause for new trial where the evidence in the case, if credible, proves the crime as alleged in the indictment. These general principles are not denied; but it is insisted that in view of the testimony of the prosecutrix the jury might have concluded that after the defendant had put his hand under her dress and inserted his finger in her private parts, she became unconscious and did not know what actually took place thereafter. While the prosecutrix does say that she "hardly knew" what happened after the defendant placed his hands underneath her clothing, and in effect that she lost consciousness through fright, the only reasonable interpretation of her testimony is that on account of the assault she was not fully conscious of and could not remember all the details of the transaction, or else that she shrank from a recital of them. She testified positively that the defendant had sexual intercourse with her. Though stating that she "hardly" remembered what happened, she positively asserted that she continued her struggles until she was released by the defendant, and described in detail the resistance offered by her until the assault upon her person had ended. The mere failure of the judge to instruct the jury on the law of assault and battery on the trial of one indicted for the crime of rape will not be held to be error requiring the grant of a new trial, upon the theory that the jury may have believed a part and disbelieved a part of the testimony of the prosecutrix. That is to say, the jury are not at liberty to accept the testimony of the prosecutrix that an assault was made upon her person, and at the same time arbitrarily reject her testimony, equally positive, that the defendant had sexual intercourse with her, forcibly and against her will. The case differs from a case of assault with intent to rape. It rarely happens that an assault is accompanied by such overwhelming and conclusive evidence of the intent with which it is committed as to require the jury to find that the assault was made with the intent to commit a rape. This principle is recognized in the Sutton Case, supra. It is conceded that the testimony of the physician may be viewed as tending either to corroborate the evidence of the prosecutrix that the defendant did in fact have sexual intercourse with her, or as tending to support the defendant's theory in the case. The fact that his testimony may be viewed as tending to support the defendant's theory is, however, immaterial. The testimony of every witness except that of the prosecutrix relates merely to the condition of the prosecutrix after the commission of the alleged offense, and does not tend to disprove the statements testified to by the prosecutrix. In deciding whether the failure of the judge to instruct the jury on the law of assault and battery is cause for new trial in this case, the evidence of the prosecutrix alone must be considered. As we have said above, her evidence, if credible, proves the completed offense as charged in the indictment, and, in connection with the other evidence in the case, is sufficient to sustain the verdict. Under the defendant's statement, instructions upon the law of assault and battery would have been appropriate but there was no request for such instructions.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except ATKINSON, J., dissenting from the ruling in the fifth headnote and to the corresponding division of the opinion. The evidence for the state was sufficient to authorize a verdict finding the defendant guilty of assault and battery, and did not demand a finding that a rape had been actually committed. It was therefore error to omit, though not requested, to charge the law applicable to a case of assault and battery.

LOYD v. STATE. (No. 2615.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  1158(3)—Trial judge's finding that juror was impartial not disturbed unless discretion abused.

The trial judge occupies the position of a trier when passing upon the ground of an extraordinary motion for new trial in a criminal case, based upon the alleged bias of one of the jurors. His finding that the juror was impartial will not be reversed, unless it is apparent that he has abused the discretion which the law vests in him in such cases.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  958(1)—New trial for newly discovered evidence properly denied in absence of affidavits to support witnesses.

There was no error in overruling that ground of the extraordinary motion for new trial which was based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, in the absence of supporting affidavits as to the residence, associates, means of knowledge, character, and credibility of the witnesses.

Error from Superior Court, Bleckley County; Eschol Graham, Judge.

Thomas Loyd was convicted of rape and his extraordinary motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error. Affirmed.

M. H. Boyer, Sol. Gen., of Hawkinsville, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

GEORGE, J. Thomas Loyd was indicted and tried for the offense of rape. On the trial of his case the jury returned a verdict of guilty, fixing his punishment at one year in the penitentiary. He made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he brought the case to this court, where the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Loyd v. State, 150 Ga. 803, 105 S. E. 465. At a subsequent term of the court Loyd filed an extraordinary motion for new trial. This motion was overruled and dismissed, after hearing; and that judgment is now before us for review.

[1] 1. The first ground of this motion is that the movant has learned, since his original motion for new trial was overruled and the judgment of the lower court affirmed by the Supreme Court, that he can prove that "one of the jurors [J. A. Wade] who tried and convicted him was heard to say, before he was called on the jury, that the defendant, Tom Loyd, ought to be lynched." In support of this ground the affidavit of Willis Dix was offered by the movant and considered by the court. In rebuttal, the state offered the affidavit of the juror directly denying the statements contained in the affidavit by Willis Dix. The issue of fact between the juror and the witness was passed upon by the trial court, and it does not appear that there was any abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a new trial on this ground. Hall v. State, 141 Ga. 7, 80 S. E. 307.

[2] 2. The other ground of the motion is that the movant has learned, since his first motion for new trial was overruled and the judgment of the lower court affirmed by the Supreme Court, that he can prove that the female alleged to have been raped is a "woman of bad character and that she is known as a lewd woman," and that since his motion was overruled and the judgment of the lower court affirmed by the Supreme Court the woman alleged to have been raped stated that she testified against the defendant because she was hired by two men to swear that the defendant raped her. In support of this ground the affidavits of certain witnesses are attached, and the affidavits of the defendant and each of his counsel of record, to the effect that the defendant and his counsel did not know of this evidence and by the exercise of due diligence could not have discovered the same prior to the trial of the case and prior to the overruling of the first motion for new trial. In rebuttal the state offered the affidavit of the female alleged to have been raped, in which she directly denied the statement alleged to have been made by her subsequently to the trial of the case and to the judgment overruling the first motion for new trial. The movant did not present supporting affidavits as to the residence, associates, means of knowledge, character, and credibility of the witnesses upon whose affidavits this ground of the motion for new trial was based. In the absence of such affidavits, it must be held that the trial court did not abuse his discretion in denying the extraordinary motion for new trial upon this ground, even if this ground of the motion were otherwise meritorious. Phillips v. State, 138 Ga. 815, 76 S. E. 352.

Judgment affirmed.

LITTLEFIELD et al. v. TOWN OF ADEL et al. (No. 2194.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 18, 1921.)

1. Mandamus ¶184, 186—Municipal officers not relieved because of expiration of term subsequent to contempt judgment; mandamus against town runs against officers and their successors.

After the officers of a municipality have been adjudged guilty of contempt in refusing to obey a mandamus absolute, and the contempt judgment has been reviewed and affirmed by the Supreme Court, such officers will not be relieved because their terms of office have expired since the rendition of the contempt judgment and they have ceased to hold such offices. The court erred in granting an interlocutory injunction restraining the sheriff of the county from executing the process for contempt.

2. Courts ¶480(2)—Injunction will not lie to restrain execution of judgment for contempt.

The writ of injunction will not issue to restrain a sheriff or other officer from executing a judgment of contempt issuing from a court of competent jurisdiction.

Atkinson, J., and Fish, C. J. dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Cook County; R. G. Dickerson, Judge.

Suit by the Town of Adel and others against J. J. Littlefield and others. Judgment granting an injunction, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Littlefield brought a suit for damages against the town of Adel, and procured judgment. Upon refusal of the town officials to make payment of the amount of the execution he obtained mandamus absolute, and upon their refusal to comply therewith the defendants were adjudged in contempt. They brought the contempt case to this court, and while it was pending here an election was held and the defendants, who had been adjudged in contempt, were succeeded by other officials. This court affirmed the judgment of the court below. The defendants thus adjudged in contempt (who had been the acting mayor, clerk and treasurer, and councilmen of the town) filed an equitable petition, praying injunction to prevent the execution of the attachment for contempt, for the reasons (a) that petitioners never, while they were officials of the town of Adel, had in their hands funds with which they could legally pay said judgment; (b) because at the time the judgment of the court below, holding them to be in contempt, was affirmed by the Supreme Court, they had each and all gone out of office, and had no control over the funds belonging to the town of Adel, and were powerless to comply with the order requiring them to pay over the money; (c) because the officials of the city, who had succeeded the petitioners, did not then have in their hands funds from which the payment could legally be made, even if petitioners could control such funds; (d) because, when petitioners were succeeded in office by others, the mandamus proceeding and the attachment for contempt brought thereon immediately became void and of no effect, so far as petitioners were concerned. Littlefield answered, and pleaded specially that all the facts, matters, and issues sought to be raised by the petition had been finally adjudicated adversely to the petitioners, and that they were therefore estopped from litigating the matter further.

Upon interlocutory hearing the court made the following judgment:

"The sheriff of Cook county, Ga., is hereby restrained and enjoined from executing the process for contempt referred to in the above petition against those officers whose commission as officers of the town of Adel has expired and who are the plaintiffs in the above-stated case."

Error is assigned on this judgment, on the ground that it is contrary to the pleadings, the evidence, and the law of the case, because all the issues raised by the petition for injunction had been finally adjudicated adversely to the plaintiffs, and because the court was, for that reason, without jurisdiction to grant rule nisi or injunction. In the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error it is stated:

That "the only new matter" involved in this record is the question that, pending the appeal from the judgment of the court below, holding the defendants in contempt, "an election was held in the town of Adel, in which an entirely new and different set of officers, except the clerk and treasurer, were elected by the people, and that the clerk and treasurer's term of office expired at the time the new mayor and councilmen were installed in office, and that he was thereafter re-elected, which made him a new and different officer, so that the town was operating with an entirely new set of officers."

In the brief of defendants in error it is stated:

"The injunction was sustained solely upon the ground, as therein expressed, that defendants in error, the ex-mayor and councilmen and clerk and treasurer of the town of Adel had already gone out of office and their successors elected and qualified."

The order adjudging the petitioners in contempt was passed by Judge Thomas, of the Southern circuit, to which Berrien county, containing the town of Adel, was at the time attached. Subsequently the county of Cook was created, with Adel as the county site, and attached to the Alapaha circuit. The interlocutory injunction was granted by Judge Dickerson, of that circuit. The terms of office being served by all of the petitioners at the time they were originally adjudged in contempt for the refusal to pay over the funds had expired before the judgment of this court, affirming the judgment of the court below, was made the judgment of that court. Other persons had been elected to each of the offices, except in the case of the clerk and treasurer, who was re-elected.

R. A. Hendricks, of Nashville, for plaintiffs in error.

J. P. Knight, of Nashville, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. [1, 2] A mandamus absolute was directed against the town of Adel. The obligation imposed by such judgment devolved upon no particular set of municipal officers, but is perpetual against the persons then holding the offices and their successors in office. The proceeding is really against the township, whether or not the names of any particular officers are mentioned. The resignation of any officer, or all of the officers, during the pendency of the proceeding for mandamus, would not involve an abatement of the suit. If it were otherwise:

"We would always have the unseemly spectacle of constant resignations and reappointments to avoid the effect of the suit." Thompson v. United States, 103 U. S. 480, 26 L. Ed. 521; Maddox v. Graham, 59 Ky. (2 Metc.) 56.

As stated in the latter case, it may assume the character of an individual proceeding, if it becomes necessary to enforce the orders of the circuit court by attachment or other process for contempt, but a change in the membership of the board does not so change the parties as to abate the proceeding. The constituent parts of the board may not be the same, but the representative body remains identical. If, after the mandamus absolute has been rendered, one or more of the public officials affected thereby should refuse to obey its mandate while still able to comply, he may be attached for contempt, and his subsequent resignation will not absolve him from some degree of punishment, although at the time he is finally adjudged in contempt he may then be unable to comply with the peremptory mandate because of the expiration of his term of office. If, by reason of such change, resignation, or expiration of the term of office subsequent to the issuing of the writ of mandamus, the writ cannot or ought not to be enforced, these facts should be made known, by proper proceeding, to the court issuing the writ, which alone has jurisdiction over it. A writ of mandamus absolute issued by a court of competent jurisdiction—

"when once issued, cannot, like an ordinary execution upon a judgment at law, be stayed by injunction, and to allow such interference would necessarily lead to a conflict of jurisdiction and interrupt the whole course of judicial proceedings." High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, 519, § 567; Weber v. Zimmerman, 23 Md. 45.

As stated in the Weber Case, such a course would "lead to a conflict of jurisdiction, producing the greatest confusion, and tending to subvert the administration of justice." Further quoting from High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, p. 521:

"If a judge has already resigned his office, while it is true that he cannot be required by mandamus to perform any judicial act connected therewith, yet if he had refused while still in office to do the act required by the mandamus, as to sign a bill of exceptions, he may be punished by fine as for contempt, since the superior tribunal, having properly acquired jurisdiction over the respondent in the first instance to compel him to perform the required act, cannot be divested of its power to punish for contempt by his resigning the office. And while it is conceded that one important object to be attained in punishing for the contempt is to compel the party to perform the required act, it by no means follows, because this can not be attained, that no punishment should be inflicted."

In the present case the facts are perhaps further removed from the possibility of relief by injunction. Not only had the writ of mandamus absolute been rendered prior to the expiration of the term of office of the petitioners, but they had been cited for contempt, and had been tried therefor, and formally adjudged in contempt of the court for failure to comply with its judgment of mandamus. That judgment has never been set aside, but, upon the contrary, was affirmed by this court. Town of Adel v. Littlefield, 149 Ga. 812, 815, 102 S. E. 433. Nothing, therefore, can be conceived as more definitely settled than that the petitioners were required by valid mandamus absolute to perform an official act; that they were able to comply with such judgment, had failed and refused to do so, and were in contempt of the court. When that case was here it was said:

"The question as to whether the town had the funds in hand to pay this [judgment] was an issue before the judge at the hearing of the application for mandamus; and his judgment ordering the payment, instead of a judgment ordering the levy of a tax with which to raise the necessary money, adjudicated the question as to whether or not the town had the funds with which to meet the judgment, and decided that question against the contention of the defendants. Whether the judge found erroneously, under the facts submitted, that the town did have the necessary funds, is not before us. The judgment was conclusive upon that question." Town of Adel v. Littlefield, supra.

And, again referring to the same judgment, the court said:

"But the judgment for mandamus absolute, as we have pointed out above, stands. It was a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction. * * * There was no question as to whether or not they had funds in their hands, so as to make an issue of fact which require submission to a jury. The mandamus absolute settles the question as to whether they had the funds or not, and a refusal to obey that judgment rendered the respondents in the contempt proceedings liable to punishment for contempt for refusal to obey the mandamus absolute according to its terms."

In some states contempt judgments are not reviewable. One of the reasons assigned is that if a writ of error should lie, and should have the effect of staying execution upon the judgment, the effect would be that—

"parties guilty of the grossest and most aggravated contempts may set the courts at defiance, obstruct the regular course of justice, and suspend if not totally elude punishment at their own will and pleasure."

On this subject, see Tyler v. Hamersley, 44 Conn. 393, 412, 419, 26 Am. Rep. 471, 479, and authorities cited.

In this state judgments for contempt as a general rule are reviewable; but there is a wide distinction between reviewing a judgment of contempt and restraining by injunction the execution of such a judgment valid and binding in every particular. In 6 Ruling Case Law, 539, it is said:

"An injunction will not lie to prevent the carrying out of a judgment for contempt."

As authority for this statement the case of Tyler v. Hamersley, supra, is cited, wherein it was said that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to stay the execution of a judgment for contempt. The officials of the New Haven & Northampton Company, a railroad corporation, had been required by a writ of peremptory mandamus to stop its freight and passenger trains at the village of Plantsville, and, having disobeyed the order of the court, were adjudged in contempt. Their effort to have the judgment of contempt reviewed by the Supreme Court of Connecticut failed. A petition was then filed, as in the present case, for an injunction to restrain the execution of the order of the court for the commitment of the petitioners for a contempt in disobeying the writ of mandamus. In the opinion of the case denying the injunction it was said:

"Courts * * * are clothed with jurisdiction to restrain, by injunction, proceedings at law in all cases where, by fraud, accident, mistake, or otherwise, a party has obtained an advantage in a court of law, which must necessarily make that court an instrument of injustice. In cases of that description the restraint may be imposed to stay trial, and after trial and verdict to stay judgment, after judgment to stay execution, and after execution to stay money in the hands of the officer. But after a judgment an injunction will not be granted to stay its execution, unless there has been fraud or collusion in obtaining it or the verdict upon which it was founded, or where the party has been unable to defend himself effectually at law, without any fault or negligence of his own, or where the plaintiff has possessed himself of something by means of which he has obtained an unconscientious advantage. When an injunction is granted to stay proceedings in the courts of law, it is in no just sense a prohibition to those courts in the exercise of their jurisdiction. It is not addressed to them and does not even affect to interfere with them. The process is directed only to the parties. It neither assumes any superiority over the court in which the proceedings are had, nor denies its jurisdiction. It is granted on the sole ground that, from certain equitable circumstances of which the court granting the process has cognizance, it is against conscience that the party inhibited should proceed in the cause."

Applying these principles to the facts of that case, it was further said:

"The facts charged in the bill show no title whatever in the plaintiffs to equitable relief, and are not even within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. It is an established rule that courts of equity will grant no injunction, or order in the nature of an injunction, to stay proceedings in any criminal matter. If they should do so, said Lord Holt, C. J., the Court of Queen's Bench would break it, and protect any that would proceed in contempt of it. Holderstaffe v. Saunders, 6 Mod. 16. And Lord Hardwicke allowed a demurrer to a bill for an injunction to stay proceedings on a mandamus issued to the lord of a manor to hold a court. 'The court,' he said, 'has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to stay proceedings on a mandamus, or on an indictment, or on an information or a writ of prohibition.'"

The terms of office of the defendants in error expired after the rendition of the judgment finding them to be in contempt; they sued out a writ of error to that judgment, and the judgment of this court was rendered subsequently to the expiration of their terms of office. What effect these facts should have in modifying or abrogating the judgment of contempt, when modification or abrogation is sought, rests primarily with the superior court which rendered the judgment, by petition praying for modification, but not by means of the extraordinary writ of injunction. In the case of Thweatt v. Kiddoo, 58 Ga. 300, it appears that Thweatt had violated an injunction restraining the sale of personal property, and was adjudged in contempt of court therefor, and that judgment had been affirmed by this court. After the judgment of the Supreme Court had been made the judgment of the superior court, Thweatt filed a petition in the latter court, tending to show that he had been misled, offering to make restitution in part, and alleging that he had not the means to fully comply with the original judgment against him. The petition was accompanied with a motion that he be discharged from the contempt. The court overruled the motion, and ordered that Thweatt be committed for contempt. Thweatt presented a bill of exceptions, which the presiding judge refused to certify, because all the material questions had been adjudicated before, and the orders granted were only carrying out the decision already made. Thweatt then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus compelling Judge Kiddoo to certify the bill of exceptions. A nisi was issued by this court, and on the filing of the answer by respondent the mandamus absolute was refused. In the opinion, written by Bleckley, J., it was said:

"What would be cause for terminating, after a reasonable time, imprisonment employed as a remedy without producing remedial results, is not now in question. The question of contempt was settled at a previous term, on substantially the same facts as are contained in this record. 58 Ga. 98. Nothing new has happened to purge the contempt. The alleged inability, from poverty or otherwise, to comply with the order of the court, is not proved to have originated since that order was passed. The imprisonment has not even commenced. After imprisonment has been tried for a reasonable time, and proved unfruitful as a remedy, the question can be made how and when it ought to terminate. Doubtless there is some way to reach a case of bona fide poverty, and prevent imprisonment from becoming perpetual, or even from being unduly protracted. But the poor cannot be indulged in willful disobedience to the lawful commands of a court, any more than the rich. The action of the court, now complained of, was not the rendition of a new judgment, but the refusal to stop short in the execution of the judgment formerly rendered. The judge was right in refusing to sign and certify another bill of exceptions."

Thweatt's Case, it must be remembered, arose on an application to the court to revoke or modify the contempt judgment. It did not seek to employ the writ of injunction to prevent the enforcement of a valid judgment. That the plaintiffs in this case may be punished, as a consequence of our ruling, notwithstanding their terms of office subsequently expired, would not justify us in abandoning established law. To do so would create a dangerous and mischievous precedent. They have chosen the wrong remedy, when they could have pursued the right remedy. Moreover, the right remedy is yet available. The judgment sought to be enjoined in this case prescribes punishment for failing and refusing to comply with the mandamus absolute when they were able to comply. It does not undertake to punish for refusal after their terms of office expired and they were unable to comply. The order upon which error is assigned does not undertake to vacate or modify the contempt judgment. It is explicitly an interlocutory injunction. Applying the principles above stated, we conclude that the judgment restraining the sheriff from proceeding to execute the judgment of contempt was contrary to law, and must be set aside.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., and ATKINSON, J., dissenting.

ATKINSON, J. In an action for damages based on a tort, Littlefield obtained a money judgment against the town of Adel, Ga. Subsequently the plaintiff instituted a mandamus suit against the municipality to compel payment of the judgment. On September 25, 1918, Judge Thomas, of the Southern judicial circuit, in whose jurisdiction the suit was instituted, granted a judgment absolute, commanding the town of Adel and certain individuals, "as acting mayor" and "as acting secretary and treasurer" of the municipality, to pay over to plaintiff instant the amount of the judgment. On May 23, 1919, the plaintiff instituted a contempt proceeding against the town of Adel and certain individuals, who were acting respectively as mayor, secretary and treasurer, and councilmen, based on the refusal to pay the judgment as ordered in the mandamus absolute. On May 28, 1919, the contempt case was heard before Judge Thomas, and a judgment was rendered declaring:

"It is therefore ordered by the court that [the officers of the municipality, naming them] be and they are each hereby required and ordered to pay over to said plaintiff or his counsel the said sum [setting out the amount of the judgment], or in default thereof that they and each of them be attached for contempt of court."

On June 10, 1919, the clerk of the superior court issued "process" commanding the sheriff "to arrest" the individuals adjudged in contempt, "and commit them to jail as for contempt of said court in their failure to pay said judgment as aforesaid." Before execution of this process the terms of office of each of the individuals mentioned in the judgment for contempt expired, and with one exception other individuals were elected and qualified as their successors, so that such persons had no authority over the municipal property or the municipal affairs. On account of change of judicial circuits, Judge Dickerson, of the Alapaha circuit, succeeded to the jurisdiction in that territory which had theretofore been exercised by Judge Thomas. On April 5, 1920, when the sheriff was about to arrest and imprison the defendants, in execution of the writ issued by the clerk, they presented to Judge Dickerson an equitable petition against the sheriff and the plaintiff named in the common-law judgment against the town of Adel, praying to vacate the mandamus absolute and judgment of contempt and to enjoin the sheriff and his deputies from executing the process issued by the clerk, on the ground, among others, that such process was void. At the hearing the judge granted an order which declared:

"The sheriff * * * is hereby restrained and enjoined from executing the process for contempt * * * against those officers whose commission as officers of the town of Adel has expired and who are the plaintiffs" in this case.

The exception is to this judgment. While the mandamus absolute and judgment for contempt were rendered by Judge Thomas, and the judgment restraining the sheriff was rendered by Judge Dickerson, the latter judge, on account of change in judicial circuits, was successor to the former in jurisdiction of the case, and consequently all the judgments issued from the same court. While in the form of an equity suit, the petition presented was in effect a petition to the court which had granted the mandamus absolute and judgment for contempt, to vacate those orders, purge the contempt, and prevent arrest and imprisonment under the process issued by the clerk. The substance and not the style of the action determines its character. Lambert Holsting Engine Co. v. Dexter, 127 Ga. 581, 58 S. E. 778. It is not a case where one court is asked to interfere with the judgment of another court in respect to a matter of contempt, but is one in which the contemnor petitions the court which judged him in contempt; and the petition, whatever its form, was a sufficient basis for the judge to take jurisdiction and grant the relief which was granted. In Nisbet v. Tindall, 115 Ga. 374, 41 S. E. 569, a receiver was adjudged in contempt and imprisoned for failure to pay over money coming into his hands as an officer of court. His petition was for discharge on the ground of poverty and his inability to pay the amount he was ordered to pay. The judge ordered his discharge. In affirming that judgment this court in the course of the opinion said:

"It should now be regarded as definitely and finally settled that, in all cases of this character, the question of discharging from custody an officer of the court, who has been imprisoned for not paying over money or delivering property, must be left to the sound discretion of the trial judge, and that he shall have exclusive control of the matter."

There is no reason why the same rule should not apply where the contemnor is other than an officer of the court, and where his term of imprisonment has not commenced. Having the right to apply for discharge, what are the merits of the grounds of relief? Those adjudged in contempt subsequently lost all power to comply with the terms of the mandamus absolute, by expiration of their terms of office and the election and qualification of their successors (except one). This inability to comply would have been ground of defense before the judgment of contempt, and, having arisen after judgment of contempt, was sufficient ground for subsequent discharge of the contemnor. Nisbet v. Tindall, supra; 13 O. J. 95, § 148. See, also, cases cited in 6 R. C. L. 537, note 11. All that is said would apply, had the judge sentenced the contemnors to arrest and imprisonment. But he did not do so. The proposed arrest and imprisonment were under a so-called "process" issued by the clerk of the court. That process issued by the clerk was strictly penal, and to be valid must be clearly authorized by a statute or judgment of the court strictly construed. It was unfounded, because the judgment in the contempt proceeding, on which reliance was had for its basis, did not declare that the defendants should be arrested or imprisoned, and there is no statute authorizing the clerk to issue any such commitment. The imposition of a penalty for contempt is the sentence of the court, a judicial function, involving discretion of the judge, and not a mere ministerial act, that could be performed by the clerk. The judge could have fined the contemnors, or committed them to jail, or in his discretion omitted any punishment additional to the judgment of contempt. But the clerk was wholly without power to commit the contemnors to imprisonment, and the process issued by him was void for any such purpose. Being void, the judge could treat it as a nullity and instruct the sheriff to disregard its commands. That is in effect all that he did, and his judgment should not be reversed.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

A. E. Rewis was convicted of an offense, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Elders & De Loach, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error.

J. Saxton Daniel, Sol. Gen., of Claxton, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] 1. A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the judge "signed the certificate too late, more than 20 days after the rendition of his judgment overruling the motion for a new trial." This motion is overruled. The record shows that the motion for a new trial was overruled on March 17th. The certificate to the bill of exceptions bears date April 6th. This is "within twenty days from the rendition of the decision." Civil Code 1910, § 6153.

[2] 2. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that the trial judge certified as true the special ground of the motion for a new trial in which it was stated that there was no proof as to the venue of certain acts of incestuous adultery, and that where the venue was proved there was no proof that the woman with whom the accused, a married man, is alleged to have had sexual intercourse, was a single woman, and that this certificate was final as to the statements therein. This is true as to facts, but not as to conclusions. In Humphrey v. State, 24 Ga. App. 22 (1), 99 S. E. 714, it was held:

"The usual general certificate of the trial judge, approving as true all statements of fact contained in a special ground of a motion for a new trial, will be construed by this court as approving as true only such statements in the ground as are purely statements of fact, and not as so approving other allegations therein, which, although stated as facts, should properly be construed as mere conclusions of the movant, based upon facts set forth in the ground."

3. There was ample evidence to support every material allegation in the indictment, including the allegation that the crime was committed in Tattnall county, and that the woman in question had never been married. Indeed, the accused in his statement, after telling of the marriage of his other stepdaughters and their leaving home, and that Maybelle, the one involved in this case, remained at home, added, "She is still single."

The jury having passed upon all these questions of fact, no error of law having been committed, and the trial judge having approved the verdict, the judgment is affirmed.

BRYSON v. STATE. (No. 12408.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
June 17, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  13 — State law not superseded by federal law or constitutional amendment.

"The Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the 'National Prohibition Act,' popularly known as the Volstead Act, do not supersede or abrogate the existing state law, known as the Prohibition Act, approved March 28, 1917 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 7)."

2. Criminal law  $\S$  201 — Punishment for possessing liquor under both state and federal laws does not place defendant twice in jeopardy for same offense.

Both the sovereignty of the United States and the sovereignty of the state of Georgia having jurisdiction over the illegal act of possessing liquor, the same may constitute a criminal offense equally against both sovereignties, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of both, and the punishment in one sovereignty is no bar to his punishment in the other; and a conviction for the same offense in both the federal and state courts is not in violation of those provisions of the federal and state Constitutions that provide, in substance, that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb for the same offense.

3. Plea of former jeopardy properly stricken.

Under the above rulings, the trial court did not err in striking the defendant's plea of former jeopardy, in which he alleged that he had previously pleaded guilty in the United States District Court to the same offense—possessing the same whisky at the same time as charged in the state indictment—and that a conviction in the state court would be in violation of certain named provisions of the federal and state Constitutions which declare that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb for the same offense.

4. Criminal law  $\S$  201 — Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  13, 139—National law construed in light of constitutional amendment; possessing for personal consumption prohibited by state, but not by federal law; conviction under national law not bar to conviction under state law.

Moreover, the National Prohibition Act, known as the Volstead Act, when construed, as it must be, in the light of the Eighteenth Amendment, does not prohibit the possession of liquor or other intoxicants for the personal consumption of the owner thereof, his family, and his bona fide guests; whereas our state prohibition law does prohibit and make penal the mere possession of liquor, regardless of the purpose for which it is to be used by the owner; and therefore, the two laws being clearly separate and distinct in this particular, a conviction of the national offense is no bar to punishment for the state offense.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Courts  $\S$  217—Court of Appeals has jurisdiction to determine whether conviction under federal law bars prosecution under state law.

The determination of the question whether a conviction under the National Prohibition Act for illegally possessing intoxicants bars a prosecution under the state law, involves only an application, and not a construction, of provisions of the federal and state Constitutions, and is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; D. W. Blair, Judge.

D. H. Bryson was convicted of having, possessing, and controlling intoxicated liquors, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Clay & Blair, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. S. Wood, Sol. Gen., of Canton, and Lindley W. Camp, of Marietta, for the State.

LUKE, J. The defendant was indicted, tried, and found guilty of "having, possessing, and controlling" a certain quantity of intoxicating whisky. Prior to entering his plea of not guilty, the defendant filed a plea of former jeopardy in which he alleged that he had pleaded guilty in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia to the illegal possession of the identical whisky and at the same time that he was charged with illegally having, possessing, and controlling in the instant case, and that therefore his plea of guilty in the federal court was autrefois convict as to the case at bar. Upon motion of the state's counsel, the court struck this special plea, as being insufficient in law to set up any defense to the indictment pending. The defendant filed exceptions pendente lite to the ruling of the court striking his plea, and properly assigned error thereon in the main bill of exceptions.

[1] It is no longer an open question in this state that the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the "National Prohibition Act," popularly known as the Volstead Act (Act Cong. Oct. 28, 1919, c. 85, 41 Stat. 805), do not supersede or abrogate the existing state prohibition act. Jones v. Hicks, 150 Ga. 657, 104 S. E. 771, 10 A. L. R. 1315.

[2] Therefore the sole question for adjudication (this being the only point insisted upon in this court) is whether or not a defendant who has already been tried and found guilty in the federal court for illegally possessing liquor in violation of the Act of Congress known as the Volstead Act can be legally punished in the courts of Georgia for possessing the same liquors in violation of the state prohibition law (Acts of 1917 [Ex. Sess.] p. 7).

tion to pass upon the constitutional question, since it involves only an application of certain provisions of the federal and state Constitutions, and not a construction thereof. See Gulf Paving Co. v. City of Atlanta, 149 Ga. 114, 99 S. E. 374.

While this identical question has never been passed upon by the appellate courts of this state, it has in principle been settled by decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and other courts of high repute. In the case of United States v. Amy, 24 Fed. Cas. 792, 810, it is held that:

"In maintaining the power of the United States to pass this law, it is, moreover, proper to say that, as these letters, with the money in them, were stolen in Virginia, the party might undoubtedly have been punished in the state tribunals, according to the laws of the state, without any reference to the post office or the act of Congress; because, from the nature of our government, the same act may be an offense against the laws of the United States and also of a state, and be punishable in both. This was considered and decided in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fox v. State of Ohio, 3 Howard (44 U. S.) 435, and in the case of United States v. Peter Marigold, 9 Howard (50 U. S.) 560; and the punishment in one sovereignty is no bar to his punishment in the other." (Italics ours.)

In Crossley v. California, 168 U. S. 640, 18 Sup. Ct. 242, 42 L. Ed. 610, it is said:

"But it is settled law that the same act may constitute an offense against the United States and against a state, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of each government; and may embrace two or more offenses. Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131 [33 L. Ed. 287], and cases cited. And see Teal v. Felton, 12 How. [37 U. S.] 284, 292 [9 L. Ed. 990, 993]."

In the recent case of United States v. Casey (D. C.) 247 Fed. 362, 365, (6), it is held:

"That the state in the exercise of its police power has the right to legislate, and in pursuance of that right has legislated, to control the morals of its citizens, and may prosecute the keepers of bawdyhouses, is freely conceded; but their conviction and sentence for that offense in the state court, had action been taken against them there, would not bar their prosecution in this court. [Italics ours.] Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131, 139, 10 Sup. Ct. 47, 33 L. Ed. 287; Sexton v. California, 189 U. S. 319, 323, 23 Sup. Ct. 543, 47 L. Ed. 833; Byrne, Fed. Crim. Proc. § 211."

The converse of this proposition is obviously true. Attention is also directed to the recent case of In re Antonia Guerra, 94 Vt. 1, 110 Atl. 224, 10 A. L. R. 1560, where the Supreme Court of Vermont had under consideration the question of whether the wartime prohibition act superseded the state law on the same subject, and in passing said:

"It is no objection to the concurrent validity of the two statutes that both penalize the same act, for it has been repeatedly held that the same act may constitute a criminal offense equally against the United States and the state, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of each, provided the act is one over which both sovereignties have jurisdiction."

See, also, in this connection, Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. 13, 14 L. Ed. 306; Southern Railroad v. Commission, 236 U. S. 439, 35 Sup. Ct. 304, 59 L. Ed. 661.

In view of the above authorities, we hold that the violation of the federal Prohibition Act for possessing liquors, and a conviction of that offense in the federal court, does not bar or prevent a conviction for the same offense under the state prohibition law penalizing the possession of whisky.

[4] Furthermore, the Volstead Act, construed, as it must be, in the light of the Eighteenth Amendment, does not prohibit the possession of liquor where it is to be used for the personal consumption of the owner thereof, his family, and his bona fide guests, whereas our state prohibition law does prohibit the mere possession of liquor, regardless of the purpose for which it is to be used by the owner. These statutes are therefore entirely and radically different in this respect. This being true, the question under consideration comes, in principle, squarely under the well-settled law of this state, that—

"An act penalized by a law of the state may be penalized also by a municipal ordinance, if there is in the municipal offense some essential ingredient not essential to the state offense, or if the municipal offense lacks some ingredient essential to the state offense. In such case a conviction of the municipal offense is no bar to punishment for the state offense." Morris v. State, 18 Ga. App. 684, 90 S. E. 361.

See, also, Ellis v. Golden, 18 Ga. App. 749, 750, 90 S. E. 495, and citations.

The federal offense of possessing liquor is not swallowed up by the state offense of possessing whisky, nor vice versa, but, as we have already pointed out, both offenses are separate and distinct, and the same transaction may involve both.

[3] It follows from what has been said that the trial court did not err in striking on motion the defendant's plea of former jeopardy. Judgment affirmed.

1. Criminal law §201 — Punishment under state or federal law not bar to punishment under other.

Both the sovereignty of the United States and the sovereignty of the state of Georgia having jurisdiction over the illegal act of selling whisky, or possessing whisky, the same may constitute a criminal offense equally against both sovereignties, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of both, and the punishment in one sovereignty is no bar to his punishment in the other, even if the offense under the federal law and the offense under the state law constitute the same transaction. Bryson v. State, 26 Ga. App.—, 108 S. E. 63, this term decided, and authorities cited. Under this ruling the court did not err in the instant case in striking the special plea of autrefois convict.

E. V. Heath, of Waynesboro, for plaintiff in error.

E. M. Price, of Waynesboro, for defendants in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1, 2] This was a suit upon an open account for repairing an automobile. Upon the trial the defendant testified that he did not owe the plaintiffs anything on the account, as he told the plaintiffs when he left the car with them to be repaired that he did not own it, and that at that time he made an agreement with the plaintiffs for them to repair the car, sell it, retain the cost of repairing, and turn over the balance of the money, if any, to him (the defendant). This was denied by the plaintiffs, and the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff—so say we all." Thereupon the court entered up a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $119.71, and the defendant moved for a new trial, one of the grounds being that the verdict was too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to authorize a judgment to be entered thereon for any particular sum, and also that the judgment entered up was void. Under the pleadings and the evidence adduced, the only issue before the jury was whether the defendant was liable on the account. If he was liable, then the undisputed evidence demanded a finding that he owed the plaintiffs $119.71, the amount of the judgment entered upon the verdict. It follows that the reasonable intendment of the jury was to return a verdict for the plaintiffs for $119.71. See, in this connection, Mize v. Mashburn, 8 Ga. App. 408 (2), 69 S. E. 316; Seifert v. Holt, 82 Ga. 757, (2), 761, 9 S. E. 843, and authorities cited.

The excerpts from the charge of the court complained of, when considered in connection with the entire charge, show no material error. We do not think the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

BROYLES, C. J. This is the third appearance here of this case. When the case first came to this court, the judgment of the trial court was reversed because of error in repelling certain evidence offered by the defendant, and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. 17 Ga. App. 425, 87 S. E. 602. On its second appearance, the judgment of the lower court was reversed because of the error in admitting certain evidence offered by the defendant and in directing a verdict for the defendant. 20 Ga. App. 493, 93 S. E. 107.

Upon the trial now under review the case was submitted to the jury, and the verdict in favor of the plaintiff with the exception of the finding for attorney's fees, was authorized by the evidence. The only assignment of error in the bill of exceptions is upon the overruling of the motion for a new trial, and the motion contained only the usual general grounds. If the plaintiff, when the remittitur from this court is made the judgment of the lower court, will write off $23.64, the amount found for attorney's fees, the judgment will be affirmed; otherwise it will be reversed.

1. Homicide  $\S$  300(14)—Instruction as to application of doctrine of reasonable fears held not erroneous.

The court did not err in charging the jury that "the doctrine of reasonable fears only applies when the danger is urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing."

2. Criminal law  $\S$  778(5)—Homicide  $\S$  340(4)—Instruction as to presumption that homicide is felonious held proper; instructions as to murder harmless, where defendant convicted of manslaughter.

The following is a quotation from Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. 188, and was properly given in charge to the jury: "The law presumes every homicide to be felonious, until the contrary appears, from circumstances of alleviation, of excuse, or justification; and it is incumbent on the prisoner to make out such circumstances to the satisfaction of the jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him."

3. Instruction authorized by evidence.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the charge on mutual combat. Bailey v. State, 148 Ga. 401, 96 S. E. 862; Fordham v. State, 24 Ga. App. 369, 100 S. E. 790; Weldon v. State, 21 Ga. App. 381(8), 94 S. E. 326, and cases cited.

4. Criminal law  $\S$  825(3)—Homicide  $\S$  309(1)—Instruction as to provocation in language of statute held proper; instruction not erroneous, because of failure to give other proper instructions without request.

The court properly gave in charge section 65 of the Penal Code of 1910 (as to voluntary manslaughter), including the words "provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder." This charge was not rendered erroneous by failure to give in connection therewith other appropriate instructions. Grimsley v. Singletary, 138 Ga. 57(3), 65 S. E. 92, 134 Am. St. Rep. 196; Conley v. State, 21 Ga. App. 134(1), 94 S. E. 261. The rulings just cited apply also to the tenth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial. If fuller instructions were desired, they should have been requested as required by section 1087 of the Penal Code of 1910, and section 6084 of the Civil Code of 1910.

5. Criminal law  $\S$  1160—Verdict supported by evidence, and approved, not disturbed.

BLOODWORTH, J. We will discuss only the first and second headnotes.

[1] 1. In the fourth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complaint is made that the court, after charging sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code of 1910, added:

"The doctrine of reasonable fears only applies when the danger is urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing."

It is insisted:

That this charge "deprived the defendant of the right to rely upon justification of the killing under the fears of a reasonable man," that it "qualified or limited the law of justifiable homicide as contained in sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code," and that "it confined the jury's investigation to what happened at the instant of the killing."

The charge is not subject to these criticisms. In Williams v. State, 120 Ga. 873, 48 S. E. 370, Mr. Justice Evans said:

"The court, while charging as to what the law regards as the fears of a reasonably courageous man, told the jury that the danger apprehended must be urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing." It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that this instruction was not applicable to this case, and could only apply to a case where the evidence disclosed 'a mutual intention to fight.' We cannot concur in this view. 'A bare fear' of injury can never be regarded as sufficient to justify a homicide. Penal Code, § 71. And, as was said in the case of Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 271(1): "The doctrine of reasonable fear as a defense does not apply to any case of homicide where the danger apprehended is not urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing."

Counsel for plaintiff in error insists that the charge in that case is different from the one under consideration, because in that case the court charged the jury that the danger apprehended must be urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing, and in the charge in this case the word apprehended was omitted. We think this is "a distinction without a difference." However, in Tolbirt v. State, 124 Ga. 773 (4), 53 S. E. 327, the Supreme Court approved a charge in the exact language of the one of which complaint is made in this ground of the motion for a new trial, except that in this case the word "killing" is used, and in that the word "homicide." To say that the excerpt from the charge quoted above confined the jury's investigation to what happened at the instant of the killing is to give to the charge too narrow a construction. Moreover immediately following the instruction complained of the judge charged the jury that—

"In order to justify the killing under the excitement of the fears of a reasonable man, all the circumstances as they appeared to him must have been sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that his life or limb was in danger or that his person was in danger, and it must appear that he acted under such fears as these, and that he did not act in a spirit of revenge."

Nor did the judge, in charging as to the different defenses which may arise under sections 70, 71, and 73 of the Penal Code, charge in such a way as would likely confuse these defenses. The instructions as to these different defenses were given separately, and the judge gave the jury appropriate instructions as to the cases in which the provisions of section 73 are applicable.

[2-5] 2. In the fifth and seventh grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial it is alleged that the court erred in giving to the jury the following charge:

"The law presumes every homicide to be felonious, until the contrary appears, from circumstances of alleviation, of excuse, or justification; and it is incumbent on the prisoner to make out such circumstances to the satisfaction of the jury, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him."

This is a quotation from the opinion in the case of Hudgins v. State, 2 Ga. 188, and was properly given in charge to the jury in this case. In immediate connection with this excerpt the judge charged the jury that—

"If the evidence relied upon by the state to show the killing contains circumstances of alleviation or justification, the burden of proof that the crime was murder is not shifted."

But, even if this excerpt from the charge and that complained of in ground 6 of the motion for a new trial could be considered as erroneous, each was given while the judge was charging the jury on the subject of murder, and neither charge could have been harmful to the defendant, who was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. See Thompson v. State, 24 Ga. App. 144, 99 S. E. 891, and cases cited.

Criminal law §—935(2)—Master and servant §—343—Elements to be proved in prosecution for enticing servant to leave employer stated; new trial erroneously denied when essential facts not proved.

The accused was indicted under section 125 of the Penal Code of 1910. On the trial of the case the state failed to prove at least two essential elements of the crime: (a) That the defendant knew that there was a legal contract between the servant and employer (Rucker v. State, 2 Ga. App. 143, 99 S. E. 295); (b) that the defendant, by offering higher wages, or in some other way, did "entice, persuade, or decoy, or attempt to entice, persuade, or decoy" the servant to leave his employer during the term of service, knowing that said servant was so employed (Broughton v. State, 114 Ga. 34 [1], 39 S. E. 866). The proof failing in these respects, the verdict is without evidence to support it, and the judge erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. See McAllister v. State, 122 Ga. 744, 50 S. E. 921.

Error from City Court of Miller County; W. I. Geer, Judge.

MUTUAL BEN. LIFE INS. CO. v. FOWLER.
(No. 11790.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
June 14, 1921.)

1. Rules on evidence not erroneous.

No error that would require the grant of a new trial was committed in any of the rulings on the admission of evidence of which complaint is made in grounds 5, 6, and 7, or in rejecting evidence as complained of in ground 8, of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  302(3)—Ground complaining of admission of evidence must set forth or attach it as exhibit.

This court and the Supreme Court have repeatedly ruled that a ground of a motion for a new trial based on the admission of evidence presents nothing for adjudication if such evidence is not set forth, either literally or in substance, or attached as an exhibit to the motion. Bennett v. Patten, 148 Ga. 68 (8a), 95 S. E. 690, and cases cited; Smith v. Leverett, 22 Ga. App. 290(2), 96 S. E. 8, and cases cited. As the evidence the admission of which is complained of in grounds 9 and 10 of the motion for a new trial is not set out literally or in substance, these grounds present nothing for consideration by this court.

3. Trial  $\S$  256(1)—Fuller charge on any phase of case should be requested before jury retires.

No reversible error is found in the excerpts from the charge of the court of which complaint is made. The charge covered all the material issues of the case accurately and clearly. If a fuller charge on any phase of the case was desired, a proper written request therefor should have been made to the court before the jury retired to consider of their verdict.

4. New trial  $\S$  70—Properly denied when evidence supported verdict.

There was evidence to support the finding of the jury, which has the approval of the trial judge, and the motion for a new trial was properly overruled.

Error from Superior Court, Meriwether County; J. R. Terrell, Judge.

Action between the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company and Bluford Fowler. Judgment for the latter, and the former brings error. Affirmed.

Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

1. Time  $\S$  10(8)—Statute as to computation applied to time for filing bill of exceptions.

"When a number of days is prescribed for the exercise of any privilege, or the discharge of any duty, only the first or last day shall be counted; and if the last day shall fall on the Sabbath, another day shall be allowed in the computation." 1 Park's Ann. Code, § 4, par. 8. Under this ruling, and the facts of the instant case, the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that it was not filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court within 15 days of the date of its certification is denied.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  598(6)—Defendant held not to have exercised due diligence to obtain absent witness for whom continuance was sought.

The indictment was returned by the grand jury of the county of Laurens on July 28, 1920. He was tried and convicted on February 24, 1921, and had been in jail two or three months before the date of his trial. When arraigned for trial he made a motion for a continuance of the case, on the ground of the absence of a material witness, who lived in Laurens county. He testified that on Monday before his trial on Thursday he had a subpoena issued for the absent witness, and gave it the same day to the sheriff to be served; that he was in jail, and could not serve it himself. There was no evidence that the subpoena had been served. Held, under the above facts it did not appear that the accused had used due diligence to get the absent witness to court, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in denying the continuance. See, in this connection, Revel v. State, 26 Ga. 275 (2); Long v. State, 38 Ga. 491 (3); Bone v. State, 8 Ga. App. 373 (1), 69 S. E. 37.

3. Sufficiency of evidence.

The evidence demanded the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

CARRIGHT v. STATE. (No. 12437.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
June 30, 1921.)

1. Sufficiency of proof of venue.

The evidence authorized a finding that the offense charged was committed by the defendant in the county of Carroll.

2. Criminal law §958(1).—Motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence defective when not supported by affidavits of proposed witnesses.

The ground of the motion for a new trial, based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, is fatally defective, as the newly discovered evidence is that of witnesses, and no affidavits as to their residence, associates, means of knowledge, character, and credibility were adduced. Civil Code 1910, § 6086.

3. Verdict authorized by evidence.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

FERGUSON v. R. C. HOGAN & BROS. (No. 12413.)

July 12, 1921.)

1. Sales §219(2).—Where buyer for cash obtains possession without payment, subsequent acceptance of part payment held not to change agreement.

Where personal property is sold for cash, and not on credit, and the buyer obtains possession of the property without paying for it, the mere acceptance by the seller a few days thereafter of a sum of money from the buyer as part payment of the purchase price of the property does not change the transaction from a cash sale to a credit sale; and a third person who buys the property from the original purchaser obtains no title thereto, and the property can be recovered by the original seller in an action in trover. It would be otherwise if, when the partial payment was made, there was an understanding between the parties that the original agreement as to a cash sale was abrogated, and an agreement for a credit sale substituted.

2. Sufficiency of evidence.

Under the above ruling, and the facts of the case, the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs was authorized by the evidence, and none of the special grounds of the motion for a new trial shows material error.

Luke, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Houston County; A. O. Riley, Judge.

Action by R. C. Hogan & Bros. against Alex Ferguson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

O. C. Hancock, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Walter De Fore and Jas. O. Estes, both of Macon, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] Hogan & Bros. brought a suit in trover against Alex Ferguson for the recovery of an automobile. The evidence authorized a finding that the car was sold by the plaintiffs to one Moore for $800, and that the transaction was a cash sale, and not a credit one, and that the original price of the car was $1,000 which was reduced to $800 in consideration of the fact that the sale was to be a cash one. The evidence further authorized a finding that the buyer, by artifice, obtained possession of the car without paying anything for it, and that a few days afterwards the manager of the plaintiffs sent one of their salesmen to Moore with instructions to get the car or the payment thereof from Moore, and that Moore paid the salesman $200 as part payment on the car, and that this money was given to the plaintiffs' manager, who applied it on the purchase price of the car. Subsequently to this payment, Moore sold the car to Ferguson, the defendant in this suit. While there was some evidence that when this payment was made there was an understanding between Moore and the salesman that the transaction should be changed from a cash sale to a credit one, the undisputed evidence was that the salesman had no authority to make such an agreement in behalf of the plaintiffs, and that such an agreement was never made by the plaintiffs or their manager. In the absence of such an agreement, the mere acceptance by the plaintiffs of the $200 as part payment of the purchase price of the car would not, as a matter of law, constitute an abandonment by the plaintiffs of the cash sale and the substitution of a sale on credit.

This ruling is not in conflict with the decision in Moate v. Griswold, 107 S. E. 387, this term decided, relied on by counsel for the plaintiff in error. In that case the property (an electric light plant) was to be sold for cash, and the buyer obtained possession of it without paying for it, and sold it to a third person. When Moate, the original seller of the property, learned of these facts, he went to Griswold, the original buyer, and they agreed upon a settlement as follows: Griswold was to pay Moate $54 and ship him another plant for the one taken. The $54 was paid and retained by Moate, but the other plant was never shipped by Griswold, and Moate brought suit in trover against Griswold to recover the plant. This court held that these facts showed a waiver by Moate of the tortious taking of the property, and a ratification of the conversion, so as to prevent a recovery in trover.

The case of Bullard v. Bank of Madison, 107 Ga. 772, 33 S. E. 684, is likewise easily distinguishable by its facts from the present case. In that case a planter sold cotton for cash, and the purchaser obtained possession of the cotton without paying for it, and sold it to a third person, and the planter, with knowledge of the last sale, took from the person to whom he had sold the cotton for cash his note covering the value of the cotton; and the Supreme Court held that this constituted an abandonment of the cash sale and a ratification of the disposition made of the cotton, and thereby the original purchaser and all who claimed under him were released from liability for any conversion for which they may have been guilty. Furthermore, there was undisputed testimony in the instant case that Ferguson knew at the time he bought the automobile from Moore that the title to the car was in the plaintiffs.

[2] All the issues of fact in the case were submitted to the jury with appropriate instructions thereon, and the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs was amply authorized by the evidence.

All the grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial are based upon alleged errors in the charge of the court, and are without substantial merit. Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I do not agree to the judgment of affirmance in this case, for the reason that, in my opinion, the cash sale of the automobile was abrogated and an agreement for a credit sale substituted. The acceptance of $200 as part payment on the purchase price and the credit of the same upon the books of the company as a credit upon the purchase price rendered the sale one, on credit, thereby divesting the original seller of title. Therefore, in my opinion, an action in trover would not lie against a third person who bought the car subsequently to the payment and acceptance of the $200.

PAYNE, Agent, v. SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO. (No. 12232.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. July 12, 1921.)

1. Removal of causes  $\S$  11—Action by foreign corporation against another having agency in state not removable.

An action by a corporation, resident of New Jersey, against a corporation, resident of Virginia, having an agency in Chatham county, Ga., could not originally have been brought in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia, and hence could not be removed to that court from the superior court of Chatham county on the ground of diverse citizenship. See Pullman Co. v. Sutherland, 150 Ga. 652, 104 S. E. 782.

2. Removal of causes  $\S$  11—Action by foreign corporation against Director General of Railroads held not removable.

An action by Southern Cotton Oil Company, resident of the state of New Jersey, against John Barton Payne, Director General of Railroads, as agent appointed by the President of the United States pursuant to the provisions of the "Transportation Act of February 28, 1920" (41 Stat. 456), arising out of the possession, use, and operation of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, resident of the state of Virginia, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 619, c. 418), entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seventeen, and for other purposes," and under the provisions of the "Federal Control Act" approved March 21, 1918 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S.

Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½p), is not removable from the superior court of Chatham county, Ga., to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia. The action as pleaded could not originally have been brought in such District Court, and by no provision of Transportation Act, 1920, was the status changed.

3. Motion to remove properly overruled.

It was not error for the court to overrule the motion of the defendant to remove the case to the District Court of the United States.

GARCIA S. en C. v. TAGGART COAL CO.
(No. 12181.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
June 17, 1921. Rehearing Denied
June 30, 1921.)

1. Pleading ¶406(1)—Sales ¶416(1)—Evidence not irrelevant or immaterial when tending to prove allegations not attacked by demurrer or motion; in action for seller's breach evidence held erroneously excluded.

When the sufficiency of a petition is not challenged by a demurrer or a motion to strike, and the plaintiff offers evidence which proves, or tends to prove, any allegation in the petition, it is error for the court to reject the evidence on the ground that it is irrelevant and immaterial.

2. Sales ¶418(7)—Buyer on seller's breach must buy best substitute and ordinarily in nearest available market; failure to buy in nearest available market does not prevent recovery where price or transportation cost no greater.

Where it is known to both parties to a contract for the sale of goods, at the time of the execution of the contract, that the goods are being bought for the purpose of resale, and the seller subsequently breaches the contract by failing to deliver the goods within the time designated in the contract, and there is no available market in which the buyer can readily obtain the same quality of goods, the buyer, in order to charge the seller with the difference between the contract price of the goods and the price of the substitute goods, bought by the buyer after the contract was breached with cost of transportation to the place of delivery named in the contract, must purchase the best substitute obtainable, using reasonable care and diligence, and ordinarily must buy them in the nearest available market. However, this rule (as to buying in the nearest available market) is based solely upon the ground that the buyer must lessen the seller's loss as much as possible, and it obviously does not apply in a case where the buyer goes to a market other than the nearest available one, and purchases there as good a substitute, and as cheaply, as he could have bought in the nearest available market, and where the cost of transportation is no more than it would have been if the goods had been bought in the nearest available market.

3. Sales ¶411, 417, 420—Trial ¶139(1)—Petition held to state cause of action for difference between contract price and cost of substitute upon seller's breach; evidence held to warrant finding of seller's knowledge that purchase was for resale; evidence held to make case for jury; when verdict should be directed stated; failure to prove market value except on last date for delivery held not to prevent recovery; "undertake"; buyer's ability and readiness to pay not condition of delivery; evidence held to warrant inference of buyer's ability and readiness to pay price.

The petition set out a cause of action; and, under the evidence adduced, a verdict for the defendant was not demanded. The court therefore erred in directing a verdict in favor of that party.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Marcelino Garcia S. en C. against the Taggart Coal Company. Judgment for defendant on a directed verdict, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The contract sued on in this case is contained in a letter from the plaintiff to the defendant company, dated April 22, 1918, and accepted April 24, 1918, which reads as follows:

"We are pleased to confirm by the present our closing with you through Mr. R. P. Lopes for 10,000 tons of high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland, for delivery by barges at the ports of Sagua la Grande or Caibarien [Cuba], in accord with our instructions, at the price of $13.75 per ton of 2,240 pounds, cost, freight, and insurance, delivery to be made during the months of July to November, 1918, inclusive; it being understood that you will undertake by every possible means to make a proportionate delivery of the entire quantity in each month commencing in July next and finishing in November next. We are to have the privilege on our part of increasing this contract to a maximum of 20,000 tons under the same conditions as applicable to the first 10,000 tons, and which option is to be open to us until the 15th of June, 1918, inclusive. We shall be allowed for the discharge of each barge the time required for tugs to run from port of discharge light to Key West and return to port in Cuba with another bargeload and which time is estimated to be about four days, but in any event we guarantee to take the cargo out as fast as the vessels can deliver same. Payment is to be made 30 days after date of barge's clearance for Cuba, or, if preferable to you, by drafts at 30 days date of clearance of vessels, payable in this city [New York]. In confirmation of this transaction we will appreciate very much returning to us the inclosed duplicate copy of this present letter duly accepted by you and which we require for our files."

The petition alleged among other things, the following facts:

"That at the time said contract was made said defendant company well knew that petitioner was engaged in the business of purchasing coal for resale to sugar mills in Cuba, who required all of their supplies by December 1st in each year for use during the grinding season, beginning soon thereafter, and before said contract was reduced to writing Mr. R. P. Lopez, who is referred to in said contract and who negotiated the purchase of said coal, notified said defendant company that petitioner was purchasing said coal for the purpose aforesaid; that said defendant company failed to make a single delivery of coal under said contract until the month of November of said year; that during the time limit of said contract petitioner repeatedly urged said defendant company to provide means for delivering the 10,000 tons of coal sold to it; that it offered to said defendant company a Cuban tugboat and a fleet of barges which could be chartered from Domingo Nazabal, of Cienfuegos, Cuba, which offer was refused, and that it requested said defendant company to divert some of the coal which it was shipping to Havana, Cuba, to the ports of Sagua la Grande and Caibarien, which request was likewise refused; that during the month of October, 1918, said defendant company authorized petitioner to charter for defendant's account, from the Sugar Products Company of New York City, a small steamer, the Hopper, and several barges to be used in delivering as much coal as possible under said contract from Key West, Fla., to said Cuban ports; but by reason of the fact that said defendant company failed to assemble coal in sufficient quantities at Key West, only 978 tons of coal were delivered by this means during the remainder of the contract time."

The petition contained various letters and telegrams sent by the plaintiff to the defendant company during the life of the contract, urging and demanding deliveries of the coal purchased, and renotifying the defendant of the purpose for which the coal was bought. The petition further alleged:

That the defendant company failed to deliver within the contract time 7,445 tons of the coal purchased; that the market price of coal similar more or less to Westmoreland, at Sagua la Grande and at Caibarien, on November 30, 1918, was $18 per ton, but petitioner was unable to purchase all of the coal remaining undelivered by said defendant company, in sufficient quantities for immediate delivery, in any Cuban market, and was compelled to purchase the greater portion of said coal in the markets of the United States and to deliver same by steamers at said Cuban ports; that "in order to make prompt deliveries of coal to its customers in Cuba petitioner purchased and transported from Newport News, Va., to Caibarien, Cuba, by the steamship Ottar, 1,937 tons of coal at a total cost, including the purchase price, freight, and insurance, of $31,928.36; that it purchased and transported from Newport News to Caibarien, by the steamship Nicholas Cuneo, 827 tons of coal at a total cost, including the purchase price, freight, and insurance, of $13,371.30; that it purchased and transported from Newport News to Sagua la Grande, by the steamship Thyra S., 1,603 tons of coal at a total cost, including the purchase price, freight, and insurance, of $25,080.88; that it purchased and transported from Newport News to Caibarien, by the steamship Adonis, 1,955 tons of coal at a total cost, including the purchase price, freight, and insurance, of $32,119.13, and that it purchased at Sagua la Grande, Cuba, 1,123 tons of coal at $18 per ton, or at a total cost of $20,214, making a total of 7,445 tons so purchased for the purpose of replacing nondeliveries by said defendant company, at a total cost of $122,713.67;" that "for the purpose of moving said coal from Newport News to Cuba petitioner was compelled to charter from the Munson Steamship Line, as agents for the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, the steamships Ottar and Adonis, and from the Atlantic Fruit Company of New York the steamship Nicholas Cuneo, and was required in the case of each steamship so chartered to make and execute a charter party," containing provisions for demurrage; that, "although each cargo was loaded and discharged as fast as the port facilities at Newport News and Caibarien would permit," petitioner "incurred and became liable to pay demurrage bills aggregating the sum of $11,555.11."

Attached to the petition as an exhibit was an itemized statement of each demurrage bill. The petition further alleged that—

"By reason of the failure of said defendant company to deliver 7,445 tons of the coal purchased from it in accordance with the terms of the contract, petitioner sustained an actual loss and damage of $81,900.03."

A statement of petitioner's alleged damages was attached to the petition as an exhibit. By way of amendment petitioner alleged that—

"All of the coal purchased as aforesaid was of the kind described in petitioner's contract with said defendant company, except the cargoes shipped on the steamers Ottar and Adonis, which were New River coals once screened, a very lumpy coal, and the best substitute to be found in the market at the time said cargoes were respectively purchased; that said coal was purchased at the lowest prices obtainable for immediate delivery; and that the whole amount was delivered in Cuba by January 20, 1919, at the smallest cost and expense possible."

The defendant filed an answer admitting the contract but denying any liability thereunder, and denying that the defendant was notified at the time the contract was made that the coal was being purchased for the purpose of resale. The defendant admitted also that it had failed to deliver within the contract time 7,445 tons of the coal purchased from it, but alleged that deliveries were made after the contract time, with the full knowledge and consent of the plaintiff; also that if the plaintiff had purchased and transported coal from Newport News, Va., as stated in the petition, the same was not done under any contract with the defendant, and the defendant is not responsible therefor, and that the defendant was given no notice of what the plaintiff proposed to do and no opportunity for furnishing the coal called for by the contract. By an amendment to the answer the defendant expressly denied that it was liable for any of the damages or expenses set out in the petition, or that any of them were collectable, even if the damages were sustained and the expenses incurred.

No demurrer, either general or special, was interposed, and the court, after excluding certain evidence offered by the plaintiff, directed a verdict for the defendant; the court saying to the jury:

"I have had a great deal of difficulty in coming finally to a conclusion as to the law of this case. It has interested me a great deal, the arguments were illuminating, and the respective positions of the parties forcefully presented. I have given to it every moment of available time since you were discharged on Wednesday, and I have finally come to the conclusion to charge you as per the first request of the defendant in the case, that is to say, that in view of the pleadings and the law [italics ours] the court directs the jury to find in favor of the defendant, and I will ask Judge Adams to enter a verdict to that effect."

To this judgment the plaintiff excepted, and assigned error upon the rejection of the proffered testimony, and also upon the direction of the verdict. In order to avoid repetition the material evidence excluded by the court, as well as that admitted, is not set forth in this statement of facts, but will be found stated in the following opinion.

Hitch, Denmark & Lovett, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Adams & Adams, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, O. J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] The plaintiff in error contends that under the ruling in the case of Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Adam & Steinbrugge, 134 Ga. 821, 68 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.)

192, the petition set forth a cause of action; whereas the defendant in error contends that under the ruling of this court in Twin City Lumber Co. v. Daniels, 22 Ga. App. 578, 96 S. E. 437, it did not. In each of these cases the decision is well considered and ably written, but, when carefully compared, the decisions are not at all conflicting. The Hardwood Lumber Co. Case was a suit for the breach of a contract for the failure to deliver a specified quality of lumber; the plaintiffs alleging that the defendant had notice at the time the contract was made that the lumber in question was purchased for the purpose of resale, and that, by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract, they were compelled to buy lumber to fill their subcontract at a higher price than that at which they had purchased it from the defendant, and sought to recover as damages the difference between the contract price of the lumber and the price they were forced to pay for it, plus the expense of transportation. They recovered the full amount sued for, a motion for a new trial was overruled, and the defendant excepted, contending that the proper measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place fixed for delivery. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the trial court; the first, second, and third headnotes of the decision being as follows:

"The general rule is that in a suit for breach of contract for failure to deliver goods of a certain quality sold at a specified price, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery. This is not an inflexible rule in all cases, so as to exclude a recovery of actual damages sustained in cases to which such rule in its very nature is inapplicable; as, where there is no market at the time and place of delivery by which damages can be measured, and resort must be had to the nearest available market, with the cost of shipment to the place of delivery added. If goods are bought for the purpose of resale, and so known to both parties, and upon failure of the seller to deliver there is no market in which the buyer can readily obtain them, he may go into the market and purchase the best substitute obtainable, using reasonable care and diligence, and charging the seller with the difference between the contract price of the goods and the price of the goods substituted." (Italics ours.)

In discussing these principles, Justice Lumpkin, who delivered the opinion for the court, said:

"Damages are given as compensation for the injury done. 'Damages recoverable for a breach of contract are such as arise naturally and according to the usual course of things from such breach, and such as the parties contemplated when the contract was made, as the probable result of its breach.' Civil Code, § 3799 (Civil Code 1910, § 4395). 'Any necessary expenses which one of two contracting parties incurred in complying with the contract may be recovered as damages." Section 3806 (Civil Code 1910, § 4402). One injured by a breach of contract is bound to lessen the damages as far as practicable by the use of ordinary care and diligence. Section 3802 (Civil Code 1910, § 4398)."

After stating the general rule already quoted from the headnotes, the opinion proceeds as follows:

"It is evident that the general rule cannot be taken as a Procrustean one, subject to no exception or modification. If so, it would exclude the possibility of recovering profits, where [which were] in contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract."

The court in that case quoted with approval and evidently based its decision upon Mr. Benjamin's statement of the rule (2 Benjamin on Sales [6th Am. Ed.] § 1327), which is, in part, as follows:

"If at the time of the sale the existence of a subcontract is made known to the seller, the buyer, on the seller's default in delivering goods, has two courses open to him: (1) He may elect to fulfill his subcontract, and for that purpose go into the market and purchase the best substitute obtainable, charging the seller with the difference between the contract price of the goods and the price of the goods substituted. (2) He may elect to abandon his subcontract, and in that case he may recover as damages against the seller (a) his loss of profits on the sub-sale, and (b) any penalties he may be liable to pay for breach of his subcontract. * * * If at the time of the sale the existence of a subcontract is not made known to the seller, a knowledge on his part that the buyer is purchasing with the general intention to resell, or notice of the subcontract given to him subsequent to the date of the contract, will not render him liable for the buyer's loss of profits on such subcontract; the buyer may either procure the best substitute for the goods as before, and fulfill his subcontract, charging the seller with the difference in price, or abandon the subcontract and bring his action for damages, when the ordinary rule, it would seem, will apply. * * * In every case the buyer, to entitle him to recover the full amount of damages, must have acted throughout as a reasonable man of business, and done all in his power to mitigate the loss." (Italics ours.)

[3] How stands the instant case in comparison with the Hardwood Lumber Co. Case? The allegations of the present petition were sufficient to make a case for actual damages sustained by reason of the defendant's breach of its contract, to wit: The difference between the contract price and the price of the coal purchased by the plaintiff in order to carry out the subcontract, plus the cost of freight, demurrage, and insurance. The petition alleges (and in determining whether a cause of action was set forth the allegations must be treated as true) that at the time the contract was made the defendant well knew that the plaintiff was engaged in the business of purchasing coal for resale to sugar mills in Cuba which required all of their supplies by the 1st of December, and that R. P. Lopez, who is referred to in the contract and who negotiated the purchase of the coal, notified the defendant, before the contract was reduced to writing, that the plaintiff was buying the coal for the specific purpose of resale. We are therefore constrained to hold that the petition set forth a cause of action under the exception to the general rule announced in the Hardwood Lumber Co. Case, supra.

As to the case of Twin City Lumber Co. v. Daniels, supra, it is clearly distinguishable from the Hardwood Lumber Co. Case and the case sub Judice. In fact, Judge Bloodworth, who wrote the decision in that case for the court, not only recognized the binding force of the Hardwood Lumber Co. Case, but took occasion to differentiate it. He said:

"The plaintiff in error relies largely on the case of Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Adam, supra. That case is easily differentiated from the instant one. There the seller had knowledge at the time of the execution of the contract, and at the time of each extension thereof, that the lumber was purchased for the purpose of resale. The petition in this case does not disclose such a condition." (Italics ours.)

The case of Sanders, Swann & Co. v. Allen, 124 Ga. 684, 52 S. E. 884, is also easily differentiated from the case under review, since it is stated in that case that—"It was not alleged or shown that the defendants had any notice that the cotton they contracted to sell the plaintiffs had been resold by them."

[1] Having seen that the petition set forth a cause of action, and that therefore the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant, "in view of the pleadings and the law," we must next consider whether or not the verdict directed was demanded under the evidence; for, if the ruling of the court was correct for any reason, it should be affirmed. This calls upon us to first determine whether certain evidence offered by the plaintiff was erroneously rejected. We think it was. The legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's petition was not challenged by demurrer or a motion in the nature thereof, and—

"It cannot be at this time even a matter of slight doubt that a plaintiff is entitled to prove everything he alleges in a petition upon which he is permitted to go to trial without objection on the part of the defendant, either to its form or its substance." Mayor, etc., of Macon v. Melton, 115 Ga. 153, 41 S. E. 499.

The depositions of F. H. Rhol tended to establish material allegations of the petition, and were therefore improperly rejected. This witness testified, by depositions, as to the quantity of coal purchased by the plaintiff, after the breach of the contract, at Newport News, and its cost, including the purchase price, freight, and insurance; also that high volatile coal is of a lumpier nature than low volatile coal, and that two of the cargoes were high volatile coal, similar more or less to "Westmoreland" coal, and that the two other cargoes "were New River coals, once screened, also very lumpy," and "came at that time nearest to anything to Westmoreland that we could find in the market"; also that—

"At the time the sales were made the United States government had established the prices for export coal, * * * and the price charges there were * * * tidewater prices. I don't think Marcelino Garcia S. en C. could have purchased this coal at a lower price. I don't think so, as the prices at that given period were established by the United States Fuel Administration. * * * Those prices were absolutely in vogue at the time of these sales. We had to be thoroughly familiar with the prices of coal at that time. * * * There was a great shortness of coal, and I doubt very much if Garcia could have bought any coal in Cuba at that time. I was familiar with the transportation rates of coal from the United States of America to Cuban ports and particularly ports of Caibarien and Sagua la Grande at that time. * * * The rate was the same from every American port to these Cuban ports." (Italics ours.)

As to the charter parties referred to in the petition, this witness testified:

"There was a uniform charter party, as approved by the joint committee of the West Indies transportation of the United States Shipping Board and United States Fuel Administration, covering those clauses, and all charter parties made under that form carried the demurrage and dispatch clause as expressed therein, namely, 48 cents per gross registered ton per day, and 16 cents per gross registered ton per day dispatched, the steamer to discharge at the rate of 300 tons per running day, Sundays and holidays excepted, except in the case when a steamer was under demurrage."

This witness testified also, on cross-examination, that all restrictions by the Shipping Board and fixed rates that he had mentioned applied "to all tonnage whether they were barges or steamers" (italics ours). (It will be recalled that the contract called for the shipment of the coal by barges.) The rejected testimony of Carlos Garcia also tended to establish material allegations of the plaintiff's petition, and was likewise erroneously excluded. This witness offered to testify as follows:

"I made these purchases of coal for quick delivery to the sugar mills in Cuba to replace the coal that the Taggart Coal Company had failed to deliver to us. The necessity at the time of making purchases for immediate delivery at Sagua la Grande or Caibarien was that we were at the beginning of December already, and we were continuously receiving cables from our clients in Cuba, the sugar mills, stating that if they did not receive the coal during December at the latest, since it was already delayed, that they would make us responsible for their losses. I made efforts to buy this coal from others. * * * I could secure nothing for immediate shipment. I purchased the New River coal that these invoices called for because this was the only coal available for immediate delivery. The quality is very similar to the coal specified in our contract with Taggart. * * * There is only a difference in price of $.289 per ton. * * * I did not hesitate in buying that coal. * * * The coal was accepted by the sugar mills." (Italics ours.)

The rejected interrogatories of W. W. Houston also clearly tended to establish material allegations of the petition, and were therefore erroneously excluded. This witness' testimony related to the quantity of coal loaded on each steamer, and also furnished facts and figures as to the cost of loading each steamer, necessary to compute demurrage charges. The same is true of the rejected interrogatories of Arturo Alfonso Acosta, whose testimony related to and tended to establish the allegations of the petition as to the quantity of coal unloaded by the plaintiff in Cuba, and furnished facts and figures necessary to compute demurrage charges. The certified copies of the four charter parties were likewise erroneously excluded, since this documentary evidence contained the freight rate on coal from Newport News to the Cuban ports, etc.

The following evidence was admitted: R. B. Lopez, a witness for the plaintiff, testified:

"I know the plaintiff and defendant in this case. I am the Mr. R. P. Lopez who is mentioned in the contract involved in this case. At the time of my negotiations with the Taggart Coal Company, and before this contract was reduced to writing and signed, I had a conversation with Mr. Grant Taggart, president of the company, in regard to the time limit of the contract and as to why the time limit should be fixed as between July and November, inclusive. I told him that the contract had to be fulfilled in all its terms; of course, must have the coal there on time on account of it has to be received by the sugar mills. I made statement to him as to purpose for which this coal was to be purchased; that it was for the sugar mills in Cuba and that they had to deliver them on time." (Italics ours.)

This evidence tended to support the allegation of the petition that the defendant had notice at the time the contract was made that the coal in question was purchased for resale. So, also, the following telegram from the defendant to the plaintiff, which was introduced in evidence, tended to establish that such notice was given the defendant:

"It is believed freight rate advanced by government will be as high as eighty cents per ton. Therefore we advise regarding your option ten thousand tons you include this in your selling price as you have not yet effected same not having declared your option with us." (Italics ours.)

The jury were authorized to find from the above evidence that the defendant knew when the contract was made that the coal was the subject of resale.

It will be recalled that one of the defenses set up in the defendant's plea was that the plaintiff received, under the contract, all the coal delivered to the plaintiff, regardless of time. The evidence as to this shows that the first deliverance of coal under the contract was on November 2, 1918; the shipment being from Savannah, Ga., on the barge Benefactor, and constituted 709 tons. The defendant also shipped to the plaintiff, during the latter part of November, 1918, two more cargoes of coal, amounting to 620 tons. These were the only deliverances of coal prior to the expiration of the contract. It is true that several shipments were made by defendant and accepted by the plaintiff after the expiration of the contract, but the parties specifically agreed that these shipments should not prejudice any claim of the plaintiff for delayed deliveries or non-deliveries. In this connection the record shows the following documentary and oral testimony:

Telegram from plaintiff to defendant, dated December 4, 1918:

"Informed that barge number four did not sail from Key West and was discharged and is repairing there. Sugar Products Company proposed shipping portion discharged cargo by Hopper and balance by barge. Do you agree to this? Wire answer immediately. If cargo so shipped within five days from date will accept draft for purchase price of cargo. This is without prejudice to our claims under contract for nondeliveries and delayed deliveries." (Italics ours.)

To this telegram the defendant replied:

"We agree to handling of delayed cargo barge number four as indicated in your wire," etc.

The only other shipment of coal after the expiration of the contract was made on or about December 2, 1918, and, as will be seen from the following evidence, was received by the plaintiff with the express understanding that its acceptance would be without prejudice to the plaintiff's claim for damages. Telegram from defendant to plaintiff:

"Expect barge Savannah finished loading Friday. Waiting your reply to our day letter of yesterday."

Plaintiff replied:

"To avoid delay will accept draft now on way for selling price 350 tons steamer Hopper. Wire consent to such partial acceptance. Will accept further draft for price of 500 tons upon clearance of barge number four from Key West if cleared within five days from date. Will accept draft for selling price cargo barge Savannah upon clearance if cleared within five days from date. This is without prejudice to our claim for nondeliveries or for delayed deliveries." (Italics ours.)

As to the conversation between the president of the defendant company and the plaintiff's New York representative, set forth in the record, and which the defendant insists showed that the plaintiff agreed after the expiration of the contract to accept the balance of the coal, and that an estoppel in favor of the defendant resulted therefrom because the defendant acted on the agreement to its hurt: Conceding, but not deciding, that the New York representative of the plaintiff had authority to make such an agreement, it is sufficient to say that the evidence was in sharp conflict, and did not demand a finding in favor of the defendant upon this point, either as to the fact of the agreement or that the defendant acted upon the alleged agreement to its hurt, since the undisputed evidence showed that it had purchased the tug Condon before the alleged understanding with the plaintiff.

There was also evidence introduced to show that the defendant had a large supply of coal, approximately 5,000 tons, in Key West during the summer or early fall of 1918, which, instead of being shipped to the plaintiff, was sold to others. There was also evidence tending to show that the defendant's supply of coal at Key West on November 30, 1918, was exhausted. In support of the allegation that the plaintiff was unable to purchase in a Cuban market all of the coal remaining undelivered in sufficient quantities for immediate delivery, the plaintiff introduced C. F. Iglesias, a Cuban coal dealer, who testified:

"I have been in the business of buying and selling coal in the Cuban market since 1910. As to what is the trade meaning of the expression 'high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland,' I only know two classes of coal handled in Cuba, fine or lumpy. Westmoreland is a lumpy coal. I was familiar with the market price of coal at Sagua la Grande on November 30, 1918. The market price of high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland, at Sagua la Grande on November 30, 1918, was about $20 per ton. I do not know what was the market price of the same kind of coal at Caibarien on November 30, 1918. My firm did sell to Marcelino Garcia S. en C. on November 30, 1918, 250 tons of coal at $18 per ton. It was impossible to have purchased as much as 7,445 tons of high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland, in any Cuban market for immediate delivery at Sagua la Grande or Caibarien on or about November 30, 1918."

This witness was corroborated in all material particulars by the witness Fitzgibbon, another coal dealer of Cuba. In this connection Marcelino Garcia, the active partner of the plaintiff firm, testified as follows:

"As to my experience in buying and selling coal in Cuba, I have had over 12 years' experience as an importer of coal. The trade meaning of the expression 'high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland,' is in Cuba steam lumpy coal. I was familiar with the market price of coal at Sagua la Grande and Caibarien, Cuba, on November 30, 1918. The market price of high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland, at Sagua la Grande on November 30, 1918, was over $18 per ton. The market price of the same kind of coal at Caibarien, Cuba, on November 30, 1918, was the same as in Sagua la Grande. As to query, 'Did you or your firm purchase any coal at Sagua la Grande or Caibarien on November 30, 1918, and, if so, please state amount,' etc. We did; 1,128 tons, at $18 per ton, Westmoreland coal."

Edward Garcia, general manager for the plaintiff at Sagua la Grande, Cuba, testified that on or about November 30, 1918, there was a great scarcity of rolling stock of the railroads in Cuba, and that this condition had existed for the past six or seven years, and that he was thoroughly familiar with the shipping conditions in Cuba; that on or about November 30, 1918, it was impossible to purchase 7,445 tons of high volatile coal, similar more or less to Westmoreland, for immediate delivery at Caibarien or Sagua la Grande; that it was not possible to obtain at Sagua la Grande or Caibarien that amount of coal for immediate delivery except by importing it from the United States; that there was plenty of coal in Havana, but it could not be bought any cheaper or delivered any quicker than if bought at Newport News; that the scarcity of coal cars in Cuba was so great, and the shipping conditions so bad, that it was not possible to get a quick delivery from Havana; that "when a car leaves Havana we never know when it will get there;" "we could get quicker delivery from Hampton Roads than we could get from Havana, absolutely;" that the expense of buying coal at Havana, including the transportation to Sagua la Grande and Caibarien, was greater than if the coal had been bought at Newport News; that none of the Havana coal companies would undertake to deliver coal on cars within a certain time.

We are of the opinion that the above evidence, together with that erroneously excluded, with all reasonable deductions and inferences therefrom, was sufficient to make out a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and, since the evidence introduced by the defendant was insufficient to overcome that case so fully as to leave no question for submission to the jury, the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant. As was so aptly and succinctly said in the case of Davis v. Kirkland, 1 Ga. App. 5, 58 S. E. 209:

"No principle is better settled in Georgia than that a verdict should not be directed, unless there is no issue of fact; or unless the proved facts, viewed from every possible legal point of view, can sustain no other finding than that directed. * * * The paramount right of the jury to decide any issue of fact in every case, in Georgia, is absolutely exclusive of any such prerogative on the part of the judge. The exercise of this power by the jury, unless waived by the parties, is an indispensable requisite of a legal trial in this state, and an invasion of this right (as has been held by our Supreme Court times without number) demands the grant of another trial."

The contention of the defendant that the plaintiff's case must fail, for the reason "that the deliveries were to be made by installments and there was no effort to show the market price at any date save on the 30th of November, the last day under a contract covering five months for delivery to be made," is without substantial merit. The contract provided:

"Delivery to be made during the months of July to November 1918, inclusive; it being understood that you will undertake by every possible means to make a proportionate delivery of the entire quantity in each month, commencing in July next and finishing in November next."

Obviously the only absolute and mandatory obligation imposed by the contract was that the coal must be delivered "during the months of July to November, 1918, inclusive." The word "undertake," according to Webster's Dictionary, means, among other things, "endeavor to perform," "attempt," and "try." While it seems true, from the correspondence of the parties, introduced in evidence, that the plaintiff desired the coal delivered in monthly installments, and that the defendant agreed to so deliver it, if it possibly could, yet it does not appear, either from the contract itself or from the construction given it by the parties thereto, that the defendant absolutely obligated itself to so deliver the coal. Furthermore, the jury were authorized to infer from the evidence that as a matter of fact it was impossible for the defendant so to deliver the coal, and that, when this fact became apparent, both parties to the contract waived the requirement, if there was such a requirement, in the contract, that the coal must be delivered in monthly installments. Under these facts we do not think the failure of the plaintiff to allege and prove the market price of the coal at any date except the 30th of November should prevent a recovery in its favor.

Neither is there any substantial merit in the further contention of the defendant that—

The "plaintiff's case must fail because he has not alleged and proven that he was able and ready to perform during the time of the existence of the contract, by paying the price at the time and place of delivery."

The plaintiff's ability and readiness to pay was not "a condition of the delivery," for the contract expressly provided that payment was to be made 30 days after date of barge's clearance for Cuba, or, if preferable to seller, "by drafts at 30 days date of clearance of vessels," payable in New York City. Furthermore, there is a clear inference from the evidence that the plaintiff promptly paid the defendant for all the coal delivered under the contract. The evidence also shows that shortly after the breach of the contract the plaintiff bought the amount of coal the defendant had failed to deliver under the contract and paid for it a higher price than the contract price. The jury were authorized to infer from this evidence that the plaintiff was able and ready to pay the defendant the contract price during the life of the contract.

Nor can we agree with the contention of the learned counsel for the defendant that the plaintiff's case should fail because the proof showed that, after the defendant's breach of the contract, the substitute coal was not purchased by the plaintiff in the nearest available market. The only reasons for requiring the buyer to purchase substitute goods in the nearest available market are: First, because conditions there, including the quality of the goods and the price thereof, are apt to be nearer like those at the market fixed for delivery than at a more distant market; and, second, because the cost of transportation therefrom naturally and ordinarily would be less than from a more distant market. However, where the buyer purchases the substitute in a market which is not the nearest available market, but obtains as good a substitute, and as cheaply, as he could have bought in the nearest available market, and the cost of transportation from the market in which he bought the goods is no more than it would have been from the nearest available market, the reasons for requiring the purchaser to resort to the nearest available market fall. And in such a case the failure of the purchaser to buy in the nearest available market will not prevent him from recovering as damages the difference between the contract price and the price of the goods substituted, with cost of transportation to the place of delivery and other necessary expenses. In other words, after the seller breaches the contract by failing to deliver the goods ordered, the buyer is required to do everything necessary and reasonable to lessen his damages (Civil Code 1910, § 4398), but when he has done that he has done all that the law requires of him. This ruling is simply plain common sense, and its inherent soundness is so obvious that it needs no citation of authority to bolster it up.

tute coal in the nearest available market, the undisputed evidence showed that the defendant suffered no loss because of this. While the evidence was perhaps conflicting as to whether or not, after the contract was breached, coal in sufficient quantity could have been purchased by the plaintiff at Havana—the nearest available market—the undisputed testimony was that the 6,322 tons of coal purchased by the plaintiff at Newport News, Va., were bought and transported to Sagua la Grande and Calbarien at a less cost than if they had been purchased at Havana, since the market price of coal at Havana was "around $14," and the freight rate per ton from there to Sagua la Grande "was $2.63." At these figures, 6,322 tons of coal at $14 per ton, plus $2.63 per ton for freight, would amount to $105,134.86, whereas the plaintiff bought this amount of coal at Newport News and transported it to the above-named Cuban ports at a total cost, including purchase price, freight, demurrage, and insurance, of $102,499.67. As to any American markets nearer and more available than Newport News, suffice it to say that the depositions of the witness Rhol, which the court erroneously excluded, undisputably show that at the time the coal in question was purchased the government had established prices for export coal, and that the price paid by the plaintiff was the "tidewater" price, and also that the transportation rate fixed by the United States Shipping Board was the same from every American port to the ports of Sagua la Grande and Calbarien.

While the plaintiff alleged in the petition, and showed by the evidence, what was the market price of coal on November 30, 1918, at the places fixed for delivery, the evidence authorized a finding that, after the breach of the contract, in neither of those markets, nor in any other Cuban market, could the plaintiff have readily obtained for quick delivery the necessary amount of coal of the kind contracted for or of any good substitute therefor. The plaintiff therefore had the right to buy the substitute coal in the nearest available market, or, under the particular and extraordinary facts of this case, to buy it in any market in the United States. (The order of the United States Shipping Board making the cost of transportation the same from any port of the United States to any Cuban port was obviously based upon the abnormal conditions caused by the great World War.) This ruling is not in conflict with those former decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court that hold that the buyer in certain instances must resort to the nearest available market; but, under the extraordinary fact in this case that the cost of buying the coal at Newport News, Va. (including the cost of transportation), was no more than if it had been bought in the nearest available market, it is in perfect harmony and accord with the broad principles of fair and just dealings upon which those decisions are based.

In sum, under the particular and peculiar facts of this case, the petition set out a cause of action; the evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions was erroneously excluded; and a finding for the defendant was not demanded by the evidence adduced. The court therefore erred in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

VARNER v. STATE. (No. 12444.)

July 12, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §778(4)—Instruction held sufficient as to burden of proof.

An explicit and comprehensive charge on the subject of reasonable doubt, wherein the jury are instructed in effect that the defendant enters into the trial of his case with the presumption of innocence in his favor, which continues with him throughout the case until the evidence produced by the state shows his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, sufficiently informs the jury that the burden is on the state to prove the defendant guilty. See, in this connection, Thomas v. State, 129 Ga. 419 (4), 59 S. E. 246.

2. Criminal law §789(8)—Instruction that evidence must satisfy jury "to reasonable and moral certainty," and that this was the same as "beyond a reasonable doubt," held proper.

The phrases "to a moral and reasonable certainty" and "beyond a reasonable doubt," as applied to the quality of proof in a case, being identical in meaning (Austin v. State, 6 Ga. App. 211, 64 S. E. 670), it was not error for the court to charge the jury that "it is necessary that the state do more than raise a mere possibility of guilt; it must produce evidence that has the convincing power to satisfy the jury to a reasonable and moral certainty, which is the same thing as to say to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Second Series, To a Moral Certainty.]

3. Instructions not erroneous.

The grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, complaining that the court erred in charging the jury upon the subject of "good character," and with reference to "a weapon likely to produce death," are not subject to any of the criticisms urged by the plaintiff in error.

4. Criminal law §797—Instruction as to jury's right to recommend mercy not error.

There was no error in charging the jury as follows: "If you find the defendant guilty of assault with intent to murder, and you fix his sentence as it would be your duty to do, that is, a penitentiary sentence in case you find him guilty, you may nevertheless add to your verdict a recommendation to the mercy of the court, and, should that be your verdict, and should your recommendation be approved by the court, then the defendant would be sentenced as for a misdemeanor. I have or will give you what a misdemeanor sentence is."

5. Criminal law §913(4)—Disregard of recommendation of mercy in sentencing defendant held not ground for new trial.

The special ground of the motion for a new trial, complaining that the court erred in sentencing the defendant to the penitentiary, because the verdict of the jury recommended him to the mercy of the court, is not cause for a new trial. Such recommendations are entirely subject to the approval of the court. Echols v. State, 109 Ga. 510, 34 S. E. 1038; Daniel v. State, 118 Ga. 16 (1), 43 S. E. 861; Mack v. State, 118 Ga. 755, 45 S. E. 603. See, also, Elzie v. State, 21 Ga. App. 502(2), 94 S. E. 627 and cases cited.

6. Motion for new trial properly overruled.

There was ample evidence to warrant the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County;
H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Marvin Varner was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

John R. Cooper and W. O. Cooper, Jr. both of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Chas. H. Garrett, Sol. Gen., of Macon, for the State.

LUKE, J. Judgment affirmed.

OSBORNE v. STATE. (No. 12490.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
June 30, 1921.)(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  918(3)—Refusal to require jurors to be called and to rise for purpose of striking not ground for new trial.

Where a list of the 24 jurors put upon defendant had been furnished him, and he was directed to strike therefrom, the refusal to allow the jurors to be called separately and made to rise and remain standing until the next juror was called for the purpose of striking the jury did not require a new trial.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  1064(4)—Ground of motion for new trial complaining of exclusion of evidence of certain statements by defendant held insufficient.

A ground of a motion for a new trial complaining of the court's refusal to allow defendant's counsel to prove by a witness, who testified concerning an admission by defendant, other statements made under oath by defendant at the same time, did not show error, where it did not show what such other statements were, or whether proof thereof would have benefited or harmed defendant.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  1064(6) — Point made in brief, but not in motion for new trial, not considered.

A complaint in the brief for plaintiff in error that the court, in excluding evidence, expressed an opinion as to what the evidence showed or did not show, cannot be considered, where no such complaint was made in the motion for a new trial.

4. Intoxicating liquors  $\S$  236(5) — Evidence held to support conviction for possessing whisky.

Evidence, though circumstantial, held sufficient to support a conviction for possessing whisky found buried underground in a coal house on defendant's premises and only a little distance from his dwelling house, where defendant offered no explanation as to the whisky being on his premises.

5. Criminal law  $\S$  1160—Verdict approved by trial judge cannot be disturbed when evidence not insufficient as a matter of law.

Where the finding of the jury has been approved by the trial judge, and the Court of Appeals cannot say as a matter of law that the jury were not authorized to find that the circumstantial evidence adduced excluded every reasonable hypothesis save that of defendant's guilt, the court is without authority to interfere.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Anthony Osborne was convicted of possessing whisky, and he brings error. Affirmed.

T. J. Ripley and W. M. Bailey, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

John A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1] 1. There is no substantial merit in the following ground of the motion for a new trial:

"A new trial should be granted because the court refused to allow the 24 jurors put upon the defendant on the trial to be called separately and distinctly and made to rise and remain standing until the next juror was called at the time when the defendant was put upon trial in said case, request having been made by the defendant's counsel to have the jury called separately for the purpose of striking said jury. After said 24 jurors were put upon the defendant counsel for defendant accepted the first 12 and went to trial. A list of 24 jurors was furnished counsel prior to this agreement, and he was directed to strike therefrom."

[2, 3] 2. A ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"A new trial should be granted because during said trial the court refused to allow the defendant's counsel, after asking the witness for the state, Officer W. L. Payne, if he heard all of Anthony Osborne's statement while under oath on the trial of Amelia Osborne in the federal court, and the court refused to allow defendant's counsel to prove by this witness other statements made under oath by Anthony Osborne at the time that he admitted to the witness, or swore on the trial in said federal court, that he was the head of the house on which premises the liquor was found, said court saying at the time that it made no difference what other statements were made, or what other evidence was sworn to by Anthony Osborne on that trial, and was immaterial."

It does not appear from this ground what were the "other statements made under oath by Anthony Osborne" that the defendant desired to prove, or whether this proof would have benefited or harmed the defendant. This ground does not complain that in making his ruling excepted to the judge expressed "an opinion as to what the evidence showed or didn't show." Such complaint is made only in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, and cannot be considered by this court.

[3] None of the excerpts from the charge excepted to, when considered in the light of the entire charge and the facts of the case, show reversible error. Moreover, in none of the excerpts is the alleged error pointed out; the only averment being that "the charge was error."

[4, 5] 4. The accused was charged with possessing whisky. The undisputed evidence showed that 10 gallons of corn whisky, in one-gallon tin cans, was found buried six or eight inches under the ground in a coal house on the defendant's premises and "a little distance" from his dwelling house. The defendant, in his statement to the jury, admitted all these facts, but denied that the whisky was his, or that he knew it was there or knew who it belonged to. He offered no explanation whatever as to how the whisky happened to be there, or how such a quantity could have been buried in his coal house and near his dwelling house without his consent or knowledge. Neither the evidence nor the defendant's statement showed that any one outside of his own family (of which he admitted being the head) lived or worked on the premises, or near by. The court fully and correctly charged on the law of circumstantial evidence, and the jury evidently found that the defendant had offered no sufficient explanation as to the whisky being on his premises, and rejected his statement as to knowing nothing about it being there.

Under these particular facts this court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the jury were not authorized to find that the circumstantial evidence adduced was sufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis save that of the defendant's guilt; and, the finding of the jury having been approved by the trial judge, this court is without authority to interfere. The cases cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error are distinguishable by their peculiar facts from this case.

Judgment affirmed.

McKEE v. MADDEN. (No. 10664.)

Trial 194(13)—Instruction as to presumption of knowledge of contents of instrument held a charge on the facts.

In action by seller of automobile for claim and delivery, following buyer's default in payment of purchase-money note secured by mortgage, defended on the ground of fraud in the execution of the note and mortgage, instruction as to presumption that person who signs instrument knows what it contains held objectionable, as a charge on the facts.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; R. W. Manning, Judge.

Action by J. W. McKee against Dora Madden. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Featherstone & Knight, of Laurens, for appellant.

Blackwell & Sullivan, of Laurens, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following preliminary statement appears in the argument of the appellant's attorneys:

"Appellant bought an automobile from respondent and gave a note and mortgage for balance of purchase money. Respondent brought action for claim and delivery, the past-due mortgage being the basis of his claim of title. The appellant answers the complaint, setting up the following defenses: (1) Fraud in the execution of the note and mortgage; (2) payment; (3) breach of warranty and failure of consideration; (4) counterclaim for damages by reason of breach of warranty. The action was tried before Judge Memminger and a jury. The jury found for the plaintiff respondent in the sum of $343. The defendant appeals from the judgment of the circuit court."

"Now, on this matter of a written instrument, gentlemen. Where a person's signature on a written instrument is admitted to be genuine the party is held to be bound by what is contained in that instrument. The charge made that it was procured by fraud has to be established by testimony. A person is presumed to protect themselves to the extent of becoming aware or knowing what an instrument is that they sign in writing. They must take ordinary and reasonable diligence to protect themselves. People can't just walk in and sign a written instrument, and then play the baby act and say they did not know what was in it, that it was not read to them, or whatever it might be. They must satisfy the jury that a fraud has been committed to the extent in which they have been misled; otherwise, they are bound by the contents of it. To let that sort of thing go on without holding it down to a proper case, there would never be a written instrument worth anything. It would be just as well to carry on all transactions by word of mouth. Now the law says that, when a person signs his name to a written instrument, he cannot escape the consequences of it, unless fraud or deception is shown. That is upon the defendant in the case, who sets up that defense. Miss Madden claims that she was deceived and defrauded into signing that instrument with that amount $370 instead of $270."

An exception to the foregoing assigns error, in that it was a charge on the facts. The testimony of the plaintiff, corroborated by her brother and nephew, shows that the error was prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff. The exception is therefore sustained.

None of the other exceptions, when considered in connection with the entire charge, show prejudicial error.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

SMITH v. HEYWARD et al. (No. 10658.)

Judgment ¶17(1)—Order settling estate not based on notice is invalid.

A judgment or order settling an estate where entered without notice to some of the parties interested is invalid and cannot be allowed to stand.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Robert T. Smith, as executor of Elizabeth H. Heyward, deceased, against Julius H. Heyward, the executor, and others. From an order settling the estate, Henry Middleton, one of the defendants, appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 115 S. C. 199, 105 S. E. 275.

A. T. Smythe and E. L. Visanska, both of Charleston, for appellant.

Miller, Huger, Wilbur & Miller, of Charleston, Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, F. H. Horibeck, of Charleston, S. M. Wolfe, Atty. Gen., and E. M. Blythe, of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The case shows:

"This action was brought by Robert T. Smith, as executor of Elizabeth M. Heyward, deceased, against Julius H. Heyward, the other executor, and the heirs, devisees, legatees of the testatrix to have the court construe her will, determine the validity of certain bequests and the proper disposition of the residue of the estate, and also for the appointment of a receiver on account of the dissensions existing between the executors. The decision of the Supreme Court construing the will and deciding the issues in this case appear in 115 S. C. at page 199 et seq. [105 S. E. 275].

"After the decision of the Supreme Court was handed down, Mr. Nettles, as attorney for the executor Julius H. Heyward, opened negotiations with Mr. H. J. Haynsworth, of counsel for the executor Robert T. Smith, with the idea of agreeing upon an order under which the estate could be expeditiously settled. No agreement on all points having been reached, Mr. Nettles, in December, 1920, served notice upon Mr. Haynsworth of application to Judge Prince for an order in the case. No notice of the application for the order was given to the attorneys for Henry Middleton. Upon the call of the motion, Mr. Haynsworth stated that there were several other attorneys in the case and asked for time to communicate with them. Judge Prince then let the hearing go over until the following week, when he heard the arguments from Mr. Haynsworth, Mr. Heyward, and Mr. Nettles, and, after allowing further time to hear from the Charleston attorneys, he signed and filed the order hereinafter set forth on January 13, 1921. Judge Prince did not know that Mr. A. T. Smythe and Mr. W. L.

Visanska were attorneys in the case, though he did know there were attorneys in the case who were not present at the hearing."

The order affected the interests of Henry Middleton, and neither Mr. Middleton nor his attorneys had any notice of the motion. It needs no citation of authority to show that it was error to make an order affecting the interest of a party of which he had no notice. The high character of all the parties and their attorneys leaves no doubt of perfect good faith, but notice was necessary, and, as none was given, the order appealed from is reversed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE RY. CO. v. TOWN OF TIMMONSVILLE. (No. 10665.)

Licenses ¶34—Railroad entitled to recover amount paid, in absence of evidence that tax was levied on gross income and capital investment.

Railroad suing to recover license taxes imposed by ordinance enacted pursuant to Civ. Code 1912, § 2947, paid under protest, held entitled to the recovery of the taxes paid, in the absence of evidence that the tax was levied either upon the gross income or upon the amount of capital invested as required by such statute.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company against the Town of Timmonsville. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Whiting & Baker, of Florence, for appellant.

F. L. Willcox and J. M. Lynch, both of Florence, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record:

"This action is brought for the recovery of license taxes paid by plaintiff to defendant under protest in the years 1915 and 1916. The complaint sets forth two causes of action similar in form, the first being the recovery of $300 paid as license tax for the year 1915, and the second for the recovery of $300 paid as license tax for the year 1916; each cause of action alleging, in substance, the assessment of the tax by ordinance of the town of Timmonsville, the payment under protest duly made, and the contention that the license tax required of plaintiff was improperly imposed, of a confiscatory character, and not graduated as required by statute. The answer of defendant admits the payment of the taxes under protest duly made, but alleges that the said tax was lawfully and properly imposed in the pursuance of the power vested in the corporate authorities of the town of Timmonsville to assess and collect such taxes for corporate purposes. The case was brought to trial before Judge S. W. G. Shipp at the May, 1920, term of the court of common pleas at Florence, S. C."

Section 2947, Code of Laws 1912, provides:

"Said city or town council may, and they are hereby authorized annually to require by ordinance the payment of such reasonable sums of money as a license by any person or persons, corporation or corporations, engaged or intending to engage in any calling, business, occupation or profession, in whole or in part, within the limits of said cities or towns, except those engaged in the calling or profession of teachers or ministers of the gospel; provided, that said license shall be graduated according to the gross income of the persons, firms or corporations required to pay such license, or upon the amount of capital invested in said business."

It was admitted by counsel for defendant that the tax, the subject-matter at issue, was paid under protest for the years 1915 and 1916. Plaintiff introduced license ordinance of the town of Timmonsville, No. 39, ratified June 28, 1915; the provision relating to railroads being as follows:

"Railroads, steam, for business done exclusively within the town of Timmonsville, and not including any business done to or from points without state, and not including any business done for the government of the United States, its officers or agents, for each company as follows: Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, $300. C. A. & W. Ry. (Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co.), $50."

At the close of the testimony his honor thus ruled:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: You have heard the testimony in this case and you have heard the statute read, which provides that whenever a municipal corporation undertakes to levy a license tax that there are two ways in which they must proceed to levy the tax. One way is to find out what the capital stock of the concern sought to be taxed is, and tax it according to its capital stock; and the other way is to find out what its gross income is, and tax it that way. When you undertake to tax people in any other way except upon the capital stock invested or their gross income, it is an illegal tax. The law provides that a person may pay the tax under protest and bring suit and have the legality of the tax settled.

"They have introduced an ordinance here which failed to show that the town of Timmonsville taxed the railroad company, either according to the capital stock invested or the gross income.

"It is wholly a question of law and does not involve any question of fact, and, as a matter of law, I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to recover this tax. So, Mr. Foreman, you will write a verdict for the plaintiff."

The defendant appealed on the following exceptions:

"(1) The court erred in refusing to grant the motion for a nonsuit made by defendant at the close of plaintiff's testimony; the error being that the testimony offered by plaintiff fails to show that the taxes issued against the defendant, for the recovery of which this action was brought, were not properly graduated and assessed in accordance with the constitutional and statutory provisions relating to license taxes.

"(2) The court erred in holding that the proposed testimony relating to the method of determining the amount of license tax assessed against defendant was incompetent; it being respectfully submitted that such testimony was competent for the purpose of showing that the said tax was properly and fairly graduated and assessed.

"(3) The court erred in directing a verdict against the defendant; it being respectfully submitted that the burden of proof rests upon the party attacking the validity of an ordinance, and that no evidence was offered by defendant tending to show that the license tax paid by defendant had not been fairly and properly graduated and assessed in accordance with constitutional and statutory requirements."

The ruling of his honor, the presiding judge, is sustained by the case of Wood-Mendenhall Co. v. City of Greer, 88 S. C. 249, 70 S. E. 724.

Appeal dismissed.

BRICE v. McDOW et al. (No. 10671.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Schools and school districts  $\Leftrightarrow$  97(3) — Yorkville district held entitled to issue building bonds without limitation.

The amendment of 1914 to Const. art. 8, § 7, and article 10, § 5, gave the Yorkville district of York county power without limitation to issue bonds to raise funds to pay for construction of buildings.

2. Constitutional law  $\Leftrightarrow$  33 — Existing statute held to furnish machinery for issuing bonds after amendment of Constitution.

Act Feb. 17, 1911 (27 St. at Large, p. 417) authorizing board of trustees of Yorkville school district to issue $35,000 in bonds, furnished necessary machinery for an election to determine issuance of bonds under the subsequent Constitutional amendment of 1914 to Const. art. 8, § 7, removing the limits provided thereby, and an act of Legislature was unnecessary.

3. Constitutional law  $\Leftrightarrow$  143 — Statute may not render invalid bonds legal when issued.

If bonds of school district were valid when issued, no act of the Legislature could invalidate or change them, as it would impair obligations of contract.

4. Constitutional law ¶29 — Provisions presumed as self-executing.

The general presumption of law is that all constitutional provisions are self-executing, and are to be interpreted as such rather than as requiring further legislation, for the reason that unless such were done it would be in the power of Legislature to practically nullify a fundamental of legislation.

5. Statutes ¶163—Special act will not repeal general law.

The general rule is that a special act will not repeal a general law unless there is a manifest repugnancy between the provisions of the two acts, and where there is a statute general in its terms and another particular statute dealing with the same subject in a particular way or particular purpose, the two should be read together and harmonized, if possible, letting both of them stand.

6. Schools and school districts ¶91—Special act as to building bond issue by Yorkville district held not to deny district right to make use of general law.

Act Feb. 17, 1911 (27 St. at Large, p. 417), authorizing board of trustees of Yorkville district to issue bonds to the amount of $35,000 for erection of buildings and other purposes, which was in excess of 4 per cent. of assessed valuation, was intended for a particular time and purpose, and did not deny the right of the school district to make use of the general law (Civ. Code 1912, § 1743), limiting indebtedness of any school district to 4 per cent. of assessed valuation.

7. Schools and school districts ¶97(4)—Election on bond issue held properly called by town council.

Inasmuch as the town of York is a municipality, and the limits of Yorkville school district are coincident, an election to determine whether or not the school district should issue bonds, declared by the town council at the request of the board of trustees of the school district, upon petition, was not in violation of Civ. Code 1912, § 1743, requiring that an election be held by the board of trustees.

8. Schools and school districts ¶97(4)—Filing of plat not condition precedent for special election.

Filing of a plat in the office of the clerk of court was not a condition precedent for a special school election to determine the question of issuing bonds under Civ. Code 1912, § 1743.

9. Schools and school districts ¶97(6)—Resolution as to signing of bond unissued may be amended.

That resolution of Board of Trustees of school district only required that bonds be signed by chairman and secretary, instead of by the full board, was immaterial in a suit to determine the validity of the bonds, where the bonds were not yet issued, as the trustees could adopt another resolution rescinding the old one, providing in the new resolution that the signatures of the full board be placed upon the bonds.

10. Schools and school districts ¶97(4)—Object of bonds properly expressed in petition and a notice of election.

Petition for election and notice ordering election on question of issuing bonds were proper where it was stated therein that the bonds were to be used for the purpose of erecting buildings, repairing, altering, and equipping old buildings for school purposes, under Civ. Code 1912, § 1743, and Const. art. 8, § 7, as amended in 1914.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Suit by J. S. Brice against Thomas F. McDow and others, as Trustees of Yorkville School District No. 11. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The judgment of the lower court was as follows:

This is a friendly suit, brought by the plaintiff to determine the validity of a proposed bond issue of $125,000 for Yorkville school district, York county. The complaint is a very voluminous one, and sets forth all the facts in regard to the proposed issue, and alleges that from these facts and the law, as shown, the board of trustees are without authority to issue the bonds for the reasons given.

The service of the complaint is duly admitted by the defendants, constituting the board of trustees of the district, and the said defendants have filed an answer admitting all the facts stated in the said complaint, except in paragraph 6 thereof, that they are without authority to issue the bonds. They allege, on the contrary, that by reason of the facts and the law recited in the complaint they have full authority so to do.

The undisputed facts as appear then are as follows:

That Yorkville school district was incorporated under the special act of the Legislature in December, 1888 (Act Dec. 22, 1888 [20 St. at Large, p. 246]), and under this act the board of trustees created thereby are vested with the management of school affairs in the said district, including the power to issue bonds for school purposes. That act fixed the limit of bonds at $4,000. In 1901 the original act of 1888 was amended (Act Feb. 15, 1901 [23 St. at Large, p. 845]), giving the board of trustees additional power to issue bonds in the manner and form therein provided, not exceeding $15,000. In 1911 an act was passed by the General Assembly (Act Feb. 17, 1911 [27 St. at Large, p. 417]) giving the board of trustees of the said school district authority to issue bonds of the form and amount they might deem necessary for the purpose of erecting new school buildings, purchasing lot, repairing old buildings, and other school purposes, the said bonds to be issued not to exceed $35,000.

In 1914 a joint resolution was adopted by the General Assembly of South Carolina, providing that the limitations of indebtedness, as contained in section 7, art. 8, and section 5, art. 10, of the Constitution of 1895, should not apply to Yorkville school district, when the proceeds of the bonds were applied exclusively to the erecting, making additions to school buildings in the said district, and where the question of incurring indebtedness was submitted to the qualified electors of the district, as provided in the Constitution. It appears that this joint resolution was duly and legally adopted in accordance with the provisions of section 3, art. 16, of the Constitution, the yea and nay vote being taken thereon, as appears in Senate Journal 1914, pp. 806, 839, 840, 1043. In accordance with this joint resolution, constitutional amendment therein provided was submitted to the voters of the state of South Carolina at the general election in 1914, and, as a result of the election, the amendment was adopted. Thereafter, in 1915 (29 Statutes, 107), the General Assembly passed an act ratifying the said constitutional amendment proposed by a joint resolution, as stated above. It is alleged in complaint and admitted in answer that the joint resolution proposing constitutional amendment was adopted in accordance with Constitution, and same duly recorded in Senate Journal 1914, p. 806. This is found as a fact. No other acts of the Legislature have been passed in relation to the Yorkville school district.

The first question raised by the plaintiff is that, under the law, as above stated, and without regard to the facts and the manner of conducting the election, which will be hereinafter noted, that the said school district is without authority to issue the bonds proposed, it having been created by special act of December 22, 1888, and having had authority conferred and restrictions imposed upon it from time to time by a special act, the last of which was passed February 17, 1911, limiting the maximum amount of bonds to $35,000; that the said law has not been amended or supplemented, or restriction of the bonded debt therein contained removed.

It is further stated or claimed that the district is not entitled to claim authority of the bond issue by virtue of the provisions of the constitutional amendment above recited, since the said constitutional amendment simply amounts to the removal of the limitations imposed by the Constitution on the indebtedness of the said school district, and does not thereby confer authority for the issuance of the bonds.

It is further objected in this connection that, even if the said constitutional amendment is to be construed as conferring authority for the issuance of bonds in excess of the amount specified in act of 1911, no machinery for carrying out such authority is provided, and no officers are invested with the power or duty to hold any election for bonds, and that the act of the General Assembly is required to provide such machinery. In this connection, too, is the objection that the proposed bond issue will exceed 8 per cent. of the assessed valuation of the school district, and that it will exceed 15 per cent. of the value of all taxable property in the said district, which also includes the municipality of York.

[1-4] So, then, in consideration of this matter, the objections as noted above will be considered together. The question presented by the said objections briefly is: Did the school district of York have the authority to issue bonds in an unlimited amount after the passage of and ratification of constitutional amendment of 1914, or was it necessary that such constitutional amendment be followed by an act of the General Assembly, giving specific authority to issue the proposed $125,000 of bonds? The question is a most interesting one, and, after careful consideration, I am of the opinion that the school district did have and does have the power to issue the bonds, and that the objections above noted cannot be sustained. It was held in the case of Dick v. Scarborough, 73 S. C. 151, 53 S. E. 86, that section 5 of article 8 of the Constitution, providing that cities and towns may acquire by construction or purchase waterworks systems and plants after the question had been submitted to a majority vote of the electors on the question of bonded indebtedness for such purpose; that this section expressly conferred upon cities and towns the power to issue bonds for the purposes provided. If this is true, it seems that article 7, § 8, and article 5 of section 10 would give to the political subdivision therein named the power to issue bonds up to the limit provided after such question had been submitted to a vote of the people, as provided by those terms. Therefore the constitutional amendment of 1914, which took off the limit of bonded indebtedness provided for by the foregoing provision, would in itself confer bonding powers in an unlimited amount. If the proper construction of the Scarborough Case, cited above, is, as I think it is, that the constitutional amendment did confer authority to issue bonds, then such authority could not be limited or curtailed by any act of the Legislature, and to this extent the limit provided in the act of 1911 at $35,000 must fall, but all other provisions of that act of 1911, not being inconsistent with the constitutional amendment, must stand as providing machinery for election, the authority of which was given by virtue of the constitutional provision.

It seems to me, thus, that the constitutional amendment of 1914 might in this respect operate, if that view of it is taken, as an amendment to the act of 1911, by simply removing the limit of indebtedness provided in that act. The principle that the constitutional amendment to the Constitution can amend a prior statute is recognized in the case of Cleveland v. Spartanburg, 54 S. C. 83, 31 S. E. 871.

Another case to be noted in this connection is the case of Bray v. City Council of Florence, 62 S. C. 57, 39 S. E. 810. In that case it was held that an act of the Legislature limiting the amount of bonded debts of municipalities, in the words of the statute, does not so operate after such limitations have been removed by amendment. The only difference between this Bray Case and the case at bar is that in the Bray Case the limitation of the statute placed upon cities and towns to vote bonds was, in the exact language of the Constitution, "not over 8 per cent." An amendment was duly passed to the Constitution, taking off this limit as to the city of Florence, and the city of Florence thereby proposed to issue bonds exceeding the 8 per cent. limitation. The plaintiff contended that the constitutional amendment should have been followed by an act of the Legislature removing its former limitations, and, while the court decided that such act was not necessary, on the ground that the language of the acts was in accordance with the language of the Constitution, yet it would seem that the principle in this case would be the same. The limitation imposed on the school district was not 8 per cent., but a definite sum of $35,000 by a legislative enactment. Was not the intention of the Legislature by that act simply to say to the school district that it should keep within the constitutional limit? And the effect of the constitutional amendment removing the limitation would be the same in this case as it was in the Bray Case. This Bray Case also suggests the fact that, if the General Assembly had desired to impose a limitation after the constitutional amendment, a new act would have been necessary. Under the authority of Dick v. Scarborough, cited above, it may be doubtful as to whether there was any authority in the Legislature to limit the indebtedness after the constitutional amendment, and if this is the proper construction of the Scarborough Case, as I think it is, the principle recognized in the Bray Case, if it is recognized, that the Legislature would have the authority after a constitutional amendment to further limit indebtedness, would be practically overruled by the later decision. However, even if we should consider that the principle of the Bray Case is correct, instead of the principle of the Scarborough Case, the answer here would be that, even though the Legislature might have had authority to limit indebtedness of the Yorkville school district after the amendment, it has not done so, thus implying that it does not care so to act. After these bonds are issued, if they are valid up to this time, certainly no subsequent act of the Legislature could invalidate them, for such act would impair the obligations of contract.

I hold, therefore, that the constitutional amendment of 1914 did confer upon the school district authority to issue bonds, limited only by the discretion of the board of trustees, that no further act of the Legislature was necessary, that the machinery for an election had been provided for by the act of 1911, and by previous acts, and that these acts stand so far as the machinery for the election is concerned, and are repealed only so far as the limitation of indebtedness is concerned. The constitutional amendment of 1914 must be regarded as self-executing, taken in connection with the former act. The general presumption of law is that all constitutional provisions are self-executing, and are to be interpreted as such, rather than as requiring further legislation, for the reason that, unless such were done, it would be in the power of the Legislature to practically nullify a fundamental of legislation. 6 R. C. L. p. 58; Black on Interpretation of Laws, p. 21.

It follows from the above conclusion that the objection to the 8 per cent. and the 15 per cent. limitation, as stated in subdivision "g," par. 6, of the complaint, must also fail, for the reason that such limitations are absolutely wiped out by the constitutional amendment.

[5] Having reached the conclusion, therefore, that the bonds proposed to be issued are valid by reason of the constitutional amendment and of the act of 1911, and the previous acts which provided machinery for election, it might not be necessary to go further, but, as the question has been raised in the complaint, and if for any reason the conclusions stated above are wrong, it will be well to consider whether or not the bond issue can be sustained by the provisions of the general law relating to school districts. This general law is stated in section

1743 of the Code of 1912, and the provisions of it are substantially recited in the complaint. This act, which constitutes a general law in regard to school district bonded indebtedness, was passed in 1907, and provided that the limit of indebtedness should be 4 per cent. of the assessed taxable property in the district. The last act relating to Yorkville school district was passed in February, 1911, and is a special act in regard to Yorkville school district, so then the question to be considered is whether by the passage of that special act after the enactment of the general law, Yorkville school district would be deprived of the benefits of the general law, if such became necessary. The general rule is that a special act will not repeal a general law, unless there is a manifest repugnancy between the provisions of the two acts; and where the statute is general in its terms, another particular statute dealing with the same subject in a particular way or particular purpose, the two should be read together, and harmonized, if possible, letting both of them stand. 13 Cyc. 1093, 1151; 25 R. C. L. 929.

The principles of statutory construction are more or less elastic, and governed by circumstances. If the general law and the special law are not plainly repugnant, or if the general law is not plainly repugnant, the same should stand together, and the right to plead the general law is not abrogated; or, if the general law imposes conditions upon the issuance of bonds, and the special act authorizes one district to issue bonds without the happening of these conditions, the special act might be regarded as an act for a particular time and purpose, and would not constitute a denial of the right of the district to make use of the general law.

[6] Now, what are the facts that appear here? Let us examine the provisions of the special act of 1911 and the general school law (Civ. Code 1912, §§ 1898-1835), to see wherein they differ.

(1) The special act of 1911 limits indebtedness of Yorkville district to $35,000; the general act of 1907 limits indebtedness of any school district to 4 per cent. of assessed valuation.

(2) The special act provides that the petition be signed by a majority of freeholders; the general law provided that the petition should be signed by one-third of the freeholders and one-third of the electors.

(3) The general law provided that a plat must be filed before election; the special law contained no such provision.

(4) The special law provided for notice of election for 3 weeks; the general law provided for notice of 10 days.

(5) The general law provided that the proceeds be used for erecting buildings, and for paying indebtedness; the special law provided that the bonds should be used for the purpose of purchasing lot or lots, erecting and furnishing school building, or purchasing or adding to or remodeling or repairing existing buildings for school purposes.

(6) The general law provided that the bonds should be signed by all the trustees; the special law provides that they may be signed only by the chairman and secretary of the board.

Upon consideration of the above distinctions, it will be seen that the special act of 1911 relating to Yorkville school district is more liberal in its terms than the act of 1907, which is the general law. For instance, it appears by the record that the assessed valuation of Yorkville school district in 1910, which was the last valuation before the act of February, 1911, was passed, was $750,325. Thirty-five thousand dollars is more than 4 per cent. of this assessed valuation, so it is seen that the Legislature was intending to be more liberal with the district by this act than by the general law. In all other respects noted above, except that of the time for publication of notice of election, the special act is also more liberal. Hence, when we have these evidences of liberality of the special act of 1911, it must be taken that the intention of the Legislature was to make that act an act for a particular time and purpose, and not to deny the right to the district to make use of the General Law, if such was necessary.

[7] So, having determined that the district had the right to use the general law, let us see if the provisions of the general law have been complied with. Subdivision "e" of paragraph 6 of the complaint states in detail the objection to the use of the general law by the district in this election. The first objection is that the general law provided that the election to be held was not to be held by the trustees of the district. It is alleged as a fact in the complaint, and not denied, that this election was nominally held by the town council of the town of York, but in reality it was by the trustees of the district. The record shows that the petition was signed by more than one-third of the resident electors and freeholders; that this petition was first presented to the board of trustees; that the board of trustees passed upon the validity of the petition, approved it, decided upon an election by the proper resolution, submitted the matter to the town council of the town of York, naming the managers of election, suggesting the form of the ordinances, and all other details in connection with the election. Inasmuch as the town of York is a municipality, and that the limits of Yorkville school district are coincident with that of the town, and that the laws of the state in regard to special election in municipalities provided that certain acts must be done, and the election held by the municipal authorities, it is conceded that it was the part of wisdom for this election to be held in the name of the town council of York in order to prevent conflict with other sections of the law. For one thing, books of registration for special election had to be opened by town authorities; could not have been opened by the board of trustees. The election was duly held by virtue of the ordinance passed by the town council at the request of the board of trustees. The election was declared by the town council and reported to the board of trustees, and the said board, by a proper resolution, adopted the same.

So, then, no other conclusion can be reached but that the acts of the town council of the town of York in holding and declaring this election was the act of the board of trustees, having been done at the request of the board in the first instance, and having been certified back to the board in the last instance. Therefore the objection as to the manner of conduct of the election was not in violation of the provisions of the general law.

[8] The next objection is that no plat was filed in the office of the clerk of the court, as required by the general law. It appears that the limits of the Yorkville school district are well known, the shape being a circle, with a radius of one mile from the center at the intersection of Congress and Liberty streets in the said town. Also, a plat was on record in the office of the county superintendent of education; but in Dove v. Kirkland, 92 S. C. 321, 75 S. E. 503, it was held that that Constitution did not require the filing of such plat as condition precedent for election, and such was not necessary.

[9] The next objection, that the bonds are to be signed by the chairman and secretary, instead of the full board, is immaterial, for the bonds have not been issued, and this condition can be easily complied with, and all doubt removed simply by the board of trustees adopting another resolution and rescinding the old one, providing in the new resolution that the signatures of the full board are to be placed upon the bonds.

It appears from the record that the form of ballot used at the election was in accordance with the general law, for the reason that an affirmative ballot was used and a negative ballot was used, the two being separate and distinct.

[10] It is further objected that the petition under which the election was held and the notice ordering the election stated that the purpose for which the bonds were to be used was different from that provided for in the general law, and also that provided in constitutional amendment. The language of the act of 1907 permits the use of proceeds for erecting building, for equipment thereof, for maintaining, and for paying indebtedness. The election in question was for the purpose of erecting buildings, repairing, altering, and equipping old buildings for school purposes. We do not think that the purposes stated in the petition under which the election was held would be in conflict with the general law or that of constitutional amendment. The language of that general law and constitutional amendment is to be construed liberally, and when so construed we think it was the intent of the law to cover all necessary things which might have to be done for maintaining a proper and adequate school system in school districts and of Yorkville school district. Even the purchase of a lot might be justified under the general law, for the reason that the equipping and maintaining of a proper school system could not, in a great many instances, be accomplished without the purchase of a lot. The general act and the constitutional amendment, and also act of February 7, 1911, must certainly be construed as confirming authority for the issuance of bonds for purposes stated in the petition. See, also, Dick v. Scarborough, 73 S. C. 151, 53 S. E. 86.

It is therefore concluded that the proposed bond issue can be sustained under the general school law of the state, and is valid. The limit of indebtedness under the general law was originally 4 per cent., but this limit was increased to 8 per cent. by act of 1920; hence the general law as it now stands would provide the limit of indebtedness in school district to 8 per cent., the exact language of the Constitution, but the constitutional amendment of 1914 removed the limitation, and hence, the limitation of the general law being in exact accordance with the language of the Constitution, the constitutional amendment removed that limit under the principle stated in Bray v. Florence, supra.

For these reasons, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the complaint herein be dismissed, and that the board of trustees of Yorkville school district, the defendants herein, be allowed to proceed with this proposed bond issue.

TILL v. HAMILTON RIDGE LUMBER CO.
(No. 10660.)

Master and servant — 286(1) — Negligence question for jury.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's intestate, a servant of defendant, the question is for the jury, where plaintiff's evidence tended to establish all the material averments of negligence, and defendant's evidence tended to disprove that of plaintiff, and to show that the servant assumed the risk of injury.

Appeal from Common Pleas, Circuit Court of Hampton County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lizzie Till, as administratrix, against the Hamilton Ridge Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Randolph Murdaugh and George Warren, both of Hampton, for appellant.

W. D. Connor, of Hampton, and Holman & Boulware, of Barnwell, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for actual and punitive damages, alleged to have been sustained on account of the negligence and recklessness of the defendant, thereby causing the death of plaintiff's husband.

The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows:

"That on the 2d day of July, 1919, the said John D. Till was employed by the defendant, Hamilton Ridge Lumber Corporation, at its mill in Estill, S. C., in the capacity of carpenter, which was the trade and calling of the said John D. Till; that on the said day the defendants changed the work of the said John D. Till from his occupation as a carpenter and put him to work as assistant millwright at the said plant; that shortly after going to work as assistant millwright at said mill on the following morning, July 3, 1919, while the said John D. Till was dressing a pulley on which a belt was running, pursuant to the instructions from the defendant and in the line of his work and duty as assistant millwright, the said belt caught the sleeve of his shirt, or his arm, or hand, and jerked the same in between the belt and the pulley on which it was running and jerked the said John D. Till up against the framework supporting the said pulley so violently that he was thereby fatally injured, resulting in his death at about 7 p. m. on the following day, July 4, 1919; that the said John D. Till came to his death as above stated by reason of the fact that the said belt which caught his sleeve, arm, or hand as aforesaid was improperly fastened together, in that the ends thereof did not meet each other squarely and evenly, but was so put together that on each side of the belt, at the point where the ends were joined together, the belt projected out far enough for the exposed end to catch things which it came in contact and carry them along with it to and around the said pulley, and the said belt was thus rendered a dangerous and unreasonably unsafe and unsuitable appliance, or a dangerous and unreasonably unsafe place for the said John D. Till to work in."

The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint and set up the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $6,000 actual damages, and the defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

"(1) Because his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a nonsuit or directed verdict on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant operating as a proximate cause of the injury complained of.

"(2) Because his honor erred in refusing defendant's motion for a nonsuit or directed verdict on the ground that the deceased, John D. Till, was negligent, and that his negligence contributed as a proximate cause of the injury complained of.

The testimony in behalf of the plaintiff tended to sustain every material allegation of the complaint. On the other hand, the testimony introduced by the defendant tended to disprove the plaintiff's testimony, and to show that the plaintiff's husband contributed to his own injury, and that he assumed the risks incident to his employment.

Under such circumstances, the facts were properly submitted to the jury.

Appeal dismissed.

NICKLES v. MILLER et al. (No. 10654.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent  $\S$ 78(2)—Action held one for accounting between principal and agent instead of on an account or judgment.

Principal's action against agent against whom principal had previously obtained a judgment held an action for accounting between principal and agent, and not an action on an account or judgment. (Per Fraser, J., and Gary, C. J.)

2. Reference  $\S$ 8(1)—Reference held proper in principal's action for accounting against agent on complicated account.

Principal's action against confidential agent for accounting in which the account was complicated and obscure held a proper case for a reference. (Per Fraser, J., and Gary, C. J.)

3. Witnesses  $\S$ 164(1) — Death stops parol evidence as to contract partly in parol and partly in writing.

Where a contract is partly in writing and partly in parol, death stops the parol evidence, and the writing stands. (Per Fraser, J., and Gary, C. J.)

4. Judgment  $\S$ 913 — Principal's complaint against agent held to state a cause of action on a judgment.

Principal's complaint against agent held to state a cause of action on a judgment. (Per Cothran, J.)

5. Appeal and error  $\S$ 882(3)—Defendant in law action, having demanded an accounting involving long and intricate account, could not complain of reference.

In principal's action against agent on a judgment, wherein defendant's answer was practically a demand and an offer for an accounting by which to demonstrate that the judgment had been paid where the account was a long and intricate one, the agent could not complain that the matter was referred to a referee on the ground that it was an action at law having himself tendered the equitable issue. (Per Cothran, J.)

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; John S. Wilson and Geo. E. Prince, Judges.

Action by W. F. Nickles, as executor of the estate of Sue A. Kellar, against L. T. Miller, as executor, and Fannie E. Wilson, as executrix, of the estate of M. H. Wilson, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The referee's report and the order of the trial judge, referred to in the opinion, are as follows:

Report.

This case was referred to me by order of the circuit court for Abbeville county as special referee to take the testimony and report my finding of fact and conclusions of law on the issues raised by the pleadings. A reference was held at Abbeville June 14, 1916, and continued at Anderson May 21, 1917, at which a deposition of Mrs. Kellar was read, testimony taken, and affidavit of L. T. Miller by consent admitted in evidence. Exhibits were admitted in evidence at Abbeville numbered from 1 to 21, inclusive, and at and from 1 B to 12 B, inclusive. A stenographic copy of the testimony, the affidavit, deposition and all the exhibits except the excerpts from the master's books are herewith submitted, together with the minutes of the reference as part of the report.

The case is brought on a judgment of the probate court for Abbeville county dated January 24, 1909, whereby it was adjudged that M. H. Wilson, as administrator of the estate of Miss Jane L. Gordon, deceased, pay to plaintiff, Mrs. Susan A. Kellar, $626.42 on a partial distribution of funds from the estate of Jane L. Gordon, deceased, this being Mrs. Kellar's distributive share of the amount shown to be due from funds then ready for distribution.

This judgment is admitted by the answer and payment is pleaded. This issue of whether this judgment has been paid is the only one in the case.

By a subsequent judgment of the said probate court it was adjudged that an additional sum of $127.58 was due the plaintiff, Mrs. Kellar, as her share in the final distribution of the said estate, but it is conceded that this has been paid, and I find that it was paid by check of M. H. Wilson, administrator, to Mrs. Sue A. Kellar, dated April 13, 1910, for $128. In addition to these funds I find that Mrs. Kellar received from the sale of real estate of Miss Jane L. Gordon, through the master's office on December 28, 1906, $1,000, and on November 16, 1909, $1,444.75.

The third paragraph of the answer alleges that during the years 1909 and 1910 M. H. Wilson paid to Mrs. Kellar about $2,838.07, and it claimed that the judgment sued on was paid by some of these amounts. The fourth paragraph sets out these various payments, and, as it is by these or some of them that the defendant must show satisfaction of the judgment, if at all, I shall give my findings of them in detail. I find that there is no evidence of the payment of $900 alleged to have been paid Mrs. Kellar on January 22, 1909, by M. H. Wilson, but that Mrs. Kellar loaned J. T. Hunter $900 of her money then on hand, said sum being withdrawn from her amount in People's Savings Bank of Abbeville by her check, and I find that the second item of $200, loaned to Mrs. Fannie M. Speed was loaned from Mrs. Kellar's own funds then on hand and withdrawn from her account in said bank on her own check signed in her name by M. H. Wilson as her agent. I find the same to be true as to the third item. To wit, $600 loaned to J. H. Moore and J. M. Mars, except that the check of Mrs. Kellar was signed in her name by another agent. As to the fourth item I find that M. H. Wilson loaned W. D. Barksdale $300 of Mrs. Kellar's money on the date alleged, checking on her bank account for same, and $300 of his own funds on his check as administrator, taking a note and mortgage payable to his order to evidence and secure payment of the loan. That was paid on or about January 5, 1910, on which date M. H. Wilson gave to her his check for $268.78 as her net share of the proceeds of the collection. This check is the eighth item of credits alleged in the answer. I find that M. H. Wilson collected $660 from W. D. Barksdale in payment of this loan, of which Mrs. Kellar's share would normally be $230, she having advanced one-half of the principal. He stated at the time of making this payment to her credit that the $268.78 paid to her was her share, and in the absence of any clear explanation of the discrepancy I assume that there was some reason for this arrangement and find that this amount cleared him of further liability to her on account of this Barksdale loan. The only evidence offered of the seventh item of $15 paid December 16, 1909, to wit, a check of S. A. Kellar to L. W. Kellar & Bro. bearing that date, showed that this amount was not paid for her by M. H. Wilson. I have already stated that the ninth item, a payment of $128 to Mrs. Kellar, was to satisfy or pay a judgment in the probate court for her share in the final distribution of the estate of Miss Jane L. Gordon. The eleventh item of $20.10 paid January 5, 1910, appears from the evidence to have been paid by Mrs. Kellar's check on her own account, signed in her name by M. H. Wilson, as her agent, to Philson Henry & Co.

The allegations relating to the thirteenth item refer to a loan made to L. T. Miller. The testimony of W. F. Nickles shows this to have been made to L. T. Miller by Mrs. Kellar in 1906 out of her own money. Her passbook with the People's Savings Bank contains an entry of a check on her account for $175 to L. T. Miller. Mr. Miller in his testimony states that this loan was paid by him, but he does not deny that he borrowed her money from her. There is no proof that Mr. Wilson should have credit for this amount.

I find that none of these items above referred to can constitute a credit or payment by M. H. Wilson on the judgment sued on. I recall no testimony to substantiate the fourteenth item of credit claimed, to wit, $4.79 cash paid to Mrs. Kellar by Mr. Wilson. This must therefore be disallowed.

I find that the other items claimed as payments are fully proved, to wit: $13.21 paid June 4, 1909; $15 paid February 3, 1908; $25 paid July 19, 1910; and $36.99 paid September 12, 1910.

Defendant's counsel also proved to my satisfaction that Mr. Wilson paid Mrs. Kellar $42.95 on or about February 16, 1903, and $14.88 on or about January 15, 1903. These are proved by entries in Mr. Wilson's account book as administrator, and in the absence of any testimony showing that the administrator was indebted to her on any other account, and in view of the proof as to his scrupulous integrity, I think that he should have credit on account of this judgment for these amounts. It is contended that these amounts were deducted by Mr. Wilson from Mrs. Kellar's share of the proceeds of the Barksdale loan, thereby reducing the amount put to her credit from $330 to $268.78. It is of course entirely possible that this was done. Such explanation is not entirely satisfactory, however, as these payments would not entirely account for the deduction, and Mr. Wilson is reported to have said that the amount he deposited was Mrs. Kellar's share of the proceeds of the collection, not the net amount he owed her on all accounting to that date, or of the amount he owed her in addition to the judgment in her favor. Some element must have entered into this Barksdale loan which the subsequent death of Mr. Wilson prevents our knowing, and by reason of which she was entitled to only $268.78 of this money. The payments of $14.88 and $42.95 were made prior to the rendering of the judgment in the probate court, it is true, and it is therefore rather irregular to consider them as payments on this judgment, but it is not unusual to have the judgment in such cases represent the total amount of the share of the distribution, and then by a private accounting adjust the mutual account in making payment. The payments were made, and I think it but just that Mr. Wilson have credit for them on this account.

It was earnestly and ingeniously contended in argument that the total of loan made by Mrs. Kellar and of the disbursements made by her for other purposes when deducted from her known and established sources of funds would leave her so small an amount for living expenses that she must necessarily have been paid this judgment in order to live. This calculation, however, leaves out the interest which her bank book in evidence shows she received, and furthermore it is not proved that she was solely or indeed at all dependent on the funds received from the Gordon estate for her living expenses.

It is contended, as evidencing the fact that the check for $128 given by Mr. Wilson to Mrs. Kellar in payment of the balance due on the final settlement of the Gordon estate on April 13, 1910, was intended also to be in full payment of all amounts due to her by Mr. Wilson, that he thereafter drew no other checks in her favor, although he lived nearly two years after that date. This argument overlooks the $25 check of July 9, 1910, and $36.99 paid by him to cover her overdraft on September 12, 1910.

I do not conceive that the conclusions I have reached that Mr. Wilson owed Mrs. Kellar the bulk of her judgment in any wise impeaches his admitted honesty and integrity in his dealings with her and with all other persons. He was doubtless careful and zealous in her interest always. He never, so far as the testimony shows, claimed to have discharged his admitted debt to her. According to the clear testimony of Mr. Nickles, he in his mind set aside a mortgage of W. D. Barksdale drawn in his favor doubtless for convenience in making satisfaction of it and otherwise, as representing the bulk of her estate unaccounted for. With so careful a business man as the testimony shows him to have been, the fact that, while he filed receipts and discharges from all the other distributees of the estate, he filed none from her, is indicative that he had not put all her money in her name or turned it into her bank account or paid it to her.

As plaintiff's counsel argued, he proceeded on the assumption which we are too prone to entertain that he would live long and could finish his settlement later. He died without warning before carrying out his generous and fair intentions toward his sister's affairs. His sudden death and the lack of acquaintance with her business affairs on the part of his sister unfortunately leaves some doubt as to the accuracy and completeness of my findings, but with the lights before me I must conclude, and so find, that plaintiff is entitled to recover against defendants as his administrators the amount of the judgment less the payments above found to have been proved. The judgment must bear interest from its date at 7 per cent. per annum. It might be equitable to credit the estate with some commissions for making loans, etc., but of this there is no proof.

I find that there is due plaintiff to the date of this report $867.18.

Order.

Upon the call of the above-entitled action for trial, a motion was made by plaintiff's attorney that the issues in the case be referred to a referee for trial. It appeared to my satisfaction, from the statements of counsel for the plaintiff, that the trial of cause would require the examination and investigation of long and intricate accounts which would require considerable and very tedious work. In addition to counsel's statement, the plaintiff's attorneys have filed affidavits herein in confirmation of counsel's statement in regard to the trial requiring an investigation of long and intricate accounts. In addition to this, Mr. W. F. Nickles, cashier of People's Bank, has filed his affidavit to the same effect. It appears to me that this is a case which should more properly be referred to a special referee to try. It is therefore, on motion of Wm. P. Greene and D. H. Hill, plaintiff's attorneys, ordered that the issues raised by the pleading herein be, and the same are hereby, referred to T. Frank Watkins, Esq., of Anderson, S. C., to take the testimony and report to this court his findings of fact and of law.

Graydon & Graydon, of Columbia, for appellants.

D. H. Hill and Wm. P. Greene, both of Abbeville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action to enforce a judgment of the probate court, but involves an accounting between principal and agent. The case was put on calendar No. 1 by the plaintiff's attorney. Upon the call of the case for trial, the substituted plaintiff's attorney moved that the case be referred to a referee to take the account and report his findings thereon to the court. When the court found that the account was complicated and obscure, and that it involved an accounting between those standing in a fiduciary relation, the presiding judge referred the case to a referee.

[1, 2] I. This order of reference presents the first question for this court. The exception that raises this question cannot be sustained. This action is not an action on an account or judgment, but an action for accounting between principal and confidential agent. The account is complicated and obscure and presents a proper case for a reference to a referee.

II. Both principal and agent are dead. There was a judgment against the agent in favor of the principal. The agent was the general agent of the principal, and paid her money from time to time, but there is no satisfactory evidence to show that the payments were made on account of that judgment, and the referee and circuit judge were correct in so holding.

[3] This is just one of those unfortunate cases in which two perfectly honorable people, closely allied in blood and mutual confidence, have a part of their business in writing and part in parol. Death stops the parol evidence, and the writing stands.

The judgment is affirmed. Let the report of the referee and the order of the trial judge be reported.

GARY, C. J., concurs.

WATTS, J. I dissent. I think judgment should be reversed. It is a legal action pure and simple, and appellant has been denied substantial right in not having a trial by jury.

COTHRAN, J. [4, 5] I concur in this judgment, but think that the exceptions raising the question of the propriety of referring the case should be overruled, not upon the ground stated in the leading opinion: "This action is not an action on an account or judgment, but an action for accounting between principal and confidential agent," for the complaint shows that it was upon a judgment of the probate court, but upon the ground that the defendant's answer was practically a demand and an offer for an accounting, by which to demonstrate that the judgment had been paid. The defendant cannot therefore complain if the equitable issue tendered by him, involving, as was developed, a long and intricate account, and transactions between a principal and a confidential agent or trustee, was remitted for trial to a tribunal admittedly most capable of determining it. Particularly is this true where, as it appeared here, "it would be impracticable for an ordinary jury to comprehend and decide the issues correctly." McCabe v. Mercantile Co., 106 S. C. 25, 90 S. ## STATE v. HERRON. (No. 10653.)

1. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1170½(2)—Cross-examination of defendant as to testimony at coroner's inquest harmless in view of his denial.

In a homicide prosecution, action of court in allowing prosecution to cross-examine defendant as to his testimony at the coroner's inquest was not ground for reversal, where he denied having made a statement at the coroner's inquest, and no attempt was made to show that he had made such a statement.

2. Homicide  $\Leftrightarrow$  340(1)—Instruction held harmless in view of the facts.

In a homicide prosecution, instruction that the killing would be reduced from murder to manslaughter if committed immediately after provocation, but that it would be murder if defendant waited until the next day, if error in setting a limit to the cooling time, was harmless, where the killing was done immediately after the provocation.

3. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1129(4)—Two assignments of error not included in one exception.

Two assignments of error should not be included in one exception.

4. Homicide  $\Leftrightarrow$  300(3)—Instruction on self-defense requiring actual danger held not error.

In homicide prosecution in which the defendant claimed to have killed deceased in self-defense, instruction on self-defense stating that there must be actual danger held not error, where court immediately thereafter stated that defendant had the right to rely on appearances.

5. Homicide  $\Leftrightarrow$  116(3)—Self-defense not available unless defendant actually believed that he was in danger.

Self-defense is not available in homicide prosecution unless defendant actually believed at the time of the killing that he was in danger; appearances known to be only appearances being insufficient.

6. Homicide  $\Leftrightarrow$  300(3)—Instruction as to defendant's duty to retreat held not error.

In a homicide prosecution, where court instructed jury that defendant had the right to act on appearances, it was not error to further charge jury that, "if there is a reasonably safe way to escape, then the defendant must retreat."

7. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1170(1)—Defendant cannot complain of exclusion of evidence which would have damaged his case.

The defendant cannot complain on appeal of the exclusion of evidence which would have been damaging to his case.

8. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  763, 764(13)—Court should not state comparative values of direct and circumstantial evidence.

The court has no right to state the comparative values of direct and circumstantial evidence.

9. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1172(2)—When instruction comparing values of direct and circumstantial evidence is reversible error.

Instruction that circumstantial evidence was just as good as direct evidence and sometimes better would have been reversible error if the case depended on circumstantial evidence, but was not reversible error in view of the fact that the killing was admitted and the defense rested solely on the defendant's direct evidence.

10. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1137(3)—Defendant cannot complain of instruction given according to his request.

Where the court tried to charge the law as requested by defendant and succeeded fairly well in so doing, the defendant cannot complain of the instruction given.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Aiken County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Tom Herron was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Williams, of Aiken, for appellant. R. L. Gunter, Sol., and William M. Smoak, both of Aiken, for the State.

FRASER, J. The appellant was charged with the murder of a man named Corbett. He was convicted of manslaughter. The appellant, Corbett, Huggins, Herron, Schofield, and a son of the appellant got into an automobile and went off to find some whisky. They found the whisky and drank it. Later in the day the party drove into the town of Salley, and in the automobile was Corbett, dead. Corbett's neck was broken, and his head showed a lick on the side, made with a blunt instrument.

It seems that at first there were conflicting statements, but the appellant now admits that he struck the fatal blow. While there is testimony to show that Herron and Corbett had been quarreling and several attempts to fight had been made, no one saw the fatal encounter. Herron admitted the killing and set up self-defense. The jury convicted him of manslaughter, and acquitted Huggins and Schofield, who were indicted with him.

[1] I. The first exception complains that his honor erred in allowing the solicitor to cross-examine the appellant, as to what he testified to before the coroner at the inquest. The fact upon which this exception is based does not appear in the record. Herron denied that he had made a statement at the coroner's inquest, and no attempt was made to show that he had. This exception cannot be sustained.

[2] II. The second exception complains of error in that his honor told the jury that, if the deceased had spit in the face of the appellant and appellant killed him then and there, it might reduce the killing from murder to manslaughter, but that, if he waited until next day and then did his killing, it would be murder, because the slayer had had time to cool. While it may be that, if the killing had been delayed, his honor may not have had the right to set a limit to cooling time, still here whatever was done was done at once, and, even if it was error, it could not have affected the result. This exception is overruled.

III. The third exception includes two assignments of error: a. There must be actual danger. b. The defendant must "actually believe" that there was danger.

[3] It is contrary to rule to include two assignments of error in one exception. Considering the gravity of the case, we will consider both.

[4] (a) His honor did say there must be actual danger, but he immediately followed with a clear statement that one had the right to rely on appearances. This assignment of error cannot be sustained.

[5] (b) There was no error in charging the jury that the slayer must actually believe that he is in danger. A man cannot take advantage of appearances, that he knows are only appearances, to slay his fellow man. This assignment of error is overruled.

[6] IV. When the judge charged the jury (fourth exception) that the defendant had the right to act on appearances, as he did clearly, it is not error to say that, "if there is a reasonably safe way to escape, then the defendant must retreat." That clear statement modified the whole charge, and there was no error here.

[7] V. The appellant cannot complain (fifth exception) that his honor erred in excluding from the consideration of the jury the real evidence in the case. It was very damaging to the appellant.

[8, 9] VI. The sixth exception complains that his honor erred in charging that circumstantial evidence is just as good as direct evidence, and sometimes better. It is true that the trial judge had no right to state the comparative values of direct and circumstantial evidence, and, if this case depended at all on circumstantial evidence, a new trial should be ordered; but the case in no way depended upon circumstantial evidence. The killing being admitted, the defense rested solely on the appellant's direct evidence. There was no reversible error here.

[10] VII. The appellant cannot complain of error (seventh exception) in charging the law as to the effect of drunkenness on crime. His honor tried to charge the law as the appellant requested him to do, and we think he succeeded fairly well.

The judgment is affirmed.

McALISTER v. THOMAS & HOWARD CO
(No. 10666.)

1. Negligence  $\S$ 32(1)—Instruction on duty to licensee proper.

Where defendant's own requested charge conceded that plaintiff was a licensee, it was proper to modify that portion of the charge which stated that defendant's only duty was not to willfully or wantonly injure him, and impose on defendant the duty of reasonable care.

2. Damages  $\S$ 208(8)—Denial of nonsuit as to punitive damages proper.

In an action by a customer, who fell into an open elevator shaft in defendant's building, the denial of a nonsuit as to punitive damages was proper; there being evidence of defendant's recklessness.

3. Trial  $\S$ 345—Defects in form of verdict must be presented at time of publication.

A defect in the form of a verdict must be presented at the time it is published, and failure to do so waives the right to raise that matter later.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by R. E. McAlister against the Thomas & Howard Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. McSwain, of Greenville, for appellant.

H. P. Burbage and J. Robt. Martin, both of Greenville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the wrongful acts of the defendant. The complaint alleges:

"That the defendant is a duly chartered corporation, and is engaged in business as a wholesale merchant; one of its main places of business being the city of Greenville, S. C.

"That on or about the 31st day of March, 1919, plaintiff was standing on the first floor of the building occupied by said Thomas & Howard Company, near the elevator shaft used by the latter in operating an elevator and hauling merchandise and customers and others thereupon. That while thus standing near said elevator shaft, around which was no guard, guard rail, chain, or other protection to prevent people from falling through, plaintiff moved backward to dodge a hand truck passing through the passage occupied by him, and, not knowing of the existence of the open elevator shaft, fell and plunged through and down said shaft a distance of 20 or 30 feet, and struck the hard surface below. That both of plaintiff's legs were broken, his right arm crushed and broken, and the bones of his foot horribly crushed and splintered.

"That plaintiff was standing near the elevator at the special instance and request of the defendant, Thomas & Howard Company, its agents and employees, and was at the times aforesaid on his way to a point near said elevator at the request and suggestion of the defendant, Thomas & Howard Company, its agents and employees, where he was told and invited to go for the purpose of inspecting and purchasing a lot of merchandise," etc.

The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and by way of defense alleged:

"That the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were due in the first place to his own carelessness and negligence in stepping into an elevator shaft, which was well lighted and entirely obvious to the most casual glance, and that further and in addition the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, which combined and concurred with the alleged negligence of this defendant as a proximate cause thereof, in that the plaintiff without taking heed and without availing himself of the abundant light, stepped into the open elevator shaft, thus causing his own injury."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the said defendant for $2,500.

[1] The defendant appealed upon exceptions the first of which is as follows:

"That the presiding judge erred in modifying and changing the first request of defendant, Thomas & Howard Company, so as to instruct the jury that the said defendant owed to plaintiff the duty to observe ordinary care, even if the plaintiff, without knowledge or consent of the defendant, went to a part of the building to which he had not been invited; whereas, in the circumstances outlined by the request, the only duty that said defendant owed to the plaintiff was not to injure him willfully or wantonly."

The first request was as follows:

"If the jury find that the plaintiff was not invited by any agent of the defendant, Thomas & Howard Company, to go with him from the first floor to the second floor to get the goods proposed to be bought, and if the jury find that the plaintiff without any such invitation, and without the knowledge or consent of any agent of the defendant, did go to a part of the building to which he had not been invited, then the plaintiff would be at most a mere licensee, while at such place to which he had not been invited. The owner of the premises owed no duty to such licensee."

It will be observed that the request was based upon the theory that the plaintiff, under the circumstances therein mentioned, was a licensee. It is therefore unnecessary to cite authorities to show that the request was properly modified.

[2] The second exception is as follows:

"That the presiding judge erred in refusing the motion of the defendant, Thomas & Howard Company, for a nonsuit as to the alleged cause of action for punitive damages, and erred in refusing the motion of said defendant for a directed verdict in its favor as to the alleged cause of action for punitive damages, and in like manner in refusing a new trial upon said grounds, for the reason that there was no testimony whatever in the case from which it might legally be inferred that there was any recklessness or wantonness in the conduct of the said defendant, and to submit the issue of punitive damages was highly prejudicial to said defendant, and permitted arguments and considerations of damages calculated to mislead the jury."

This exception cannot be sustained, for the reason that there was ample testimony tending to sustain the allegations of recklessness.

[3] The third exception is as follows:

"That the presiding judge erred in refusing the motion for new trial on the ground that verdict was not responsive to the instructions, in that the verdict does not state whether it is for actual damages, or punitive damages, or for how much actual or how much punitive damages, and the jury disregarded the instructions of the court, and, having so disregarded instructions in one respect, it may be presumed to have disregarded the instructions in other respects, and for that reason the verdict should have been set aside and a new trial should have been granted."

It was the duty of the defendant's attorney to call attention to the form of the verdict, when it was published. By failing to do so he waived the right to raise the question presented by this exception. Rhame v. City of Sumter, 113 S. C. 151, 101 S. E. 832.

Affirmed.

DENNY v. DOE et al. (No. 10662.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Trial  $\S$  63(2)—Permitting view of damaged automobile in rebuttal is within court's discretion.

The manner in which the trial shall be conducted is necessarily left in large measure to the discretion of the presiding judge, and his ruling in permitting the jury to view the damaged automobile after the close of defendant's evidence will not be reviewed on exception that it was properly evidence in chief and not in rebuttal, unless an abuse of his discretion appears.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  1064(1)—Exception to charge as indicating owner of automobile, and not car, was liable, not sustained, where no personal judgment was sought.

In an action to recover damages inflicted by an automobile, an exception that a portion of the charge was misleading as indicating that the owner of the automobile, and not the car, was liable, will not be sustained where no personal judgment against the owner was sought.

3. Trial  $\Rightarrow$  194(7) — Exception that charge automobiles were meeting was on facts not sustained where appellant argued they were meeting.

An exception that a statement in the charge that the automobiles involved in the accident were meeting was a charge on the facts contrary to Const. art. 5, § 26, will not be sustained where appellant himself argued that they were meeting.

4. Highways  $\Rightarrow$  183½, New, vol. 11A Key-No. Series—Automobile causing damage is liable under statute though it was being used without owner's consent.

The fact that an automobile had been taken without the owner's consent or knowledge, by his chauffeur for the trip on which it inflicted injuries on plaintiff's car, does not prevent holding the automobile liable under the statute for the damages inflicted by it.

5. Highways  $\Rightarrow$  166—Statute imposing liability on automobile causing damage while being used without owner's consent is constitutional.

The statute making an automobile liable for damages inflicted thereby is constitutional even when making the automobile liable while being used without the owner's knowledge or consent.

6. New trial  $\Rightarrow$  32—Improper remarks as to wealth of automobile owner do not require new trial where no personal judgment was sought.

It was not error for the trial court to refuse to grant a new trial for improper remarks by plaintiff's attorney concerning the wealth of the claimant of the automobile which caused the damage, where no personal judgment against the claimant was sought.

7. Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$  216(3)—Exception to charge on statute instead of suggested charge not sustained where suggested charge was not requested.

An exception to a portion of the charge in an action for damages caused by an automobile collision, alleging error in charging the jury (Civ. Code 1912, § 2157), when he should have charged that the automobile should be run on the safest side of the road under the conditions, will be overruled where no request was presented embodying the proposition contended for in the exception.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by L. A. Denny against John Doe and one Studebaker automobile which was claimed by George Morgan. Judgment for the plaintiff, and claimant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

O. T. Graydon and Cole L. Blease, both of Columbia, for appellant.

Cooper & Winter, of Columbia, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The record contains this statement:

"This action was commenced by L. A. Denny against a certain Studebaker automobile and John Doe, the name of the owner being unknown. It was an action for damages done to the automobile of said L. A. Denny. The action was begun by the service of summons and complaint, in which action the said automobile was duly attached, and was replevied by the defendant by delivery of a bond in the sum of $1,600."

The allegations of the complaint are as follows:

"(1) That plaintiff is a resident of the county and state aforesaid, and is the owner of one Hanson automobile, and that the defendant John Doe is a nonresident of the state of South Carolina, and lives and resides in one of the other states of the United States, upon information and belief, in the state of Florida.

"(2) That on or about the 28th day of August, 1920, one L. D. Bethel was driving the automobile of this plaintiff above described upon and along a public highway of Richland county, S. C., to wit, the Garner's Ferry road, and, while so operating the said automobile in a careful, prudent, and lawful manner, the defendant above named, his agents and servants driving and operating the said Studebaker automobile, bearing a Florida state license No. 495, above described, ran and smashed into the automobile of this plaintiff, and thereby broke, wrecked, and damaged the same, breaking the body, wheels, and other parts of the same.

"(3) That the injuries and damages to plaintiff's automobile were caused and occasioned on account and in consequence of the carelessness, recklessness, willfulness, and wantonness of the defendant, his agents and servants above named, in the driving and operation of the said Studebaker automobile, in that he operated and was driving the same at a high and excessive rate of speed and without keeping a proper watch and lookout for persons traveling this public highway, and in that he was operating and driving the said automobile in a willful, careless, and unlawful manner and in violation of the statute laws of South Carolina, and operating and driving the same upon the wrong side of the public highway, all to the injury and damage of this plaintiff in the sum of $3,000."

The defendant George Morgan answered the complaint, denying the material allegations thereof, and for a first defense said:

"That the said car is the property of one George Morgan, and was on the night in question being run without the knowledge or consent of the said George Morgan by the chauffeur, and the said action of the chauffeur in so running the automobile was without the scope of his authority, and without the consent of the owner thereof, and that said George Morgan is not responsible for said accident in any way."

He also pleaded contributory negligence and contributory willfulness, and set up a counterclaim for $500. The plaintiff made reply to the counterclaim.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $600 actual damages, and the defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

"(1) That the county judge erred in allowing the jury after the close of the defendant's case to leave the courtroom and view the automobile of plaintiff, it being respectfully submitted:

"(a) That such evidence was evidence in chief, and not in reply.

"(b) That counsel for the defense had no method of replying to such evidence at said time.

"(c) That looking at an automobile which had been damaged for several months was highly prejudicial to the defendant's case.

"(2) That his honor the county judge erred in charging the jury as follows: 'I mean negligence and carelessness on the part of the defendant, Mr. Morgan, through his agent, on account of the negligence or carelessness in which the car owned by Mr. Morgan was handled, and that the damage amounted to $3,000'—it being respectfully submitted that said charge was not in response to the issues made in said case, and was highly prejudicial to the defendant, in that it led the jury to believe that Mr. Morgan was responsible instead of the car.

"(3) That his honor the county judge erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Our Supreme Court held that that applied where two automobiles were meeting one another, not where they were following one another. So this is a case where they were meeting each other and so applies'—it being respectfully submitted that said charge was a charge upon facts and in contravention of article 5, § 26, of the Constitution.

"(4) That his honor the county judge erred as a matter of law in refusing a new trial on the ground that under the admitted facts in the case the said automobile was taken without the knowledge or the consent of the owner and in violation of the law, and that no liability could attach thereto.

"(5) That his honor the county judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground that said act was unconstitutional in so far as the same attempted to apply to an automobile which being operated in violation of the state law and without the knowledge or consent of the owner.

"(6) That his honor the county judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground that the remarks of the counsel with reference to the wealth of Mr. Morgan were improper for the reason that the said case was not against Mr. Morgan, but against one Studebaker automobile.

"(7) That his honor erred in charging the jury section 2157 when he should have charged that a man should run his automobile on the side of the road which is safest under the conditions of a given case."

The exceptions will be considered in regular order:

[1] First exception: The manner in which the trial shall be conducted must necessarily be left in large measure to the discretion of the presiding judge; and his ruling is not subject to appeal, unless his discretion has been erroneously exercised, which has not been made to appear in this case.

[2] Second exception: A sufficient reason why this exception cannot be sustained is that no personal judgment is sought against the defendant George Morgan.

[3] Third exception: This exception cannot be sustained for the reason that it is stated in the argument of the appellant's attorneys that the two cars were meeting each other.

[5] Fifth exception: The authorities which we have just cited show that this exception cannot be sustained.

[6] Sixth exception: This exception must be overruled, for the reason that the plaintiff did not seek to recover a personal judgment against the defendant Morgan.

[7] Seventh exception: This exception must also be overruled, for the reason that the appellant's attorney should have presented a request, embodying the proposition for which they now contend.

Appeal dismissed.

ADGER v. KIRK et al. (No. 10655.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Will §179—Prior will held revoked by subsequent instrument.

Where testatrix by will gave her husband power of appointment over one-half of the corpus of a trust fund, the husband's last will, which was executed in Tennessee with only two witnesses, is a revocation of a Georgia will, attested by three witnesses, not only generally but with respect to exercise of the power, though testatrix's will was executed in Alabama, where three witnesses are necessary.

2. Will §70—Testamentary power may be exercised by will in accordance with laws of donee's domicile.

Where testatrix gave her husband power of appointment over one-half of the corpus of the trust fund, consisting of personality, the power of appointment could be exercised by a will of the husband executed according to the laws of his domicile, and it was not necessary where the laws of the domicile required only two witnesses that the instrument should be attested by three witnesses in accordance with the laws of the state wherein the will of testatrix was executed.

3. Wills ¶75—Will held an exercise of a power of appointment.

Where the will of testatrix gave her husband power of appointment by will over one-half of the corpus of the trust fund, the husband's will stating that it was in the exercise of the power and authority vested in him constitutes an exercise of the power of appointment.

4. Wills ¶704—In proceeding for construction of will giving power of appointment question of debts of donee cannot be raised.

In a proceeding for the construction of a will giving a power of appointment, the question of the debts of the donee cannot be raised.

5. Powers ¶26—Property over which testator has power of appointment not subject to debts.

Where the will of testator's wife gave him power of appointment over one-half of a trust fund, such fund is not subject to his debts.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Frank B. Gary, Judge.

Suit by John B. Adger, as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. of the estate of Mary L. F. Flinn, deceased, against Helen Octavia Kirk and others. From a decree for plaintiff which sustained exceptions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States to the report of the master, Helen Octavia Kirk and another appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the decree of the court below:

This is an action instituted by John B. Adger, as administrator d. b. n. c. t. a. of the estate of Mary L. F. Flinn, deceased, against Helen Octavia Kirk and others claiming an interest under the said will. He asks for the instruction of the court as to the proper interpretation of certain provisions thereof. The issues were referred to the master, who held several references, took testimony, and made his report. To this report exceptions are taken by the trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States because, as they allege, the master erred in holding as a matter of law that the exercise by Harvey W. Flinn of the power of appointment in his will of 1908 was the only proper exercise of his said power, and in not holding that the power of appointment was properly exercised by his last will, in 1916, which was properly executed and probated under the laws of the state of Tennessee, where he resided.

J. Lindley Flinn, as executor of Harvey W. Flinn, also excepts because the report fails to provide for the payment of the debts of the said Harvey W. Flinn which are claimed against the executor of the estate of the said Harvey W. Flinn in the state of Tennessee.

As explanatory of the exceptions, it should be stated that the will of Mary L. F. Flinn, the will of which an interpretation is sought, was executed in the state of Alabama, in Jefferson county, and contains this preamble: "I, Mary L. F. Flinn, wife of the Rev. Harvey W. Flinn, of the city of Bessemer and county and state aforesaid," etc.

After making certain bequests, the will directs that, as to the remaining two-thirds of such rest, residue, and remainder, "I will and direct that the same be invested by my executors and the net income thereof paid to my husband, Harvey W. Flinn, for the full term of his natural life, and upon his death I direct my executors to pay over one-half of the corpus of this trust fund to such persons or for such estates as my said husband by his last will shall direct." This will had three attesting witnesses and was admitted to probate in Charleston county, S. C.

In 1908 the said Harvey W. Flinn, then residing in the state of Georgia, executed his will. It had three attesting witnesses. The laws of Georgia required only two. In unmistakable language he undertook to exercise the power of appointment above referred to. This will was admitted to probate in Charleston, S. C.

In 1916 Harvey W. Flinn, residing in Tennessee, executed another will, expressly revoking all prior wills by him made. It had two attesting witnesses. The laws of Tennessee required only two. It was admitted to probate in the state of Tennessee. This will contains this language: "Being of sound mind, in the exercise of the power and authority vested in me, do hereby make * * * hereby revoking any former will by me at any time made."

The trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States were the beneficiaries under this last-attempted exercise of the power of appointment referred to.

The property that would go to the appointee under a valid exercise of the power is entirely personal property.

The questions that arise under the exceptions of the trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States are:

(1) Was the will of Harvey W. Flinn made in Tennessee his last will?

(2) Did it revoke his former will, made in Georgia?

(3) Was it a valid exercise of the power conferred upon Harvey W. Flinn by the will of his wife made in Alabama?

Let us briefly consider the first question:

[1] The master finds that "this Tennessee will, executed before two witnesses, conforming to the laws of that state, is recognized as controlling the disposition of personality belonging to the testator, wheresoever situated. It is therefore both his 'last will' and his 'last valid will,' though not so recognized in reference to the power conferred under the will of Mary L. F. Flinn."

I agree with the master as to the first part of the proposition, to wit, that the Tennessee will was the "last will" and the "last valid will" of Harvey W. Flinn and disposed of his personal property wherever situated. The answer to the first question above stated is therefore in the affirmative. But I cannot agree with his conclusion that the Georgia will, though revoked in part, was not revoked in so far as it undertook to exercise the power of appointment.

It will not be questioned that the donor of the power had the right to prescribe the manner in which the appointment should be exercised. She has directed that her executors pay over the trust fund in question "to such person or for such estates as my said husband by last will shall direct." It would indeed present a legal anomaly to hold that the Georgia will had been revoked and yet may do what can only be done by testator's last will.

My conclusion is that the Georgia will was revoked not only in part, but in toto. There should therefore be an affirmative answer to the second question before stated.

[2] Coming now to the third question, it may be said that the general rule is that, when a power of appointment is given, its execution is governed by the law of the domicile of the donee of the power. Especially is this true when the property affected is personal property. An apparent exception to this universal rule is presented by the case of Blount v. Walker, 28 S. C. 545, 6 S. E. 558. In this case our court held as a conclusion of fact that the donor of the power had inferentially directed that the exercise of the power of appointment should be according to the laws of South Carolina, and the court respected the donor's directions.

A careful reading of this case discloses a set of circumstances very different from those in the case before us. The principles announced in Blount v. Walker are not, therefore, necessarily applicable here. In that case the original testatrix was a resident of South Carolina, and her will was made in South Carolina. It deals with real estate in South Carolina, and her will was probated in South Carolina, and her estate was administered here. From these and other circumstances a divided court inferred that the intention of the donor was that the exercise of the power should be accompanied by the formalities of a South Carolina will. The original will provided that the appointment should be by the donee's "last will and testament duly executed."

There were some other circumstances in Blount v. Walker pointed out by Chief Justice McIver from which the intention of the donor was inferred. I shall not stop to recite them.

In the case before us the donor of the power was a resident of Alabama. Her will complied with the laws of both South Carolina and Alabama. The property affected is personal property.

We conclude that there are no circumstances surrounding the will of Mrs. Mary L. F. Flinn from which the court must infer that her directions or intentions were that the exercise of the power should be in accordance with the South Carolina law. And we conclude that there is no reason in this case to depart from the general rule that the power should be exercised in accordance with the law of the domicile of the donee of the power, if there is nothing from which to infer a different direction on the part of the donor.

[3] It is claimed that the words of the Tennessee will do not constitute an exercise of the power of appointment but I cannot take this view of the matter. In view of the recently filed opinion of our Supreme Court in Price v. Ouiga Realty Co., January 26, 1920, 118 S. C. 556, 101 S. E. 819, I am constrained to hold that to conclude that the language of the Tennessee will was not a proper exercise of the power of appointment would be taking a view that "is entirely too literal and technical." See the cases of Bilderback v. Boyce, 14 S. C. 528, Moody v. Tedder, 16 S. C. 557, and Burkett v. Whittemore, 36 S. C. 428, 15 S. E. 616.

There should, therefore, be an affirmative answer to the third question above stated.

The exceptions of the trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States are, therefore, sustained and the report of the master is to that extent modified.

[4, 5] The exceptions filed by J. Lindley Flinn as executor of Harvey W. Flinn's will cannot be sustained for several reasons:

(1) It is the will of Mary L. F. Flinn that is before the court for instruction.

(2) There is nothing in the record to show that there are creditors of Harvey W. Flinn who should be protected.

(3) The remainder over which Harvey W. Flinn is given the power of appointment is not a part of the estate of Harvey W. Flinn, but it passes under the will of the donor of the power. It could not, therefore, be held to respond to the debts of Harvey W. Flinn.

This is conclusively shown by the case of Bilderback v. Boyce, 14 S. C. at page 541. This exception is therefore overruled.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the exceptions of the trustees of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States be, and the same are hereby, sustained, and to that extent the report of the master is modified.

It is further ordered that exceptions interposed by J. Lindley Flinn as executor, etc., be, and the same are, overruled.

SMYTHE v. BRUNSON et al. (No. 10548.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 20, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 1010(1)—Finding sustained by evidence conclusive.

The trial court's finding in a law case, where sustained by sufficient evidence, is conclusive.

2. Vendor and purchaser  $\S$ 334(7)—Purchaser may not recover for shortage in grant where sale was in gross of a certain lot.

Where a lot was not sold by front foot or square foot, but the sale was in gross of the lot for a certain sum, the purchaser cannot recover of the vendor for the difference between the lot as described in the deed and the lesser amount shown by survey.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

Action by Ellison A. Smythe against George W. Brunson, Jr., and another, to recover for a shortage in lots sold described in a deed as having a 51-foot front, whereas the survey only showed 49.7 feet, in which Thomas Harrison, defendant's vendor, was served with notice to come in and defend title and he answered denying the allegations of the complaint. Reference was made to a master, his findings excepted to, and sustained. The court found that the evidence showed that the grant was not at so much per front foot or per square foot, but that the sale was of a certain lot for so much money, being a sale in gross, and refused compensation for the deficiency, and entered a decree dismissing the complaint, from which the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The decree of the circuit judge was as follows:

This case came before me for trial upon exceptions by the defendants to the report of the master, to whom all issues of law and fact were referred.

The plaintiff is a purchaser of a part of what is known as the Heldman lot, conveyed to Heldman by McBee in 1850, and described in that deed as having a frontage of 140 feet on Main street, in the city of Greenville, at the southeast corner of Main and Broad streets. The entire lot was sold as the property of the estate of Heldman by the master and purchased by B. M. McGee, who afterwards sold 81 feet frontage to Alvin H. Dean, the same being on the corner of said streets. Dean sold same to one Harrison, and he sold 30 feet frontage to Gower and Houston and 51 feet frontage to B. H. Peace. The plaintiff claims the 51-foot lot through B. H. Peace. The 30-foot lot sold to Gower and Houston was at the corner of Main and Broad streets, and upon it they erected a brick building. Afterwards, the plaintiff, having acquired the lot adjoining it, the 51-foot lot fronting on Main street, began to build upon it, and discovered that between the Gower and Houston building and the lot next below the 51-foot lot, instead of a frontage of 51 feet, there was a frontage of only 49 feet 7 inches, a deficiency in frontage of 1 foot 5 inches. The plaintiff then brought this action against his grantors for damages for breach of warranty by reason of the deficiency in frontage. They vouched Harrison, and he Alvin H. Dean.

In the first place, it is pertinent to state that the conveyance to the plaintiff was not at so much per front foot or at so much per square foot; it was a sale of a certain lot for so much money, a sale in gross; and the rule in such case is that, where land is sold in gross, no compensation will be granted for a deficiency in the quantity conveyed, unless such deficiency is so great as to justify an inference of fraud or mistake equivalent to fraud. This can scarcely be said of a deficiency of 17 inches in a frontage of 612 inches, less than 3 per cent. Upon this ground I hold that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

But, assuming for the sake of argument that he is so entitled, it is evident that his recovery is dependent upon establishing, by the greater weight of evidence, that the walls of the Gower and Houston building occupying the entire space conveyed to them are correctly located. Naturally, if the Gower and Houston building is over the line and upon the 51-foot lot claimed by the plaintiff, his first thought would be to sue them for the possession of the 1 foot 5 inch strip. He has not done so, and pitches his action upon the theory that the Gower and Houston building is properly located, and, their title antedating his, there has been a breach of warranty in his title. He must go further and show that the lots below him are properly located and are not impinging upon his 51-foot lot. The defendant contends that the Gower and Houston wall on Broad street is at least 1 foot 5 inches further down than it should have been, and that this error on their part has caused the encroachment upon the plaintiff's lot. The defendant has presented a formidable array of facts which convince me that their contention is correct, and I so find; at least they completely meet the plaintiff's effort, as was incumbent upon him, to show by the preponderance of the evidence that the Gower and Houston corner was properly located. Many years ago, shortly after Heldman went into possession of the entire lot, 140 feet front, he built a brick house at the Broad street corner. The front door was in the corner of the building, and steps were built extending into Broad street about 18 inches. The Broad street wall of the house was about 18 inches back of a line drawn from the corner of the lower step parallel with Broad street. At the lower corner of the house—that is, the corner on Broad street—a fence inclosing his garden was built. It began about 18 inches from this corner, and the space between the fence corner post and the house, really a part of the fence, was inclosed with two planks about 8 or 10 inches wide. The line of this fence as it extended down Broad street was in line with the corner of the steps referred to. Between the steps and the corner of the fence there were two cellar doors, opening upon Broad street and in the space between the Broad street wall of the house and a line extended from the center of the steps to the corner of the fence. At the lower corner of the lot, front on Broad street, there was erected by Heldman a stable, the front of which was flush with the fence. Heldman then occupied this space for nearly 50 years. After Alvin H. Dean sold off the front part of the lot to Harrison, he removed the stable and fence and built a brick storehouse. He purposely set back the front of this building 18 inches. This, in my opinion, is the explanation of the mislocation of the Gower and Houston building. When they bought, the old Heldman house was standing. They decided to tear it down and erect a new building. The front of the Dean building was on a line with the wall of the old Heldman house, and in building their Broad street wall Gower and Houston placed it where the old wall stood. The defendants are not responsible for this, and, if the plaintiff has any remedy at all, it is against Gower and Houston and not the defendants.

The findings of fact by the master inconsistent with the foregoing conclusions are reversed, the exceptions are sustained, and the complaint is dismissed.

Sirrinc & Nettles, of Greenville, for appellant.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an action brought against defendants Brunson and Peace, November 17, 1913, to recover $445.46. These defendants served notice on Thomas Harrison to come in and defend the title. Within due time he answered, denying the allegations of the complaint. An order of reference was agreed upon and the case was heard by the master, who rendered his report June 12, 1917, finding the allegations of the complaint to be true and giving judgment for the plaintiff. To this report the defendant Thomas Harrison excepted and the case was heard by Hon. T. J. Mauldin, circuit judge, who filed a decree on July 21, 1919, sustaining the exceptions to the master's report and dismissing the complaint.

[1] The exceptions, six in number, impute error of fact and of law on the part of his honor. This being a law case, his honor's finding of fact must be sustained, as there is plenty of evidence to support his finding.

[2] The evidence shows that the lot was not sold by front foot or square foot. It was sold in gross for a certain sum. This case is controlled by Jones v. Bauskett, 2 Speers, star page 68, cited with approval in Shuler v. Williams, 112 S. C. 849, 99 S. E. 819, and by Shuler v. Williams.

All exceptions are overruled and judgment affirmed.

DAWSON v. DELLA TORRE et al.
(No. 10675.)

1. Divorce ¶326—Divorce decrees rendered in foreign state must be recognized in South Carolina.

Where decedent, who owned land in South Carolina, married in Maryland, a judgment of divorce rendered in Maryland on due service will be recognized in South Carolina, even though the courts of South Carolina cannot grant a divorce; for full faith and credit must be given by the courts of one state to judgments of another.

2. Dower ¶52—Divorce bars dower.

Where plaintiff, who was married in Maryland, in that state procured a divorce from her husband, who owned lands in South Carolina, such judgment of divorce, being binding on the South Carolina courts under the full faith and credit clause, will bar plaintiff from recovering dower in South Carolina lands of her former husband.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by Mary S. Dawson against Thomas Della Torre and another. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and dismissing the same, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The decree referred to follows:

This is an action for recovery of dower in certain property now owned by the several grantees and devisees of plaintiff's deceased husband, from whom she has been granted a divorce a vincule matrimonii by a court of general jurisdiction in the state of Maryland, where the plaintiff and her husband were married.

The case is now before me on a demurrer to the complaint. It is admitted by counsel for plaintiff that the divorce granted by the court in Maryland is valid and binding in that state, but it is claimed not to bind the defendant in this state, nor on plaintiff so far as her dower is concerned.

The complaint alleges facts which would entitle the plaintiff to dower in the premises described in the complaint if she had been the wife of the deceased husband at the time of his death or if she had not been legally divorced by the Maryland court in July, 1906.

The sole question therefore before me now is whether or not the judgment of absolute divorce granted by the court in Maryland as aforesaid is binding on the plaintiff herein to the extent of depriving her of her dower interests in the property of her deceased husband situated in South Carolina, where the husband had his legal residence at the time of his marriage to plaintiff on December 24, 1890, in the city of Baltimore, Md., until the date of his death on February 23, 1917.

The plaintiff alleges in her complaint, paragraph 8, "that said Dr. John L. Dawson, the defendant in said cause, having never had a domicile in Maryland and having been served only with process by appointment in a railroad station in Baltimore while passing through, was not subject to the jurisdiction of said court in Maryland, and was not bound in South Carolina by said proceedings in Maryland, and this plaintiff alleges that she has never remarried." This allegation is a mere conclusion of law. The fact that he was not a resident of Maryland and was served only while passing through the jurisdiction is not sufficient allegation of fact to show that the service was not good. If he had been brought into the jurisdiction under legal process in another action, he might not have been subject to process in that action wherein he was then served, but nothing appears here to show that he was not there of his own volition. Certainly there was no allegation tending to show a collusion, for that implies a fraud on the court; so, if the defendant in that action, Dr. Dawson, had come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of placing himself within the jurisdiction or for the purpose of allowing himself to be legally served with process, it would have signified no collusion.

If the plaintiff was the legal wife of Dr. John L. Dawson at the time of his death, she would now be entitled to all she claims in her complaint. But according to her own admissions, in her complaint and through counsel, she was not the legal wife of Dr. Dawson at his death nor had she been his wife since the decree of the court granting an absolute divorce in July, 1906.

Now then, since it has been established that these parties were divorced absolutely by a court of general jurisdiction in another state of the Union, this state and its courts are compelled to "give full faith and credit" to the judgment of such court in a sister state, and the only remaining question that could enter into our inquiry would be whether such court had jurisdiction of the cause and the parties.

In the case of Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. Ed. 897, cited as authority in McCreery v. Davis, 44 S. C. 195, 22 S. E. 178, 28 L. R. A. 655, 51 Am. St. Rep. 794, we find the following language, to wit: "The record of a judgment rendered in another state may be contradicted as to facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction; and if it be shown that such facts did not exist, the record will be a nullity, notwithstanding it may recite that they did exist. Want of jurisdiction may be shown either as to the subject-matter of the person, or, proceedings in rem, as to the thing." In the same case it was held that the want of jurisdiction of the court by which a judgment is rendered in any state may be questioned in a collateral proceeding in another state, notwithstanding the provisions of the fourth article of the Constitution and the law of 1790, and notwithstanding the averments contained in the record of the judgment itself." Again, in Hanley v. Donoghue, 116 U. S. 4, 6 Sup. Ct. 244, 29 L. Ed. 535, cited in the case of McCreery v. Davis, supra, we find this language, to wit: "Judgments recovered in one state of the Union, when proved in the courts of another, differ from judgments recovered in a foreign country in no other respect than that of not being re-examinable upon the merits, nor impeachable for fraud in obtaining them, if rendered by a court having [competent] jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties."

That our state, aside from its duty under the federal Constitution, recognizes divorces granted by courts of other states, there can be no doubt. We find in our Criminal Code, § 381, relating to bigamy, the following, to wit: "Whoever, being married, and whose husband or wife has not remained continually for seven years beyond the sea, or continually absented himself or herself, the one from the other, for the space of seven years together, the one of them not knowing the other to be living within that time, * * * or whose marriage has not been annulled by decree of a competent tribunal having jurisdiction both of the cause and the parties, shall marry another person," etc. Again we find a provision very much similar in section 3754 of our Civil Code, relating to bigamous marriages, providing that marriages of persons having a husband or wife living are void, but adding a proviso as to "any person who shall be divorced." This statute was referred to in the case of McCreery v. Davis, supra, and the Supreme Court, in discussing it, said that, while there were no cases in our reports construing it, yet it was evidently meant to mean only "valid" divorces, and since neither the state of New York, where the marriage was performed, nor the state of South Carolina, where one of the parties lived (the defendant), recognized as a cause for divorce that for which that divorce was granted, the statute would not avail anything. This language would indicate clearly that, had that divorce been granted on grounds recognized in New York, where the marriage was performed, and the court had had jurisdiction of the persons, this state would have recognized the judgment of the state granting this divorce. Now in the case at bar the marriage was performed in the state of Maryland, and the court granting the divorce was a court of the state of Maryland, and jurisdiction of the defendant had been acquired for he was served in the state of Maryland.

In the case of Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 567, 26 Sup. Ct. 527, 50 L. Ed. 868, 5 Ann. Cas. 1, Chief Justice White (then Associate Justice), in laying down certain propositions of law which he says were "irrevocably concluded by previous decisions of this court" goes on in his opinion, using this language, to wit: "It has, moreover, been decided that where a bona fide domicile has been acquired in a state by either of the parties to a marriage, and a suit is brought by the domiciled party in such state for divorce, the courts of that state, if they acquire personal jurisdiction also of the other party, have authority to enter a decree of divorce, entitled to be enforced in every state by the full-faith and credit clause. Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall, 108 [19 L. Ed. 604]."

It seems, therefore, well settled that where a marriage has been contracted in a state, and afterwards in that state where one of the parties is domiciled, a suit for divorce is begun and the other party is personally served, the judgment of that court is binding not only on the parties, but on every court in every state of the Union where that judgment is properly pleaded or admitted by the adverse party to exist.

The case at bar has all the essential elements which make the judgment of absolute divorce granted by the Maryland court valid and binding on the parties, their privies, and the courts of this state. Therefore I sustain the demurrer to the complaint in this action and dismiss the complaint, and it is so ordered.

Willis & Willis, of Baltimore, Md., and Mitchell & Smith, of Charleston, for appellant.

Henry W. Connor, Nathans & Sinkler, Jos. W. Barnwell, Flicker & Erckmann, and Wm. Henry Parker, all of Charleston, for respondents.

FRASER, J. The case contains the following statement:

"This is an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint and dismissing the complaint.

"The summons was served on December 15, 1917. The complaint is for dower in lands in South Carolina, and alleges that the plaintiff-appellant, Mary S. Dawson, was married to the late Dr. John L. Dawson at Baltimore, Md., on December 24, 1890, Dr. Dawson being and having been for many years a resident of Charleston, S. C., and the plaintiff and her husband, after the marriage, resided in Charleston together as the place of their matrimonial domicile until the 10th of May, 1903, at which time the plaintiff and Dr. Dawson separated and lived apart; that on May 17, 1906, plaintiff filed a bill for divorce against Dr. Dawson on the ground of abandonment in the circuit court for Hartford county, in the state of Maryland, and a decree for divorce was granted by said court on July 24, 1906, and the plaintiff has never remarried; that after the marriage and during the period of coverture the said Dr. Dawson was seized in fee and possessed of certain described pieces of real property in Charleston, S. C., and there died, a resident of Charleston, on February 23, 1917, and the terms of his will and his disposition of his property to certain of the defendants are set forth.

"The answers of the defendants who answered vary in form, but all set up the divorce granted by the Maryland court as an affirmative defense. On February 16, 1918, the plaintiff demurred to this affirmative defense set up in the various answers on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. Thereafter, on April 11, 1918, the defendants Della Torre and Lynah, executors and trustees, served a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Still later and five days before the hearing, to wit, on November 27, 1918, the defendant Charleston Library Society served an oral demurrer to the complaint. The specifications of all these demurrers are hereinafter set forth in this record.

"The main issue was whether or not the Maryland divorce operated as a bar to plaintiff's right to dower in land in South Carolina of which Dr. Dawson was seized during the coverture.

"The demurrers were argued before Judge Shipp at Charleston, and on January 8, 1919, his decree was filed sustaining demurrer to and dismissing the complaint. From that decree this appeal is taken."

[1, 2] The issue is simple and entirely free from complications. The marriage was contracted in Maryland under the laws of that state. In Maryland marriages are contracted in contemplation of their possible dissolution for certain causes. The Maryland court, after personal service on the deceased in Maryland, and upon what we must assume a proper showing that a cause existed, dissolved the marriage relation. While this was contracted in view of a possible dissolution, the South Carolina court could not have dissolved it for any cause. The South Carolina courts must, however, under the full-faith and credit doctrine, recognize the dissolution affected by the same authority that made it. It is hard to imagine a clearer case for the operation of the full-faith and credit doctrine than this. Something has been said about a collusive service on the husband. If true, it can do the plaintiff no good. She cannot profit by her own wrong. So far as this case is concerned and between these parties, the status, and everything connected with it, was absolutely destroyed, so far as this record shows.

The cases on the subject are many, and to review them would be unprofitable. It generally is unprofitable. In McCreery v. Davis, 44 S. C. 185, 22 S. E. 178, 28 L. R. A. 655, 51 Am. St. Rep. 794, the divorce was void for want of jurisdiction, and the statements largely dicta. Marriage is frequently spoken of as a contract, but it is not. It has no element of a contract. It is a status. A man and woman may contract to assume the status of marriage, but, whether it be regarded here as a contract or a status, the result is the same. The contract was rescinded. The status was destroyed. Our statutes, both civil and criminal, recognize the fact that the relation may be destroyed absolutely. A divorce, meaning a valid divorce, of course, relieves the parties from the penalty of bigamy, under the criminal law, and under the civil statute allows the parties to marry again. There is no limit to the number of remarriages in the statute. To allow an accumulation of dowers, founded on the same right, is a reductio ad absurdum. They are all good, or none. The Maryland divorce of a Maryland marriage destroys dower, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Let Judge Shipp's decree be reported.

CLARENDON COUNTY v. SUMTER COUNTY. (No. 10635.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

Counties ~~to~~ 14—General Assembly cannot permit portion of territory voted to be annexed to another to remain in county from which taken.

Where, under Civ. Code 1912, §§ 643, 646, 647, the taking certain specified territory from C. county and annexing it to S. county and changing the county lines accordingly was duly petitioned for and submitted to an election, and the result of the election, in favor of such proposition, was duly certified to the authorities, including the General Assembly, but, after the election had been declared, individuals in a certain portion of the affected area procured a survey to be made of a line which would leave them in C. county, the General Assembly had no power, in view of the express limitation in Const. art. 3, § 1, requiring submission to vote of the question of alteration of any existing county line, to permit such portion of the territory voted to be annexed to S. county to remain in C. county and to alter accordingly the lines voted for, as for the General Assembly to exempt a certain subarea, part of the original area, from the result of the proceedings regularly had, would be to alter county lines in a manner not first submitted to vote.

Petition in the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court by Clarendon County against Sumter County to determine between adjoining counties the question of annexation of territory. Question answered.

Du Rant & Ellerbe, of Manning, for petitioner.

Lee & Moise, Jennings & Harly, and Clifton Wood, all of Sumter, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. This is a petition in the original jurisdiction of this court of exceptional character, the nature of which will be understood from the following statement:

The record for appeal is singularly barren of dates. At some time prior to January 1, 1921, a petition was filed with the Governor of this state, signed by more than one-third of the qualified electors residing in a certain portion of Clarendon county, adjoining Sumter county, praying that the county line between these two counties be so changed as to annex said territory to Sumter county.

Upon the filing of this petition, the Governor, in compliance with section 647, vol. 1, Code of Laws A. D. 1912, appointed commissioners; the commissioners selected surveyors; the surveyors surveyed, located, and marked the proposed change of line, platted the same, and filed certified plats with the secretary of state and the respective clerks of court of the two counties.

The election was then ordered by the Governor in the area proposed to be annexed, upon the question of annexation, which election was held according to law and resulted in a majority of more than two-thirds in favor of the proposition which was submitted. The result was duly certified to the election commissioners of Clarendon county, by them to the secretary of state, and by him to the General Assembly at its session which convened in January, 1921.

It is conceded that all of the constitutional and statutory requirements up to this point were complied with. No protest or objection was made. The election was fairly and duly held in compliance with the law.

After the election had been declared certain individuals residing in the lower portion of the area procured a survey to be made of a line which would exclude them from said area and leave them in Clarendon county.

At the session of the General Assembly held in January, 1921 (Acts 1921, p. 283), an act was passed annexing to Sumter county the area originally proposed to be annexed, but provided for an exemption from the terms of the act of a certain subarea included within the lines of the private survey referred to. This exemption was made, however, subject to the following proviso:

"Provided the Supreme Court holds in a proceeding to be forthwith instituted in said court by the counties of Sumter and Clarendon, or either of them, any taxpayer thereof, that the General Assembly is empowered in altering existing county lines to do other than to provide for the annexation of the whole of the territory voted to be cut from one county and annexed to another, and if the General Assembly may permit the portion of territory embraced within the survey and shown upon the plat filed with the Secretary of the State to remain in the county from which it was proposed to cut the same. If the court holds that the General Assembly is without power to do other than provide for the transfer or reject the whole of the territory voted to be cut from one county and annexed to another, then the whole of the territory embraced within said survey and plat, and first described in this act, shall become and be annexed to the county of Sumter."

The act referred to was followed by a concurrent resolution dated March 5, 1921, by which this court was requested to hear and determine the issue between the two counties, expressed tersely in this form:

"Has the General Assembly the power to permit a portion of the territory voted to be annexed to the county of Sumter, to remain in the county of Clarendon, and to alter the lines accordingly?"

To the solution of this question we will therefore address ourselves.

While article 7, § 7, of the Constitution purports to be an express grant to the General Assembly of the power to alter county lines, such grant was unnecessary, as the General Assembly under article 3, § 1, was fully vested with general legislative power, included in which is the power to alter county lines. That section, however, is an express limitation upon the power, and provides:

"That before any existing county line is altered the question shall first be submitted to the qualified electors of the territory proposed to be taken from one county and given to another."

The "question" to be submitted is the alteration of the existing county line. The question of the alteration of a line cannot be submitted without defining the extent of the alteration. The election is held upon the question of altering the county line as thus defined. The election determines whether or not this particular defined alteration shall be approved, and all parties, including the General Assembly, are bound by the result. Section 643 (by reference in section 646) declares it to be the duty of the General Assembly at its next session to effectuate the result of the election. Of course, the General Assembly cannot be compelled to perform its duty, but it certainly is not authorized by the Constitution or any statute to exercise any legislative, judicial, or political power in conflict with the limitations contained in the section under review. To sanction the exemption by it of a certain subarea, a part of the original area, from the result of the proceedings which have been regularly had, would be necessarily to sanction the alteration of the county line in a manner which had not been "first submitted to the qualified electors of the territory proposed to be taken from one county and given to another." If it had the power to diminish the area upon which the election had been had, it has the power to increase it, a power which we assume would not be claimed or conceded by any one. The majority who prevailed in the election are entitled to the fruits of their victory; they are entitled to the area as it was proposed and voted for, and not in a truncated form. It is impossible to say what would have been the result of an election upon the line as indicated by the exemption of the subarea. It is conceivable that an election would have been favorable to the original proposition and not to an amended one. Hence it cannot be said that the amended line has the approval of the electors; it certainly can be said that it has not been submitted to them as the Constitution requires.

It follows that the line as fixed in the survey of July 15, 1920, first described in the act of 1921, as per plat made by the surveyors named, and filed, is the county line, and that the proviso of the act purporting to exempt from the operation of this act certain territory therein described is void.

It is so adjudged.

STATE v. BROWNING. (No. 10629.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §913(1)—Order for new trial reversed where judge not within prohibited degree of relationship to deceased.

Where an order granting new trial to defendant convicted of murder was made on the sole ground that the trial judge was connected with deceased within six degrees by consanguinity or affinity, but, under Civ. Code 1912, § 8555, subd. 6, the judge was not within the sixth degree, but the seventh, the order must be reversed.

2. Jury §75(2)—Excuse of juror in capital case for business reasons not erroneous.

In a prosecution for murder, where the trial court, over the objection of defendant, excused a juror solely for business reasons, defendant's peremptory challenges being exhausted before the jury was complete, there was no reversible error in such erroneous exercise of discretion by the court.

Watts, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Orangeburg County; T. J. Mauldin, Judge.

James P. Browning was convicted of murder, and from order granting his motion for new trial, the State appeals. Order reversed, and judgment of conviction affirmed.

The order granting new trial, directed to be reported, follows:

This is a motion for a new trial, the defendant having been convicted of murder, with a recommendation to mercy at the September, 1919, term of the court of general sessions in and for the county of Orangeburg.

The motion is based upon certain grounds, herewith attached and made a part of this record and marked "Exhibit A."

This matter turns mainly upon the alleged relationship between Mrs. Sophie Fairey, the mother of the deceased, and the judge presiding at the trial, Hon. Hayne F. Rice.

It is admitted by the state that the mother of the deceased is related in the sixth degree to the judge who tried the case and that the deceased was related within the seventh degree to the trial judge.

I know that Judge Rice was not cognizant of this fact during the trial, and if he had been he would not have heard the case. It appears that the state was assisted in the prosecution of the case by Thomas M. Raysor, Esq., of the Orangeburg bar, but was employed by Mrs. Laurie D. Fairey, the widow of the deceased, and paid by her as administratrix of the estate of the deceased.

This case impresses me with the conviction that my duty under the facts revealed before me is to grant a new trial, however much I regret the necessity therefor.

It is therefore ordered: That a new trial be, and the same hereby is, granted.

A. J. Hydrick and T. M. Raysor, both of Orangeburg, for the State.

Wolfe & Berry and A. H. Moss, all of Orangeburg, for respondent.

WATTS, J. The respondent was convicted of murder with a recommendation to mercy before Judge Rice and a jury at the September term of court, 1919, for Orangeburg county, and sentenced by the judge to life imprisonment. From this judgment and sentence defendant appealed.

Later, to wit, September, 1920, a motion was made in the court of general sessions before Judge Mauldin, for a new trial, which was granted. Thereupon the state appealed and challenges the correctness of this order granting a new trial. This order should be set out in the report of the case.

The moving papers in the case show conclusively that the motion was made solely on the question of relationship of Judge Rice to the deceased, the contention being that they were connected within six degrees by consanguinity or affinity, and Judge Mauldin based his order on this.

It is true that he uses the language, "under the facts revealed before me"; but no reference can be drawn that he acted other than on the question of relationship, and did not exercise his discretion in granting a new trial on after-discovered testimony. That was not before him and was not considered by him, and the question solely to be considered by this court is: Was he in error in granting the new trial on the question of connection by affinity of Judge Rice and the deceased, and the widow of the deceased?

Under the showing made, Judge Rice is not within the prohibited degree; he is not related within the sixth degree. When he tried the case, he did not know of any relationship or affinity; the order of Judge Mauldin shows that.

[1] It is absurd to hold that because a judge is related to one who employs a lawyer to prosecute a criminal case he is disqualified to try the case. It will be seen by the exhibits in the case that Judge Rice, under section 3555, subd. 6, vol. 1, Code of Laws 1912, was not within the sixth degree, but seventh, and the order must be reversed, for this reason, and also under the opinion of Mr. Justice Gary (now Chief Justice) in Ex parte Hilton, 64 S. C. 205, 41 S. E. 978, 92 Am. St. Rep. 800, and authorities therein cited. The appeal from Judge Rice involves two questions: Was it error in excusing the juror Jernigan without legal ground or excuse over and against the objection of the defendant, and alleged error in the charge of his honor?

[2] The first will have to be sustained. His honor was in error in excusing the juror. Under the affidavit submitted it did not show that he was excused, under the statute; it did not show that he was sick, but solely for business reasons. Ordinarily a judge can excuse in the exercise of his wise discretion, although he ought to be careful and not allow private interests to prevail over public good; a public duty to serve on the jury is more important to good citizenship than to inconvenience a private enterprise, by having one of its employees absent serving on the jury, thereby temporarily inconveniencing the business.

The statute says who shall be excused, leaving the other excuses to the wise discretion of the judge, and ordinarily that will not be interfered with. But in the instant case the defendant acting within his rights, being tried for a capital offense, protested and objected to the juror being excused. His peremptory challenges were exhausted before the jury was complete, and he was prejudiced, possibly, thereby. This is not on all fours with State v. Tidwell, 100 S. C. 248, 84 S. E. 778, but the reasoning of the case is applicable here, and the excusing of Jernigan, against the objection of the defendant, was an erroneous exercise of discretion and is a reversible error. This exception should be sustained. The other exception is overruled, being without merit. The order of Judge Mauldin is reversed. Judgment of circuit court is affirmed, that being the conclusion of the majority of the court.

Affirmed.

GARY, C. J. I concur in reversing the order of Judge Mauldin, but dissent as to the reversal of the judgment on the ground of error in excusing the juror Jernigan.

FRASER, J., concurs.

COTHRAN, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice in both propositions announced by him.

1. It is questionable whether the deceased in a homicide case should be considered a "party to the cause" (a criminal prosecution of the slayer), within the purview of article 5, § 6, of the Constitution, to such an extent as to disqualify the presiding judge on account of his relationship to him; though delicacy would suggest the exercise of his discretion in respecting the spirit of the provision. In no possible aspect could the mother of the deceased be so regarded. It appears here that the deceased was related to the presiding judge in the seventh degree; the mother, of course, in the sixth degree. Judge Mauldin was in error therefore in holding that Judge Rice was disqualified by reason of his relationship to the mother of the deceased.

2. As to the action of Judge Rice in excusing the juror Jernigan: That was an incident in the conduct of the court within the sound discretion of the presiding judge, and cannot be assigned as reversible error, if error at all, unless it be shown, as it has not been, that this discretion was abused and that the defendant was actually prejudiced thereby.

"The court may in the exercise of its discretion excuse jurors for reasons which constitute no legal grounds of disqualification or exemption but which are purely personal to the juror, such as * * * when his business interests would be materially injured. * * * It is uniformly held that whether a juror shall be excused is a matter resting within the sound discretion of the court, the exercise of which will not be interfered with unless it is clearly shown to have been abused to the actual prejudice of the complaining party." 24 Cyc. 260; State v. Whitman, 14 Rich. 113; State v. Gill, 14 S. C. 410.

In the last-named case the court says:

"It does not appear that his right of peremptory challenge, which, it must be remembered, is a right to reject and not to select jurors (State v. Wise & Johnson, 7 Rich. 412), was in any way abridged, and we are at a loss to conceive how the discharge of these jurors, even if it had been illegal or irregular, could operate to the prejudice of any of the rights of the defendant."

The case of Omaha R. Co. v. Beeson, 36 Neb. 361, 54 N. W. 557, is referred to in 24 Cyc. 261, as announcing the principle in very clear terms:

"There is a wide distinction between the retention of an incompetent juror and the excusing of one who is competent. In the former case the law presumes prejudice to the complaining party, but in the latter it will be presumed that the jurors who tried the case possessed all of the necessary qualifications and that action of the court, if erroneous, was without prejudice."

The judgment of this court in my opinion should be a reversal of the order of Judge Mauldin in the appeal instituted by the state and an affirmation of the judgment of the circuit court in the appeal instituted by the defendant.

BAILEY v. FREE AND ACCEPTED MASONS OF SOUTH CAROLINA.
(No. 10639.)

1. Specific performance ⇐28(2)—indefinite contract to make lease not specifically enforced.

A contract to make a lease, indefinite as to when the lease was to commence, as to the period of the lease, and as to everything except the amount to be paid per month, could not be specifically enforced.

2. Associations ⇐18—One trustee cannot make contract unless other trustees approve or confirm it.

One of several trustees of a fraternal organization cannot make a contract to execute a lease unless the other trustees approve or confirm it.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by J. W. Bailey against the Free and Accepted Masons of South Carolina. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The letters referred to in the opinion are as follows:

"Bennettsville, S. C., Aug. 26, 1919.

"J. W. Bailey, Columbia, S. C.—My Dear Sir: Your letter of the 7th inst. was not overlooked, but, on the contrary, received the most careful consideration. I delayed my reply in order to confer with other trustees before giving you an answer. I have not yet heard from all, but am satisfied from information at hand that three things are reasonably certain:

"1st. They will ask more rent for your store.

"2d. They will give you preference, provided you are willing to pay as much as others are offering. (We have a reliable offer to lease for 1, 2 or 3 years at $75.)

"3d. They will give you a lease for one, two or three years at $75 per month.

"You have been prompt in your payments, and a very satisfactory tenant in every way, but the trustees cannot, in justice to the Masons of the state, whose agents they are, continue your rent at $50 longer, since they have a written offer from a responsible person of $75.

"I trust you may see your way clear to increase your rent. Seventy-five dollars does not mean so much now as fifty did when you moved into the building.

"In case you are not willing to pay the increased rent, consider your notice to vacate from this date, and we shall expect the from the expiration of the time allowed you by law. On the other hand, if you desire to pay the $75, you may go ahead and make the changes you expect to make, and they, the trustees, will give you a written lease for the desired time, as soon as practical.

"Trusting that I have made the position of myself and the trustees plain, I am, with best wishes,

"Yours respectfully, E. J. Sawyer,

"Columbia, S. C., Sept. 2, 1919.

"Mr. E. J. Sawyer, Bennettsville, S. C.—Dear Sir: Your recent letter in reference to the renting of the property which I now occupy has been received. Replying, would say that I am exceedingly sorry that you find it necessary to raise the rent when my present time is out, and especially so because of the fact that another man would try to get possession by offering a higher figure. I have had it pretty hard during the and the war, but have always, as you know, paid the rent promptly.

"I have worked hard to build up a business, and now, or at the end of my present contract, to move would be disastrous. Under the circumstances, I will have to accept your offer, and do accept the same at a higher rental—the figures named, $75 per month.

"I hope that when your board meets, it will take my case under consideration and if possible made a reduction, especially as it would have a prompt and reliable tenant. Any consideration that the board might make would be very much appreciated by

"Yours very truly,

J. W. Bailey."

"Columbia, S. C., March 1, 1920.

"Mr. E. J. Sawyer, Bennettsville, S. C.—Dear Sir: Inclosed find check, fifty dollars ($50.00), rent for store for the month of February. According to our contract made some time ago, whereby I am to get a lease for a period of not over three years, paying therefor as rent seventy-five dollars ($75.00) per month, I am now asking that you have the said lease made out and executed for the period of three years. The payment of seventy-five dollars per month is in case I be given the lease. Unless the lease is given, as I understand, I would only have to pay fifty dollars per month until the year ends. However, I am asking for a fulfillment of the contract heretofore agreed upon, viz. a three years' lease at the rate of seventy-five dollars per month. Please attend to this matter as soon as possible.

"Your very truly, J. W. Bailey."

Notice to vacate at end of year was given by letter dated April 20, 1920, as follows (omitting addresses, etc.):

"This is to notify you that the Free and Accepted Masons of South Carolina will wish possession of their premises now occupied by you on Washington street, Columbia, S. C., at the expiration of the calendar year, and this is to notify you to vacate said premises on or before December 31, 1920, so that we may secure possession of same on January 1, 1921.

"We are giving you notice now, so that you may have ample time to make arrangements to secure other premises should you so desire.

"Yours very truly, E. J. Sawyer,
"Gen. Sec. F. & A. M. of S. C."

"March 17, 1920.

"Yours of the 1st instant inclosing check for $50.00, which you state is rent for the month of February, duly received.

"By reference to our correspondence, particularly my letter of August 28, 1919, you will see that you were advised that the rent would be $75.00 per month after the termination of your lease on December 31, 1919. This proposition was accepted by you in letters to me of date September 2d and 6th.

"Unquestionably your tenancy would have expired December 31, 1919, except for our agreement to allow you to continue in the building at $75.00 per month. This rental of $75.00 per month is for one year only. In my letter of August 28th, above referred to, I advised you that we had a reliable offer to lease for one, two or three years at $75.00 per month, and stated that I felt reasonably certain that the trustees would give you a lease for one, two or three years at $75 per month. I had no authority to make the lease without the sanction of the trustees and your letter of reply stated no specific time, but expressed your willingness to pay $75.00 per month.

"Your rent at $75.00 per month began January 1st. You have made two remittances of $50.00 each through error or misapprehension on your part, and there is now due a balance on account of rent of $50.00, and $75.00 will be due April 1st as rent for the month of March.

"Unless you let us have promptly check for $50.00 covering the arrearage in rent in accordance with the above we will be forced to take steps to protect the Free and Accepted Masons of South Carolina, whom we represent. In addition to the correspondence above referred to, on or about the 5th of November I saw you personally and advised you that the matter of renting the building had been taken up by the full board of trustees, that they had an offer from Mr. I. S. Leevy, of Columbia, S. C., at $180.00 per month for the first and second floors of the building, with the exception of a portion of the first floor now occupied by a barber shop, and also the small brick building in the rear, and that the trustees had decided to give you the refusal of the building at the rental of $180.00 per month for a term of one, two or three years. This proposition you declined.

"On November 7th I notified you in writing that the trustees had leased the store occupied by you to Mr. I. S. Leevy, and they desired you to give him possession by January 1, 1920, and that this was in addition to previous notice.

"As you declined to vacate the building we have given the matter further consideration and as your tenancy may have ripened into one from year to year, we prefer for the present to make no issue, but to allow you to retain the store during the present calendar year at what you claim to be the agreed rental of $75.00 per month.

"I will thank you to let me have a reply at once, together with check to cover the balance due.

"Yours very truly, E. J. Sawyer, G. Sec."

"March 19, 1920.

"[Omitting address.]

"Yours of the 17th inst. to hand. Replying would say that I find that the time of the beginning of my lease is as you say, the first day of January, 1920. I am, therefore, in accordance with your request inclosing my check for the difference due you—$50.00.

"Now, as to the length of my lease, you are in error in saying that it is only for one year. In your offer of date August 28, 1919, you distinctly stated that if I accepted your offer 'the trustees (for whom you were acting) will give you a written lease for desired time, as soon as practical.' In the same letter, and as your third condition of the offer, you said, 'They will give you a lease for 1, 2 or 3 years,' giving me by that the option of saying what length of time the lease should be. You will remember in the presence of three persons, in November, I told you that I would take a lease for three years, and was ready to sign. One of the three persons referred to was the Reverend N. F. Haygood. But you have never submitted a lease for me to sign, and I wrote you that I wanted a lease made out for three years. Your offer of the 26th of August never having been withdrawn, I having accepted the said offer, had the right to name the time. I am contending for the three years' lease, as you offered, and hope that you will, without further delay, present the same for my signature, so that I may have same recorded, although your letters and mine show without a doubt that I am entitled to the place for three years, and that was and is my understanding from the offer you made and which I accepted.

"Really, I cannot understand your attitude as gathered from your last letter. I mean to carry out to the letter my promises and cannot understand why you would now try to side-step your definite propositions. Business men can only proceed along definite lines, if they hope to succeed. Hoping that I have made my position clear as to my determination and what I shall expect of you in the carrying out of your contract, I am,

"Yours truly,

J. W. Bailey."

Letter dated March 24th:

"Yours of the 19th inst., inclosing check for $50.00 balance on rent of store for the months of Ja. and Feb., 1920, has been received. Replying to what you said about a three years' lease, I wish simply to say that I made you no offer of a lease for any time, in my letter of

August 26, 1919, nor at any other time. In that letter I made it plain that I had no power to lease the building without the authority of the board of trustees, and then told you what I thought was 'reasonably certain' they would do. Soon after I told you that I had made a mistake about the reliable offer of $75.00, that it was more, and advised you against making any expensive improvements, as I did not know what action the trustees would take. Yes, I remember distinctly that the first conversation I had with you in Nov. was on the occasion when I presented to you in writing the conditions on which the trustees had agreed the night before to give you a three years' lease, which lease you declined, and Mr. I. S. Leevy accepted. Is that not business men proceeding along definite lines? I am sorry that you cannot understand my attitude as secretary of the trustees. I have tried to make it plain, but as I am not in the brain-furnishing business, I shall have to remain,

Your misunderstood friend,

Letter of October 24, 1919:

"Mr. E. J. Sawyer—My Dear Sir: Your very kind letter of the 21st inst. received. I have no proposition to make to them. I have not had any dealings with the trustees; don't know who the trustees are—all my business transactions have been with you and I accepted your proposition for a $75.00 per month rental some time ago. Now, if you think that you can make some reduction on the price agreed upon, and that my presence would help you in this matter, I will be very glad to be on hand. Any consideration you may give me in this matter will be highly appreciated by

"Yours truly, J. W. Bailey."

The exceptions referred to in the opinion are as follows:

The plaintiff now appeals, on the following exceptions:

(1) Because his honor Judge Whaley erred in confirming the finding of the master that the appellant did not accept in its entirety the offer of respondent as made in its letter of August 26, 1919, in that the letter of appellant dated September 2, 1919, shows on its face an unconditional and absolute acceptance.

(2) Because his honor erred in confirming the finding of the master that appellant did not attempt to accept the other condition until March 1, 1920, and that was too late to have effect. When the appellant, by his letter, demanded a three-year lease, the error being:

(a) No such defense was pleaded.

(b) Respondent was not and could not have been injured by such delay, even were it true, the evidence being that the demand was made orally in November, 1919.

(c) That appellant was of the opinion that the contract to pay $75.00 per month for a term of years begun March 1, 1920, in which case he deemed demand for such lease of that date the proper time to make demand.

(3) His honor erred in holding, further, that the letter of E. J. Sawyer of August 26, 1919, did not contain an unqualified offer, but was subject to the ratification of the trustees, the error being:

(a) In that the letter itself shows that it was the act of the trustees, through its secretary, and not one of the trustees has ever repudiated his act.

(b) In that it contained an unqualified offer to rent the building, and that the letter of acceptance made a binding contract.

(c) In that the letter of E. J. Sawyer and the answer thereto of J. W. Bailey made an absolute contract, and his honor erred in not so holding.

(4) Because the letter of E. J. Sawyer was substantially to its acceptance by the appellant, ratified by the trustees, in accepting the $75.00 per month, and said board of trustees are now estopped from claiming that there was no contract.

N. J. Frederick and W. N. Graydon, both of Columbia, for appellant.

Nelson, Gettys & Mullins, of Columbia, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of County Court Judge Whaley on the following statement:

"This action was commenced in the Richland county court on the 4th day of August, 1920, by J. W. Bailey, the appellant herein, against Free and Accepted Masons of South Carolina, for the specific performance of a contract to make a lease, which contract was entered into by the appellant and respondent, by letters set forth herein. Respondent, Free and Accepted Masons of South Carolina, by its answer, denied making the contract.

"The cause was referred to the master of the court, to hear and determine all the issues of law and fact, and report the same to the court. The master found against the appellant. Exceptions were duly taken by the appellant from the findings and rulings of the master, which exceptions are hereinafter set out.

"The exceptions were heard by his honor Judge Whaley, who by his decree, dated November 12, 1920, overruled appellant's exceptions, sustained the master's findings, and went further and found that there was no contract at all between the parties."

The exceptions, four in number, impute error and ask reversal. All of the exceptions are overruled.

[1, 2] The contract relied on and for which specific performance is sought is indefinite as to everything, except as to the amount to be paid per month; indefinite as to when it was to commence. There was not a meeting of minds on this. It is silent as to the length of the lease, and one trustee could not make such a contract unless the other trustees approved or confirmed it. There is no evidence in the case that this was done, and the facts all show that his honor's decree is correct.

Affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. (No. 10644.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Evidence  $\S$  334(4)—Death certificate admissible to establish facts stated therein except where plainly not within knowledge of person making certificate.

A certificate of insured's death consisting of local registrar's certificate of death under the Vital Statistics Act of 1914 and certificate of physician who attended insured in his last illness, or a certified copy of such certificate of death, is admissible in action upon the policy to establish matters therein required to be recorded when within the knowledge of the person making the certificate, but is not admissible to establish matters not within the knowledge of such person and plainly appearing to have been impossible to have been within his knowledge; the evidence in such case being hearsay.

2. Evidence  $\S$  334(4)—Physician's certificate inadmissible to establish duration of disease shown by certificate not to have been within physician's knowledge.

In action on life policy, medical certificate signed by physician who attended insured in his last illness was not admissible to establish duration of the disease where the certificate showed that such fact could not have been within such physician's knowledge.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by T. J. L. Williams, as administrator of the estate of Lizzie Harland, deceased, against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Carson & Tinsley, of Spartanburg, for appellant.

Carlisle & Carlisle, of Spartanburg, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action by plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Lizzie Harland, to recover the amount of a policy of insurance upon the life of her husband, Harvey Harland, she being the beneficiary named in the policy and having died after the death of the insured.

The defense was fraudulent representations by the insured in reference to his health and treatment by a physician. The particular point of attack was that the insured had had for a period of several years a chronic disease of the kidneys, interstitial nephritis, and in his application for insurance had stated to the contrary.

[1, 2] The defendant offered in evidence a certain certificate purporting to be a record of the death of the insured, which was made up of a certificate of death signed by the local registrar under the Vital Statistics Act of 1914 (29 Stat. [Ex. Sess.] p. 29) and a medical certificate of death signed by the physician who attended the insured in his last illness. This certificate, compound of the two certificates as stated, is such as is required by the acts and the regulations of the State Board of Health. It, or a certified copy, is admissible in evidence to establish the matters therein required to be recorded when within the knowledge of the person making the certificate. Matters not within his knowledge and plainly appearing impossible to have been within his knowledge are subject to the objection applicable to all hearsay evidence. In the medical certificate the physician who was called in on November 18th and attended the insured until his death on November 30th certifies to the duration of the alleged disease, a fact which the certificate shows could not have been within his knowledge. This matter being a vital point in the controversy, the circuit judge was in error in allowing the statement of the physician as to the duration of the disease to go to the jury.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

1. Deeds  $\S$  54—Retained by grantor ineffective for want of delivery.

Where father, who had executed deeds conveying land to his children, retained possession of the land and continued to exercise the rights of proprietorship over it, and continued to hold deeds, the deeds were ineffective; there having been no delivery.

2. Deeds  $\S$  59(4)—Held not delivered notwithstanding recordation.

Where father executed deeds conveying land to children, delivered deeds to son-in-law with directions to send them to a clerk for recordation, with instructions that deeds with bill for recording be returned to the father, and where deeds after recordation were in fact returned to the father, who kept deeds and remained in possession of the land, there was no delivery, notwithstanding recordation, it being apparent under the circumstances that the father did not intend the deeds to become effective until after his death.

3. Deeds  $\S$  194(5)—Record of deed presumptive evidence of delivery.

The record of a deed is presumptive evidence of delivery, but such presumption may be rebutted.

4. Deeds $\Leftarrow$ 56(2)—Delivery a matter of intention.

The delivery of a deed is a matter of intention.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by Adam Morgan against W. L. Morgan and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the decree referred to in opinion:

The plaintiff sues to set aside four deeds, one to each of the defendants, his children. His cause of action is that they are clouds on his title to land described therein; that the record interferes with his management of his financial affairs; that they discriminate against other children of his by his present wife, and against her, and he asks the court to clear the record of them. They were made on November 22, 1913, and entered of record October 21, 1914. The plaintiff, who can neither read nor write, says he does not know how they got on the record; that his son, W. L. Morgan, one of the defendants, at that time was his bookkeeper, attended to his correspondence, sent his papers to the clerk for record, issued and signed his bank checks, etc. They are recorded, however, and one of the defenses of the defendants is that plaintiff had them recorded as an evidence of his intention to deliver them. At the time of the commencement of this action, and before the referee, the plaintiff had the deeds; he offered them in evidence, and swore that he found them in his trunk, where he had put them a few days before after their execution.

[1] He said he had never authorized any one to take them from the trunk and record them; that whoever did so acted without authority. There is no attempt to contradict his evidence that he never parted with the possession of any of the land, but always exercised every right of proprietorship over it, always paying the taxes, though in the name of the defendants. It is also uncontradicted that, although three of the defendants, W. L. Morgan, Edna Morgan Mungo, and Bessie Faile, are all married and for periods ranging from three to eight years, have lived away from plaintiff, none of them, even after their anger at their father for his second marriage, ever demanded possession of the land or rents thereon until their answer in this case. Therefore they were not in possession of the land; they were not in possession of the deeds. Did the plaintiff intend to deliver the deeds? Did he intend to part with title to his land, and deprive himself of his sovereignty over it as owner? The witness Gardner swears as to what he said at the time the deeds were made. In substance it was: "I am a sick man; I am accustomed to having these spells; one of them may prove fatal; I want to arrange my affairs so that if such fatality occurs it will not be necessary for surveyors to be running lines over my lands, so I am going to make these deeds to my four children in order that a plan may exist for the division of my land." The deeds were made; nothing was paid him; he took them in his possession; he has them in his possession now. None of the facts are contradicted. What do they prove? What inferences must be drawn from them? I only hold one, and that to be that he was executing the deeds with the common understanding among the laity they might operate as a will at his death, and that he did not deliver them.

[2] Did he subsequently do so? The defendants undertake to prove so by L. M. Mungo, the husband of the defendant, Edna Morgan Mungo. What did he say? That in 1915—clearly an error, because the deeds were recorded in 1914—the plaintiff after some preliminary remarks told him (Mungo) "to take the deeds and send them to Paul Moore, clerk, and tell him to record them and send them, and the bill for recording back to me" that he (Mungo) took the deeds, sent them to Paul Moore, and directed them to send them back to plaintiff, and that he had not seen them since. Bessie Faile, another of the defendants, says she was at her father's house when the deeds came back to him, and he instructed her to tell W. L. Morgan to send Mr. Moore a check for the recording fees. The plaintiff denies so instructing Mungo, as well as the statement of Bessie, but, admitting them to be true, what do they prove? Only that plaintiff made of Mungo his agent for sending the deeds to the clerk to be returned to him after they were recorded. They were returned to him; therefore this testimony negatives any idea of any intention on the part of the plaintiff to deliver the deeds to the defendants.

[3,4] The deeds were recorded, it is true, and the record of a deed is presumptive evidence of delivery, but it is subject to rebuttal, and when the party claiming the delivery of a deed because it is recorded explains the matter in which the deed was entered of record, and his explanation shows that the grantor did not intend to deliver the deed, the presumption ought not to be allowed to avail him because he knew that the grantor did not intend to deliver the deeds by entering them of record. In this instance Mungo knew plaintiff had not relinquished control of the deeds, because he ordered them returned to him and they were returned. Here there was no act of delivery, unless the recording be so held. Did the plaintiff intend to deliver the deeds and part with the title to his lands? Delivery is a matter of intention; it cannot be in the absence of it. The plaintiff testified that he was 50 years old. In 1913, when the deeds were executed, 7 years ago, he was 44. Did he at that age intend to deprive himself of his entire property, worth $50,000 according to him, and leave himself bereft? I cannot think so; therefore I hold that there was no intention to deliver the deeds, and that they were never delivered. Such parts of his pleadings in the case of Carson Company against Adam Morgan et al. as contradict his evidence here as competent is properly before the court. They seem to have been stricken out; the case was never tried; therefore no formal examination of him was had. If they are out of the record, they are not a part of it; if he made a contradictory statement, it could be proven by the person in whose presence he made it. He swore that the alleged pleadings were not read to him. L. M. Mungo, the notary appearing to probate, testified after Morgan, and did not say that he read or explained the paper to him; therefore there is doubt if Morgan knew what was in the paper to which he made his mark. But if he did, it was, at most, a contradictory statement made in legal terms, the significance of which he likely did not know, and in preparing his defense in another case, and cannot overcome the evidence in his favor here. My conclusion is that there was no delivery of the deeds, and that the record should be expunged of them. Shute v. Shute, 82 S. C. 284, 64 S. E. 145; Johnson v. Johnson, 44 S. C. 364, 22 S. E. 419. It is therefore, on motion of Harry Hines, Esq., plaintiff's attorney, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the deeds of Adam Morgan, the plaintiff, to W. L. Morgan, Ora Morgan, Bessie Morgan, now Bessie Morgan Faile, and Edna Morgan, now Edna Morgan Mungo, recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances for Lancaster county on the 21st day of October, 1914, in Deed Book M, pages 386, 385, 386, and 387, respectively, be, and the same are hereby, canceled and set aside and adjudged to be of no legal force and effect, and the clerk of court is directed to mutilate said deeds, and write upon the books where they are recorded the declaration that the said deeds were mutilated, and that their record shall be of no force whatsoever.

R. E. Wylie, of Lancaster, for appellants.
Harry Hines, of Lancaster, for respondent.

WATTS, J. For the reasons assigned by his honor, Judge McIver, it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. CASEY. (No. 10650.)

Criminal law §941(2)—Denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence held error.

In prosecution for murder, denial of new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence that deceased made threats against defendant while on the way to defendant's house and that at such time he had a pistol on his person held error; such testimony not being merely cumulative, and being of a character that might have affected the jury in its consideration of the case.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Thomas S. Sease, Judge.

Dwynell Casey was convicted of murder, and from the judgment and sentence and from order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Order reversed, and new trial granted.

Nicholls & Wyche and Bomar, Osborne & Brown, all of Spartanburg, for appellant.

I. O. Blackwood, of Spartanburg, for the State.

WATTS, J. The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted of murder with recommendation to mercy at the April term of court for Spartanburg county, 1920, before Judge Sease and a jury, and sentenced to life imprisonment. The defendant-appellant thereafter made a motion before Presiding Judge McIver for a new trial on after-discovered testimony, which motion was overruled. From this order and from the judgment and sentence, appellant appeals. The exceptions question the correctness of Judge Sease's charge and the order of Judge McIver.

By the order of Judge McIver he finds:

"That the defendant and his counsel used due diligence, that they did not at the former trial have notice of the testimony now desired to be offered, and that the testimony is material. I am, however, of the opinion that the evidence submitted is largely cumulative, and would not probably have changed the verdict of the former trial, and for this reason it is ordered that the motion for a new trial be, and the same is hereby, overruled."

In view of the facts developed at the trial before Judge Sease and the nature and character of the new testimony, it is more than merely cumulative. It is material to the issue. It shows the mental attitude of the deceased, and substantiates and corroborates the defendant and his witnesses as to whether deceased was armed or not at the time he was on the premises of the defendant when the killing occurred.

It is of vital importance in the case, and might have vitally affected the jury in the consideration of the case, if it had been presented for their consideration at the trial. It might have influenced and probably might have changed their view, taking into consideration other facts and circumstances. As to whether or not deceased made threats while on his way to defendant's home, and whether or not he then had a pistol on his person, is evidence now of newly developed facts, and not merely cumulative, as held by his honor, and, even if merely cumulative, might have changed the result if submitted to the jury.

His honor was in error in not granting a new trial.

The exceptions from the trial before Judge Sease are not considered. The exceptions from the order of Judge McIver refusing a new trial are sustained, and his order reversed, and new trial granted.

New trial.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J., disqualified, having been of counsel in the case.

BOOTH et al. v. FLOYD. (No. 2358.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trial ~~193~~(2), 253(8)—Wills ~~324~~(3)—Issue of undue influence properly withdrawn, in absence of evidence of undue influence; instruction withdrawing issue of undue influence not expression of opinion that will was executed; instruction held not to withdraw evidence of mental incapacity.

The court did not err in withdrawing from the jury the question whether the mind of the testatrix was unduly influenced in making the will, as there was no evidence tending to show that it was.

(a) Nor was the language of the court in withdrawing such issue error, as being "an undue expression of opinion on the execution of the will." There was no evidence to authorize a finding that the will was not executed according to the provisions of Civ. Code 1910, § 3846.

2. Evidence ~~322~~(1) — General reputation that testatrix was addicted to drug habit held hearsay.

Nor was it error to exclude evidence offered as to the general reputation of the testatrix as being addicted to a drug habit.

3. Sufficiency of evidence.

There was ample evidence to authorize the jury to find that the mental capacity of the testatrix at the time the will was executed was such as to enable her to have a decided and rational desire as to the disposition of her property.

4. Refusal of new trial proper.

A new trial was properly refused.

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; Andrew J. Cobb, Judge.

Proceeding by Charles S. Floyd, executor, to probate will of Margie A. Harris to which Mrs. M. L. Booth and another filed a caveat. Judgment for the proponent, and the caveators bring error. Affirmed.

Charles S. Floyd, as the nominated executor in an instrument purporting to be the last will of Mrs. Margie A. Harris, deceased, after having the document probated in common form, was cited at the instance of Mrs. M. L. Booth and Mrs. Emma Bird, heirs at law of Mrs. Harris, to probate the same in solemn form. He duly undertook to do this, and Mrs. Booth and Mrs. Bird filed a caveat on the grounds:

(a) Mrs. Harris, "at the time of making said pretended will, was not of sound and disposing mind and memory."

(b) She "did not execute the said pretended will freely and voluntarily, but was moved thereby by undue influence and persuasion over her by Mrs. Alice Rockmore; and it is therefore not the will of the deceased."

(c) "For that also said pretended will was not executed in the manner required by law."

(d) "Said will is null and void, in that it disposes of land belonging to the estate of James B. Harris, deceased, in which the said Margie Harris had only a life estate."

The purported will was executed in November, 1916, and Mrs. Harris died in April, 1917. In the second item of the instrument she gave one-fourth of her entire estate, after the payment of debts and expenses of administration, to the six named children of her deceased son. The third item was as follows:

"I hereby give and bequeath to my beloved daughter, Alice Rockmore, who has cared for me during the declining years of my life, all the residue of my estate, or three-fourths of the same after payment of the debts and expenses of administration."

The document was probated in solemn form in the court of ordinary at the May term, 1918, and an appeal was entered by Mrs. Booth and Mrs. Bird to the superior court, where, upon the issues submitted to the jury, a verdict was rendered in favor of the propounder, setting up the writing to be the last will of Mrs. Harris. Mrs. Booth and Mrs. Bird moved for a new trial on the following grounds:

(1-3) That the verdict was contrary to evidence, without evidence to support it, etc.

(4) "Because the court erred in withdrawing from the consideration of the jury the question of undue influence, and limiting the jury in their investigations to the objections that the will was not executed in the manner prescribed by law, and that Mrs. Harris at the time she made the will did not have sufficient mind to make the will."

(5) "Because the court charged the jury as follows: 'I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that under the view of the evidence as it appears to me, there is not sufficient evidence for you to sustain the objection of undue influence; and therefore you will limit your investigation to objections that the will was not executed in the manner prescribed by law, and that Mrs. Harris, at the time she made the will, did not have sufficient mind to make the will.'"

(6) "Because the court erred in ruling out of evidence, or not permitting the same to be read to the jury, the depositions of Annie Couch and Dr. F. P. Hudson that said witnesses knew the reputation of Mrs. Margie Harris as a morphine eater, or one addicted to the habit. This evidence, as movants claim, would show the extent of the morphia habit [the reputation of it?] reaching as far as six to eight miles, and the propounder having shown by some of his witnesses that they were right there close in Loganville, and had not even heard that there was such a thing as the testatrix taking morphine; this being contradictory and in rebuttal."

A new trial was refused, and the movants accepted.

J. H. Felker, of Monroe, for plaintiffs in error.

R. L. & H. C. Cox, of Monroe, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Even if the fourth ground of the motion for new trial was good as to form, a careful examination of the evidence in the record clearly shows that the court did not err in excluding from the jury the issue as to undue influence alleged to have been brought to bear upon the testatrix and causing her to execute the will. There was no evidence submitted that would authorize the jury to find in favor of the contention of the objectors that the will was executed by reason of undue influence.

2. In excluding the objection of undue influence for lack of evidence to support it, the court used this language:

"You will limit your investigation to objections that the will was not executed in the manner prescribed by law, and that Mrs. Harris, at the time she made the will, did not have sufficient mind to make the will."

In the fifth ground of the motion it is complained:

"That the use of the words, 'at the time she made the will,' was an undue expression of opinion to the jury on the execution of the will, and had a tendency to cause the jury to believe that the court considered that the will was properly executed."

The point here raised is not meritorious. There is no evidence in the record which would have authorized the jury to find that the paper was not executed according to the formalities prescribed by the statute in this state (Civil Code 1910, § 3846) for the execution of wills. The uncontradicted evidence showed that Mrs. Harris signed the writing as her will, and that it was attested and subscribed in her presence by three competent witnesses. It follows that, even if the language used by the court was inapt, it was not cause for a new trial.

Nor did the instruction here excepted to tend to exclude from the consideration of the jury all evidence of the condition of the mind of Mrs. Harris when the paper was executed.

[2] 3. The court did not err in refusing to permit to be read to the jury the "depositions" of certain witnesses referred to in the sixth ground of the motion, as to the reputation that Mrs. Harris was addicted to a drug habit. Such depositions were inadmissible as being hearsay, if for no other reason.

[3, 4] 4. While there was evidence tending to show that Mrs. Harris "was not of sound and disposing mind and memory" at the time the will was executed, there was abundant evidence to the contrary, and the fact in that respect was for the jury's decision; and the court did not err in refusing to set aside their verdict in favor of the proponent.

Judgment affirmed.

BLACKSTONE v. NELSON, Warden.
(No. 2457.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Habeas corpus ~~§~~4—Cannot be substituted for motion for new trial, writ of error, or other remedial procedure.

"The writ of habeas corpus cannot be substituted for a motion for new trial, writ of error, or other remedial procedure, or be used as a remedy for the review of alleged errors in the trial court." Especially is this true where the issues raised in the habeas corpus case are the same as raised and passed upon at the trial, and no exception is taken thereto.

2. Habeas corpus ~~§~~32—Judgment overruling demurrer in criminal case, when not excepted to, held the law of the case on habeas corpus.

Where one was indicted under a statute which by demurrer was assailed as unconstitutional and void, and the demurrer is overruled, and no exception is filed to such judgment, and where the defendant on conviction and sentence filed a motion for new trial, which he subsequently voluntarily withdrew, and where later he presented a petition for habeas corpus, attacking the statute under which the indictment was found, on the same grounds as set up in the demurrer to the indictment, the court did not err on the hearing, under the pleadings and the evidence, in remanding the defendant to the custody of the officer having him in charge.

Error from Superior Court, Tift County; R. Eve, Judge.

Habeas corpus by Edwin Blackstone against Green Nelson, Warden of the Chain Gang. Judgment remanding petitioner to custody of the Warden, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

John Henry Poole, of Tifton, for plaintiff in error.

R. S. Foy, of Sylvester, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1, 2] Edwin Blackstone was indicted, tried, and convicted of a misdemeanor, under an act approved August 17, 1918 (Acts 1918, p. 275), known as an act relating to venereal diseases. The particular provision of the act alleged to have been violated was as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any one infected with these diseases, or any of them, to expose another to infection."

When the case was called for trial in the lower court, the defendant filed a demurrer to the indictment, attacking the act of 1918 as unconstitutional and void, for a number of reasons set out in the demurrer. The demurrer was overruled, and this judgment was unexcepted to. The case proceeded to trial, and the defendant was convicted and sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the chain gang for a period of six months. The defendant made a motion for new trial, which was dismissed on the movant's own motion.

In the present case Blackstone filed his petition for habeas corpus against Green Nelson, warden of the chain gang of Tift county, alleging that Nelson had the plaintiff confined in the chain gang by virtue of an invalid judgment and sentence. The indictment and the statute upon which it was based were attacked upon substantially the same grounds as set up in the demurrer to the indictment. Nelson answered that Blackstone had demurred to the indictment at the time he was tried, and that the demurrer was overruled and no exception was taken to that ruling. The dismissal of the motion for new trial was prior to the filing of the petition for habeas corpus. The foregoing facts were supported by proof and admitted by Blackstone. After hearing evidence the judge of the trial court remanded Blackstone to the custody of Nelson, the warden of the chain gang. To that judgment the plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff relies upon the case of State Board of Medical Examiners v. Lewis, 149 Ga. 716, 102 S. E. 24, as sustaining his proposition that the judgment overruling his demurrer to the indictment is not binding in this case; but the facts of that case are different from the present one. In the present case there has been a solemn adjudication of the question raised by the demurrer that the act of 1918, supra, was not constitutional for the reasons alleged in the demurrer, which reasons are the same as set up in the present petition for habeas corpus, and that judgment was unexcepted to, and is therefore the law of the case. In such circumstances the defendant is bound by the former judgment, which has never been reversed (compare Griffin v. Eaves, 114 Ga. 65, 66, 39 S. E. 913), and he cannot now substitute the writ of habeas corpus for a motion for new trial, or other similar remedial procedure, to be used as a remedy for the review of errors alleged to have been committed by the trial court. Harrell v. Avera, 139 Ga. 340, 77 S. E. 160. Only in cases where the judgment of conviction is void can it be attacked by habeas corpus. The plaintiff has had his day in court, where it was adjudged that the act which he now attacks for the second time as being unconstitutional was held to be constitutional and valid.

In the cases relied on by him no attack was made on the statute under which the defendants were convicted, as being void, as in the present case, and no judgment was rendered in those cases holding that the statute was valid. The defendant had an available remedy, by motion for new trial (which he voluntarily withdrew), of testing the constitutionality of the act of 1918, and having failed to pursue the remedy which he had for that purpose, and permitted the judgment of the court, holding the act to be valid, to stand unreversed, he will not be permitted now to proceed by habeas corpus to again test the question as to whether the act of 1918 is invalid or not.

Under the pleadings and the evidence in the case, we see no error in the judgment remanding the plaintiff to the custody of the warden of the chain gang of Tift county.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

ATKINSON and GEORGE, JJ., concur in the judgment of affirmance, on the ground that the law is not unconstitutional for any of the reasons assigned.

HOWARD v. STATE. (No. 12542.)

July 26, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  938(1) — New trial not granted for new evidence not likely to change result which could have been procured by due diligence.

The alleged newly discovered evidence is not of such a character as would probably produce a different verdict upon another trial of the case. Furthermore, it appears from all the facts of the case, as disclosed by the record, that this evidence could have been secured before the case was submitted to the jury, by the exercise of due diligence on the part of the accused and her counsel.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  918(10, 11) — Prejudicial remarks of court not ground of new trial when mistrial not moved for.

Conceding, but not deciding, that the remarks of the court, addressed to the defendant while she was making her statement to the jury, tended to prejudice the jury against the accused, such remarks cannot be made a ground of a motion for a new trial. A motion for a mistrial should have been made, and, if the judge had overruled the motion, that ruling would have been subject to review. Grigg v. State, 22 Ga. App. 637 (2), 96 S. E. 1049, and citations.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  1160 — Court of Appeals cannot interfere with verdict authorized by evidence and approved by trial judge.

The issues in the case were clearly and fairly presented to the jury by the charge of the court, and, the verdict being authorized by the evidence and approved by the trial judge, this court is without authority to interfere.

July 26, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §1129(3)—Assignment of error, not settling out charge complained of, fatally defective.

An assignment of error in these words: "Because upon the trial of said case the court erred in his charge to the jury in all its parts by referring to both defendants as though their joint action in the whole matter had been fully established by the evidence. Because his honor's charge throughout led the jury to believe that if either of the defendants took the car, or if either of the defendants had possession of the car and that possession was not explained, that both defendants were guilty of taking the car and having it in their possession"—is fatally defective, in that it fails to set forth the language of the charge to which exception is taken, and it cannot be considered. Beaudrot v. State, 126 Ga. 579, 55 S. E. 592; Sullivan v. State, 14 Ga. App. 762, 82 S. E. 314.

2. Instruction not erroneous.

The excerpt from the charge of the court, complained of in the second ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, when considered in the light of the entire charge and the facts of the case, is not error for any reason assigned.

3. Criminal law §828—Failure to charge on admissions and confessions without written request not cause for new trial.

The ground that the court erred in failing to charge "the law of inculpatory admissions and confessions," is without merit, since it is well settled that, even if the evidence authorized such a charge, the failure to instruct the jury on that subject, in the absence of an appropriate written request, is not cause for a new trial. McArthur v. State, 19 Ga. App. 747 (2), 92 S. E. 234, and cases cited.

4. Criminal law §1160—Verdict, supported by evidence and approved by trial judge, not disturbed.

There was some slight evidence which authorized the defendant's conviction, and, the finding of the jury having been approved by the trial judge, this court is without authority to interfere.

- Vagrancy §3—Evidence insufficient to support conviction.

The evidence in this case does not authorize the verdict. It was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Swainsboro; Geo. Kirkland, Jr., Judge.

Ted Tillman was convicted of vagrancy, and he brings error. Reversed.

The marshal of Summit testified that defendant had been around Summit for three or four weeks; that during that time he had worked about an hour and a half; that he spoke to him about going to work, and defendant said he was sick; that he got defendant a job with one Hicks; that defendant was tried in mayor's court on the same charge and made a confession saying that he had not worked much because he was sick; that defendant worked about an hour and a half, but he did not know that he did not work any more. On cross-examination he testified that he saw defendant every day; that defendant did not work for Hicks two days; that he saw him at Ellen Connor's house in the negro quarter; that he arrested him on Saturday, and saw him on the Monday before, but did not see him on Wednesday, and did not think he saw him on Thursday; that he might have been working or might have been sick; that when he saw defendant, he was not in bed, but in the house; that he might have made enough the time he worked to support himself the rest of the time. On redirect examination he testified that he did not think defendant had any property or other means of support, but was not positive. A physician testified that defendant had syphilis, but that he considered him able to work. On cross-examination he testified that he could not say that defendant was not sick or was able to work at times other than the time of his examination, and that he did not examine him until after he was tried in the mayor's court. Defendant stated he was sick when he came to Summit; that he worked for Hicks two days, and then got sick and had to quit; that he had some money, and made enough to pay his board; and that he would have been working if he had not been sick.—Statement by editor.

1. Criminal law  $\S$  824(3).—Failure to charge on receiving stolen goods without request held reversible error.

Under the facts of the case, it was reversible error for the court to fail to instruct the jury upon the law of receiving stolen goods, even in the absence of a request so to charge.

2. Other grounds of motion.

The other grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial are without substantial merit.

3. Sufficiency of evidence.

The question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is not passed upon.

Error from City Court of Wrightsville; B. H. Moya, Judge.

J. P. Price was convicted of simple larceny, and he brings error. Reversed.

The evidence for the state tended to show that the prosecutor, Fulford, had been losing seed cotton, and that he left two sheets of cotton in the field one night and found them the next day in the house of one Curvin, a negro. That night Fulford, a deputy sheriff, and a number of others watched Curvin's house and saw defendant with another man drive up and ask for water for his car. Defendant and Curvin had a conversation which the witnesses for the state could not hear, and then one or both brought the two sheets of seed cotton from the house and put it in the car, whereupon they were arrested. Fulford testified that he saw the tracks of the parties who carried the cotton away, and was satisfied that Curvin was one and Rufus Belmas the other. Defendant's statement and the testimony of his witness, Frost, who was with him at the time of his arrest, was to the effect that defendant was taking Frost to a certain place and passed Curvin's house on the way and stopped for water. Defendant stated that Curvin asked him (defendant) to make a short trip for him, stating that he had two sheets of seed cotton to carry and would pay defendant for the trip; that Curvin brought the cotton out of the house and defendant helped him to put it in the car. Curvin was not locked up, but later gave bond, which had been forfeited, and he did not testify, though defendant said he had made every effort to locate him. It was evidently defendant's theory that Curvin and some or all of those present at the time of his arrest set a trap for him, and he stated that Curvin had so admitted in the presence of a witness.—Statement by editor.

Aug. 9, 1921.)

For majority opinion, see 107 S. E. 594.

JENKINS, P. J. (dissenting). In my opinion, the evidence in this case demanded a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. In Hull v. Sullivan, 63 Ga. 127, it was held that—

"Where a person having property for sale, such as land and a steam sawmill, agreed upon the price with one wishing to buy, but who could not consummate the purchase on his own account, because some of the security required belonged to his wife, and thereupon the husband induced his wife to become the purchaser through him, and the contract was thus consummated, the conveyance of the property being made directly to the wife, and she giving her notes and mortgage for the purchase money, the mortgage embracing not only the property then conveyed to her, but also other property constituting her separate estate, she is bound as purchaser and mortgagor, if the seller and mortgagee committed no fraud upon her nor knew of any committed by the husband."

This principle of law was restated in McDonald v. Bluthenthal & Bickart, 117 Ga. 120, 45 S. E. 422, as follows:

"The fact that the owner refuses to sell the husband because of his inability to give security does not prevent an immediate sale of the same property to the wife; and if title to the property is, with her knowledge, conveyed to her and she executes a mortgage thereon and on other property belonging to her, to secure the purchase money notes, she does not assume the debt of her husband, nor is she surety for him, but is liable as principal and purchaser."

See also, Simmons v. International Harvester Co., 22 Ga. App. 358 (5), 96 S. E. 9.

All of these cases are based upon the principle laid down in Schofield v. Jones, 85 Ga. 816, 819, 11 S. E. 1032, that, where a creditor at the time the debt is created really and in good faith intends to extend the credit to the wife, and not to the husband, and the consideration for her promise passes legally and morally to her, the transaction will be treated as a valid one, provided the seller committed no fraud on her and knew of none committed by the husband. See, also, Longley v. Bank of Parrott, 19 Ga. App. 701, 92 S. E. 232.

Thus the mere fact that in the instant case there had been previous negotiations between the vendor of the corporate stock and the husband, whereby it had been originally proposed that the husband would become the purchaser thereof, would not prevent a subsequent valid and binding sale between the vendor and the wife, provided her contract of purchase was not induced by fraud or duress perpetrated upon her by the vendor, or by another with his knowledge. There is not the slightest evidence going to show that the vendor made any statement or resorted to any sort of artifice calculated to mislead the wife as to the true nature and character of the papers she was about to sign. It is absolutely clear and undisputed that the vendor and the husband had by mutual consent abandoned the original plan of procedure, whereby the husband was to become the purchaser. If, therefore, there was any fraud practiced upon the wife, the husband must necessarily have been the guilty party. As to this, the husband testified as follows:

"When she got down to the office, no new proposition was made Mrs. Harrell. She saw she was buying the stock, probably so. She signed the paper. I knew she was buying the stock. I did tell her the truth. As to whether I told her she was buying the stock or concealed the fact—I didn't conceal anything from her. I don't think I told her she was buying the stock."

While it is true that the wife in her testimony states that she did not in fact understand the nature of the transaction at the time she signed the note for the purchase of her stock, and that she then and there thought and understood that she was merely becoming surety for her husband, there is, nevertheless, no denial by her of the unqualified statement of Knox, the vendor, that her husband fully explained to her the nature of the transaction. The rule is well settled that—

"One able to read, who executed a written contract without reading it, cannot avoid liability thereon because he signed without knowing the contents of the contract, when his so doing was not induced by any action or representation amounting to fraud on the part of the person with whom he was dealing." Georgia Medicine Co. v. Hyman & Co., 117 Ga. 851, 45 S. E. 238; Tinsley v. Gullett Gin Co., 21 Ga. App. 512 (2), 516, 94 S. E. 892.

In the instant case, not only did the defendant sign a note for the purchase of the stock, but, in order to pledge the stock as collateral, she also had to, and actually did, transfer and assign the stock certificate itself; all this in the absence of any testimony whatever going to show any word or act on the part of either the vendor or the husband that could be calculated to mislead or deceive. As indicating knowledge of the transaction on her part, she afterwards, as a stockholder, attended two separate stockholders' meetings of the corporation; and she held the stock for a period of at least 13 months after she admits she fully understood the nature of the transaction, without any effort on her part to repudiate or rescind. It was during this period of admitted knowledge on her part that she attended one of the stockholders' meetings. It thus appears that during all of this period she was willing to receive the benefit of any enhancement of the value of the stock. In fact, in her testimony in reply to a question on cross-examination, she herself admits, "If I had gotten dividends, I suppose I would have felt differently about the investment."

It therefore appears to the writer that, in the absence of any proved fraud on the part of either the vendor or the husband, her contract of purchase and her act in assigning the certificate of stock constituted a legal and bona fide transaction, especially in view of her subsequent conduct in treating herself as its owner; and that she should not be permitted at this late day to repudiate and rescind her contract of purchase, which not only appears to have been originally bona fide, but which, by her acts and conduct, she has ratified and confirmed. In this connection see: Civil Code 1910, § 4305; Hunt v. Hardwick, 68 Ga. 100 (3a); Smith v. Estey Organ Co., 100 Ga. 628, 630, 631, 28 S. E. 392.

July 28, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Larceny ¶43—Motion to exclude testimony concerning constable's levy, because he was not lawful constable, properly refused.

The accused was convicted of larceny from the house, stealing cotton seed. A witness swore on direct examination: "I am the constable of the justice court of the 601st district G. M., said county. On the — day of September, 1920, I levied a justice court f. fa. issued from the justice court of the 601st district G. M., this county, in favor of Jos. A. Rhodes against John Will Burke. I levied it on 60 bushels of short staple cotton seed. I took the seed into my possession by my levy." On cross-examination this witness swore: "I was made a constable of this district by Uncle Joe Mann. He was justice of the peace. He appointed me constable before he died. He appointed me constable in the spring of 1920. He died in June of 1920. He just appointed me verbally." The defendant moved to rule out the evidence developed on direct examination, because on cross-examination "it appeared from the testimony of the witness himself that he was not a lawful constable, and that there had not been a lawful levy, and that the cotton seed were not lawfully in his possession, custody, or control. The court properly refused to exclude this evidence.

2. Execution ¶123—Sheriffs and constables ¶9—Death of justice of peace appointing constable does not affect appointment; levy by one whose appointment or qualification is irregular is good.

Under certain contingencies a justice of the peace has the right to appoint a constable. Civ. Code 1910, § 4682. Where such an appointment is made by a justice of the peace, his death would in no way affect the appointment. See, in this connection, Gunn v. Tackett, 67 Ga. 725 (1, a). Where a levy is made by one who assumes to act as an officer having authority to make such levy, the levy is good, even though the appointment or qualification of the person purporting to act as such officer be irregular, since his acts would be those of a de facto officer. Southern States Phosphate Co. v. Clark, 19 Ga. App. 380 (1), 91 S. E. 573, and cases cited. See, also, Harrison v. Richardson, 99 Ga. 763 (1), 27 S. E. 173.

3. Criminal law ¶918(1)—Failure to declare mistrial because of solicitor's argument held not cause for new trial.

Under the facts of this case, the failure of the court to declare a mistrial is not cause for a new trial, as the court "instructed the solicitor general to confine himself to the evidence, and instructed the jury to go by the evidence and not by the argument." Had this been error, it would have been harmless, as the evidence of guilt was positive, and defendant's statement was practically an admission of what was proven by the state.

1. Appeal and error ¶667—Supreme Court cannot try traverse to return of service of bill of exceptions, or refer issue to trial court.

"The Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to hear contradictory evidence impeaching the verity of a record from the trial court. In the absence of any statutory provision, this court has no authority to try a traverse to a return of service of a bill of exceptions, or to refer to the trial court the issue of fact as to the truth or falsity of such return. The bill of exceptions and entries thereon showing jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the writ of error will not be dismissed." Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Lassetter, 122 Ga. 679 (1), 51 S. E. 15. Under the above ruling, there is no merit in the motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions in this case.

2. Abatement and revival ¶84—New trial ¶172—Plea to jurisdiction over the person waived by going to trial on the merits without insisting on it; plea to jurisdiction, waived on first trial, cannot be insisted upon on second trial.

Where there was a plea to the jurisdiction of the person and one to the merits, and the case was tried on its merits without reference to the plea to the jurisdiction, the defendants, by going into the trial on the merits without insisting upon the plea to the jurisdiction, waived all the rights it had under the plea to the jurisdiction.

(a) A new trial having been granted, the defendant was estopped upon the second trial from insisting upon the plea to the jurisdiction, by having waived it on the first trial.

3. Pleading ¶110—Error in permitting plea to jurisdiction to be amended, and in refusing to strike it, rendered subsequent proceedings nugatory.

The error of the judge in allowing the plea to the jurisdiction to be amended on the second trial, and in then refusing to strike the plea as amended, rendered all the subsequent proceedings nugatory, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Titus, Dekle & Hopkins, of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1-3] We will discuss only the matter ruled upon in the second headnote. J. W. Barwick had an attachment issued against the American Manufacturing Company, "a foreign corporation and resident out of the state of Georgia." The attachment was levied by serving a summons of garnishment. A declaration in attachment was filed, and at the first term the defendant filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the person and one to the merits. At a subsequent term the case was tried on its merits, no reference whatever being made to the jurisdiction. At that trial a verdict for the plaintiff was rendered. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was granted. When the case was called for the second trial, the defendant offered to amend the plea to the jurisdiction, by adding thereto a verification, and by stating additional reasons why the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The trial judge allowed the amendment, over the objection of the plaintiff, and then refused to strike the amended plea, and the plaintiff excepted.

That the defendant, by not insisting upon his plea to the jurisdiction at the first trial, waived all rights he had at that trial under this plea, is self-evident. Civil Code 1910, § 5664. In Macon & Birmingham Railroad Co. v. Gibson, 85 Ga. p. 2 (8), 11 S. E. 442, 21 Am. St. Rep. 135, it was said:

"Nothing appears to show that the judge erred in entertaining jurisdiction of the cause. Any objection founded on the nonresidence of the principal defendants in the county could be waived, and was waived if these defendants answered without raising and urging that objection." (Italics ours.)

The real question now to be determined is whether or not this waiver extended to the second trial. This seems never to have been passed upon by the appellate courts of this state. In Stevens v. Lee, 70 Tex. 279, 8 S. W. 40, Judge Acker said:

"On a former trial, Mrs. Stevens interposed a plea in abatement to the cross bill of appellee, which plea was also interposed by appellants on the last trial. It appears from the opinions, as well as the record on the former appeal, that the court did not act on the plea in abatement at the first trial. On the last trial the court overruled the plea, and this ruling is complained of as error. * * * The failure of Mrs. Stevens to have the court act upon the plea in abatement on the first trial was an abandonment or waiver of the plea, and appellants could not afterwards renew it."

Accepting the above ruling as a precedent we are constrained to hold that the waiver of the plea to the jurisdiction at the first trial amounted to an abandonment of this plea, and the court erred in allowing it to be amended, and in refusing to strike it after it was amended.

Judgment reversed.

1. Discretion not abused in refusing continuance.

In view of the showing made as to the defendant's diligence to procure the absent witness, this court cannot say that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to continue the case.

2. Criminal law § 828—Failure to charge on confessions without request not error.

The ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, that the trial judge "nowhere in his charge instructed the jury as to the law of confessions," is without merit; "since it is well settled that, even if the evidence authorized a charge on the law of confessions, the failure to instruct the jury on that subject, in the absence of an appropriate written request so to do, is not cause for a new trial." *McArthur v. In an action on notes, a plea alleging that the notes were signed on the payee's agreement that, if it subsequently developed that they were given for too much, they would be open to adjustment accordingly, should have been stricken on plaintiff's motion, as parol evidence of such an oral agreement would be inadmissible, as contradicting the writing.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Duke Davis, Judge.

Action by the Atlanta Journal against J. G. Power. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The action was on two notes. Defendant's answer alleged that, when the notes were executed, there was a dispute between him and plaintiff as to the amount due, and that plaintiff stated to him in substance that, if he would sign the notes and it afterwards developed that they were taken for too much, they would be open to adjustment accordingly, and that he executed the notes as accord only, and not as accord and satisfaction; that he had since found that the notes were taken for $58.25 more than was due, this sum having been paid on a date specified on the account for which the notes were given, and not credited thereon. Plaintiff moved to strike this plea on the grounds that it did not set up anything that was a legal defense, and that it sought to add to, change, or vary the terms of the written contract.—Statement by editor.

BROYLES, C. J. "Parol evidence (especially of the debtor himself) that a settlement closed up by absolute notes and mortgages was, by oral agreement of the parties, to be revised by the debtor, and the notes and mortgages reduced by crediting down all errors, contradicts the writings, and is inadmissible." Dyar v. Walton, 79 Ga. 466 (1), 7 S. E. 220. Under this ruling and the facts in the instant case, the court erred in refusing to strike, on motion of the plaintiff, the defendant's plea. This ruling is not in conflict with the decision in McLendon v. Wilson, 52 Ga. 41, relied on by the defendant in error, for in that case there was no motion to strike the defendant's plea, and evidence in support of the plea was admitted without objection, and the Supreme Court said:

"All that we do decide is that the court erred in its charge, in saying to the jury that: 'If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, with such knowledge as I have charged you, signed and delivered the notes, then he waived any defense he might have had, if any, to the accounts exhibited by the plaintiffs to defendant.' This charge of the court excluded from the consideration of the jury the defendant's evidence as to what he says was the intention and understanding of the parties at the time the drafts were executed. This evidence being before the jury, the defendant had the right to have had it considered by them for what it was worth in contradiction of the plaintiff's evidence as to that question in the case."

If in the instant case there had been no motion to strike the defendant's plea, and if evidence sustaining the plea had been introduced without objection, and if the court in its charge had excluded that evidence from the consideration of the jury, the two cases would have been on all fours, and the decision in the McLendon Case would be controlling in this case. The facts of the two cases clearly distinguish the one from the other.

The error in the ruling on the defendant's plea rendered the further proceeding in the case nugatory.

July 12, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Criminal law  $\Rightarrow$  274—Refusal to allow withdrawal of plea of guilty after sentence held not error.

The matter of allowing a plea of guilty to be withdrawn after sentence is imposed being discretionary with the trial court, the judge properly refused, under the particular facts of the instant case, to allow the plea withdrawn, since the defendant did not prove, as it was incumbent upon him to do, that the judge, or solicitor, or some other court official misled him or induced him to plead guilty (Foster v. State, 22 Ga. App. 110, 95 S. E. 529), but merely proved that his plea of guilty was entered because of the statement of two policemen that he would get off with a light fine.

Moreover, the policemen testified that they did not induce or mislead the defendant into pleading guilty, but that the plea was freely and voluntarily made, and, this evidence being before the judge, this court cannot say, as a matter of law, that he abused his discretion in refusing to allow a withdrawal of the plea. Jackson v. State, 99 Ga. 209, 25 S. E. 177.

1. Criminal law §958(2)—Motion for new trial not considered, when no affidavit of counsel's ignorance of the newly discovered evidence before trial.

The ground of the motion for a new trial based upon alleged newly discovered evidence cannot be considered, since there is no affidavit by the movant's counsel that they did not, before the trial, know of the existence of such evidence, and that it could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence.

2. Rape §59(23)—Assault and battery properly submitted, when evidence does not demand finding of intent to rape.

The charge of the court was full and fair, and was not subject to the exception taken.

3. Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly denied when evidence sufficient.

The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and the refusal to grant a new trial was not error.

Joe M. Lang, Sol. Gen., of Calhoun, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. [1-3] The indictment in this case charged an assault and battery with intent to commit rape, and this case is therefore distinguished from Owens v. State, 9 Ga. App. 441, 71 S. E. 680, cited and relied on by counsel for the plaintiff in error, for in that case no battery was charged, and this court held that, as no battery was charged in the indictment, the accused could not be convicted of an assault and battery.

Upon the trial the evidence adduced amply authorized a finding that an assault and battery had been committed by the accused, and did not demand a finding that it had been committed with intent to rape. The court, therefore, did not err in submitting to the jury the question whether the accused was guilty of an assault with intent to rape, or merely of an assault and battery. While it is true, as was stated by Judge Russell in Gibson v. State, 10 Ga. App. 117, 72 S. E. 944, that "an assault with intent to induce consent to sexual intercourse on the part of a female child under the age of consent is not assault and battery but assault with intent to rape," it is also obviously true that, if the assault and battery was made by the accused on the female child without the intent to induce her consent to sexual intercourse, but merely with intent to gratify his passions by rubbing his private parts upon some portion of her person, he would be guilty of an assault and battery, and not of an assault with intent to rape. These questions were properly submitted to the jury in the charge of the court, and the verdict of assault and battery was amply authorized by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

LUKE, J., concurs.

BLOODWORTH, J., dissents.

BLOODWORTH, J. I cannot agree with the majority of the court in their opinion in this case, except as to the ruling stated in the first headnote. The evidence for the state was uncontradicted and unimpeached, and, if believed, demanded a verdict of guilty as charged. If the statement of the defendant was true, he should have been acquitted. There is no middle ground, and, in my opinion, it was error requiring the grant of a new trial for the judge to charge the jury on assault and battery. Gibson v. State, 10 Ga. App. 117, 72 S. E. 944.

July 12, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judgment  $\S$  572(2)—Unreversed judgment sustaining general demurrer bars subsequent suit; demurrer held special, and judgment not res judicata.

Where a petition is met with a general demurrer, which sets out that no cause of action is shown by the petition, the judgment sustaining the demurrer, if not reversed, is a bar to any subsequent suit by the plaintiff against the defendant on the claim or demand set forth in the petition, either upon the ground set forth therein, or upon any other grounds which could have been added thereto by amendment. Satterfield v. Spier, 114 Ga. 127, 132, 39 S. E. 930; McElmurray v. Blodgett, 120 Ga. 9, 15, 47 S. E. 531. However, a demurrer, which states that "defendant demurs to the petition because the same does not clearly, fully, and distinctly set forth any cause of action against defendant," is really a special demurrer, since it points out a defect in form rather than a defect in substance. Kemp v. Central Ry. Co., 122 Ga. 559, 561, 50 S. E. 465. It is a general demurrer only in the sense that it goes to the whole case, and results in the dismissal of the entire action, and such a demurrer may be sustained without creating a res adjudicata. Wolfe v. Georgia Ry. & Electric Co., 6 Ga. App. 410, 413, 65 S. E. 62.

2. Plea in bar erroneously sustained.

Under the above ruling, the dismissal of the plaintiff's former action against the defendant on demurrer was not a bar to the present suit, and the court erred in sustaining the defendant's special plea in bar and in dismissing the case.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I cannot agree that the demurrer, which was sustained by the trial court and referred to in the majority opinion, was nothing more than a special demurrer. The judgment of the court generally sustained the demurrer, and the demurrer interposed was as follows:

"Defendant demurs to the petition because the same does not clearly, fully, and distinctly set forth any cause of action against defendant."

It is clear to me that all parties understood the demurrer to be both general and special. The demurrer, having been generally sustained, had the effect of dismissing the plaintiff's case, for the reason that the petition set forth no cause of action. Upon the facts of the case as disclosed by the record, I cannot see that the court erred in sustaining the defendant's special plea in bar and in dismissing the case.

Criminal law  $\S$  134(1)—Change of venue properly denied, when evidence authorizes finding that impartial jury can be obtained and that there is no danger of lynching.

The evidence before the judge on the motion to change the venue authorized a finding that a fair and impartial jury could be obtained in the county where the crime was alleged to have been committed, and that there was no probability or danger of lynching or other violence to the accused. Accordingly it was not erroneous to refuse the motion for a change of venue. Shepherd v. State, 141 Ga. 527, 81 S. E. 441; Crawley v. State, 24 Ga. App. 33 (2), 99 S. E. 705; *Davis v. 2. Intoxicating liquors § 137—State need not prove that complete apparatus for manufacturing was found on premises.

(a) While the court elsewhere in the charge correctly instructed the jury upon this subject, "the harmful effect of such an erroneous instruction cannot be obviated merely by a correct instruction upon the same subject; the attention of the jury must be specifically called to the previous error, and it must be expressly and explicitly withdrawn." *Western & Atlantic R. Landlord and tenant  $\S$  328(2)—No lien for money loaned with which to pay for fertilizers purchased on tenant's credit.

The evidence in this case demanded a finding that the landlord had no lien for supplies, since the supplies were furnished to his tenant by a third person on the tenant's credit, and the mere furnishing of the money, three or four weeks thereafter, by the landlord to enable the tenant to pay promptly for the fertilizer already purchased and partly used, was not necessary to make the crop; and, the judgment of the trial judge, who tried the case without a jury, in favor of the landlord, is contrary to law and the evidence.

for supplies furnished his tenant, H. B. Landers, which was levied upon crops grown upon the rented lands. Landers in due time filed his counter affidavit, setting forth that no such lien as that alleged in favor of the plaintiff existed, and that the obligation proceeded upon was a common-law debt for borrowed money, evidenced by a promissory note. Subsequently, and before the trial was entered upon, Landers, by way of further defense, filed an additional affidavit, setting up that he had been adjudicated a bankrupt and had received his final discharge in bankruptcy from Hon. S. H. Sibley, Judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, and that the debt proceeded upon was one dischargeable in bankruptcy, and that the indebtedness had been fully satisfied canceled by operation of law. It was agreed by both parties that the judge should pass upon these questions without the aid of a jury, and, after hearing evidence, he rendered judgment setting up the lien and giving judgment against the property levied upon. The case comes to this court upon exceptions to this judgment.

As we view the case, it is unnecessary to decide the question as to whether the debt was one dischargeable in bankruptcy, etc., since a review of the evidence shows conclusively that the landlord did not have a special lien upon the crops raised upon the rented lands, by virtue of Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  8348, which gives a special lien to a landlord for supplies, money, etc., furnished by the landlord to make the crop. The evidence adduced upon the trial shows that in March, 1920, the tenant purchased, on his own credit, from the Farmers' Union, \$250 worth of guano, to be used in making the crops on the rented land. Subsequently, on May 8, after a portion of the fertilizer had been used, the tenant obtained or borrowed from his landlord \$250 to pay for the guano, giving to the landlord his plain unconditional promissory note for this sum. The tenant was a member of the Farmers' Union, the landlord was not. These facts were not contradicted. The undisputed evidence of the tenant, as well as that of another witness, was that only members of the Union could buy fertilizer therefrom. The tenant, testified also without contradiction, that he purchased the fertilizer upon his own credit. The landlord testified:

"Landers [the tenant] did not buy the guano from me, nor did I buy it for him, but I furnished the money to pay for it with. He bought the guano from or through the Farmers' Union. I was not a member of the Farmers' Union. I let Landers have the money to pay for the guano on the 8th day of May, 1920. The guano was bought three or four weeks before that, I think, but am not sure just when it was bought."

The facts narrated above were, in substance, the evidence upon which the court, sitting without the intervention of a jury, found that the landlord had a special lien on the crops. We think the evidence was legally insufficient to support such a finding.

"Liens in favor of landlords furnishing supplies arise by operation of law from the relation of landlord and tenant, as well as by special contract in writing, whenever the landlord furnishes the articles enumerated in section 3348, or any one of them, 'to the tenant for the purpose therein named.' Civil Code, § 3348, par. 1. The use of supplies furnished for the purpose of making the crop need not be proved, as it is sufficient to show that the landlord actually furnished the supplies and intended them to be so used. (Italics ours.) Nash v. Orr, 9 Ga. App. 33 (70 S. E. 194)." Buxton v. Hickman, 18 Ga. App. 260(1), 89 S. E. 380.

In the instant case the landlord merely furnished the money to pay for the guano after the tenant had purchased the same from the Farmers' Union on his own credit, and after a portion of the fertilizer had been used. It cannot therefore be said that the landlord actually furnished the money for the purpose of making the crop, or that the furnishing of the money was necessary to make the crop. In the case of Leonard v. Fields, 143 Ga. 480, 85 S. E. 315, it is said:

"It appears from the evidence that the landlord sold the tenants a mule, in October, 1910, reserving title to himself, and about two months thereafter the tenants disposed of the mule. The evidence does not show that the landlord sold the tenants the mule for the purpose of making the crop of the ensuing year, or that the furnishing of a mule was necessary to make the crop. In other words, the evidence is insufficient to show that the landlord had a special lien upon the crop raised upon the rented premises, by virtue of Civil Code, § 3348, which gives a special lien to a landlord for supplies, mules, etc., furnished to make the crop; and this indebtedness must be treated as unsecured by lien on the crop." (Italics ours.)

Also, the uncontradicted evidence shows conclusively that the tenant purchased the guano from or through the Farmers' Union on his own credit. This being true, the landlord had no special lien, for, as was held in Elliott v. Parker, 94 Ga. 620, 20 S. E. 106:

"A landlord cannot take a lien for supplies already furnished to his tenant by a third person on the tenant's credit."

See, also, the case of Brimberry v. Mansfield, 86 Ga. 792, 13 S. E. 132, in which it was held:

"A landlord has no lien for supplies which his tenant purchased from a merchant and for which he stood the tenant's security; nor will the fact that he paid the note given for the supplies, after it became due, entitle him to such lien. If he ordered the supplies upon his own credit, and in that manner furnished them to his tenant, he would be entitled to a lien therefor."

Likewise, see Scott v. Pound, 61 Ga. 579, where it was said:

"If the tenant is the real purchaser [of the supplies] in the first instance, not deriving title through the landlord, there is no lien."

The case of Rodgers v. Black, 99 Ga. 139, 25 S. E. 23, is also authority for the proposition that the landlord has a lien if he was the real purchaser, but otherwise if the tenant is the real purchaser.

While it is true that such a question is generally one for determination by a jury, the uncontradicted facts in the case under review demanded a finding that the tenant was the real purchaser of the fertilizer in question, since he bought it from the Farmers' Union on his own credit; and the furnishing of the money, three or four weeks thereafter, by the landlord, to enable the tenant to pay promptly for the guano, was not necessary to make the crop; and therefore the finding in favor of the landlord was contrary to law and the evidence.

Action by Bertha Fried against W. R. Sullivan and others, receivers. Judgment for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jones, Park & Johnston, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Barrett & Hull, of Augusta, for defendants in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Suit was brought by Mrs. Bertha Fried against the receivers of the Georgia & Florida Railway for personal injuries received by her, caused by the operation of the railway. The defendants demurred upon the ground that the petition did not show that permission to bring the suit had been obtained from the superior court of Richmond county, the receivers having been appointed by that court. The demurrer was sustained, and the petition dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted.

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that the record in this case presents but one question for determination, and that is, without first obtaining leave from the court which appointed them, can suit be brought against the receivers to recover damages arising from personal injuries to one not an employee of the receivers, which injuries were caused by the operation of the railroad by the receivers? To this question we answer, No. While the courts are not all agreed in holding that leave to sue a receiver is jurisdictional, and, where not obtained, fatal to maintaining an action, this is not an open question in Georgia. This court and the Supreme Court of this state adhere to the general rule as laid down in High on Receivers (4th Ed.) 293, 294, as follows:

"A receiver being an officer of the court, acting under its direction, and in all things subject to its authority, it is contrary to the established doctrine of courts of equity to permit him to be made a party defendant to litigation, unless by consent of the court appointing him. And it is in all cases necessary that a person desiring to bring suit against a receiver in his official capacity should first obtain leave of the court by which he was appointed, since the courts will not permit the possession of their receivers to be disturbed by suit or otherwise, without their consent and permission."

See Harrell v. Atkinson, 9 Ga. App. 152, 70 S. E. 954; Stephens v. Augusta Tel. & Elec. Co., 120 Ga. 1082, 1083, 48 S. E. 433; Vestel v. Tasker, 123 Ga. 213 (1), 51 S. E. 300; Jones v. Cosby, 70 Ga. 726.

It is also said in High on Receivers (4th Ed.) 296:

"And it is necessary to aver in the complaint or declaration against the receiver that leave of court has been granted to bring the action, and the absence of such an averment is fatal upon demurrer."

An exception to this general rule is found in sections 2788, 2789, of the Civil Code of 1910. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that this exception is applicable to the case sub judice. In this contention we cannot agree with the learned counsel. Section 2788 is in part as follows:

"The liability of receivers, trustees, assignees, and other like officers operating railroads in this state, * * * for injuries and damages to persons in their employ, caused by the negligence of coemployees, or for injuries or damages to personal property, shall be the same as the liability now fixed by the law governing the operation of railroad corporations in this state for like injuries and damages."

It will be noted that this section applies only to injuries and damages to persons in the employ of certain officers, "caused by the negligence of coemployees, or for injuries or damages to personal property." Section 2789 is as follows:

"Suits may be brought against either of such officers in the same county, and service may be perfected by serving them or their agents in the same manner, as if the suit had been brought against the corporation whose property or franchise is being operated by them, and all such suits may be brought without first having obtained leave to sue from any court."

The two sections above referred to, so far as applicable to this case, were codified from the act approved December 16, 1895 (Ga. L. 1895, p. 103), and the words "either of such officers," in section 2789, evidently refer to the officers named in section 2788, to wit, "receivers, trustees, assignees and other like officers." It is equally clear that "suits," "the suit," and "such suits," as used in section 2789, apply only to suits brought under section 2788 against the "officers operating railroads in this state, or partially in this state, for injuries and damages to persons in their employ, caused by the negligence of coemployees, or for injuries or damages to personal property." Under this ruling the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition and dismissing it.

June 30, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  823—Failure to charge on circumstantial evidence, without written request, not error, when evidence not wholly circumstantial.

The defendant's conviction not depending wholly upon circumstantial evidence, the court did not err, in the absence of an appropriate written request, in failing to instruct the jury upon the law of circumstantial evidence.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  918(5)—Judges  $\S$  49(2)—Judge's statement that verdict was correct not ground for new trial, and did not disqualify judge to pass on motion.

There is no merit in those special grounds of the motion for a new trial that assigned error because the judge, after the verdict had been returned and before passing sentence on the defendant, stated from the bench that he thought the verdict was "eminently correct." Nor did such expression disqualify the judge from passing upon the defendant's motion for a new trial.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  781(6), 922(5) — Charge that uncorroborated confession was insufficient should be given, but failure to give not ground for new trial.

The remaining special grounds of the motion for a new trial are without substantial merit.

4. Adultery  $\S$  14—Fornication  $\S$  9—Modes of proving marriage specified.

The defendant was convicted of the offense of adultery and fornication. While the evidence did not demand a finding that she was a married woman at the time of the commission of the offense charged, it was ample to authorize that finding. Such a fact may be shown, either directly or circumstantially. "The fact of the marriage may be at least prima facie shown by any of the following methods: By proof of general repute in family (Civil Code 1910,  $\S$  5764); by proof of general reputation in the community (Drawdy v. Hesters, 130 Ga. 161[1], 60 S. E. 451, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 190; Clark v. Cassidy, 62 Ga. 407; Wood v. State, 62 Ga. 406); by proof of the fact that the man or the woman, as the case may be, lives together with a person of the opposite sex, as his or her spouse, with general recognition in the community of their being married to each other (Clark v. Cassidy, supra)." Miller v. State, 9 Ga. App. 827, 72 S. E. 279.

On Motion for Rehearing.

BROYLES, C. J. The plaintiff in error makes a motion for a rehearing of this case upon the ground that this court inadvertently overlooked the twelfth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, and the decision in Lucas v. State, 110 Ga. 756, 36 S. E. 87. That ground of the motion was included in the third division of the decision of this court, which was as follows:

"3. The remaining special grounds of the motion for a new trial are without substantial merit."

The twelfth ground of the motion complained that the court charged that "all confessions should be scanned with care and should be received with great caution." There were several exceptions to this charge, but the only one argued by counsel for the plaintiff in error, in his motion for a rehearing, is that the court erred in not charging that an uncorroborated confession was not of itself sufficient in law to warrant a conviction. We agree with counsel that the court should have so charged; but, under all the particular facts of the case, we do not think this error requires a new trial. While in Lucas v. State, supra, the broad and sweeping statement is made, that such a charge "is an essential and vital part of the law as to confessions, and without it no charge on this subject can be fair and complete," the court further on in its opinion says that—

"The evidence relied on by the state as corroborative of this alleged confession was by no means strong, and it is impossible for us to know that the jury did not disregard this evidence altogether, and base their verdict exclusively upon the testimony relating to the confession. The case, at best, is close and doubtful, and it is by no means clear that the evidence warranted a conviction. It was therefore essential to the fairness of the trial that the jury should have distinctly understood that they could not lawfully convict upon the confession alone, and that it was incumbent upon them to pass on and determine the all-important question whether or not the confession, if proved to their satisfaction, was corroborated by other evidence which, in connection with the confession itself, was sufficiently strong and convincing to satisfy their minds beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused." (Italics ours.)

It is well settled that a decision of the Supreme Court should be construed in its entirety and in the light of the particular facts of the case then under review, and that a broad and sweeping ruling, applicable to all cases, is obiter, and not binding on this court, if such ruling was not necessary for the determination of the case. When the decision in the Lucas Case is so construed, it merely appears that, under the specific facts of that case, the failure of the judge to charge the principle of law referred to was reversible error, and that the broad general ruling, to the effect that it would be such an error in any case, was obiter, and not binding on this court. See, also, Rucker v. State, 2 Ga. App. 140, 58 S. E. 295, where it was held that, where the state depended entirely upon a confession to authorize a conviction, it was reversible error for the court to fail to instruct the jury that a conviction was not authorized unless the confession was corroborated. The instant case was not "close and doubtful," as was the Lucas Case, and the state did not "depend entirely upon a confession to authorize a conviction," as in the Rucker Case. On the contrary, the evidence in the present case, with the defendant's confession excluded, amply authorized, if it did not demand, beyond a reasonable doubt the verdict of guilty. It is therefore our opinion that the failure of the judge to charge as complained of does not require another trial of the case. Rehearing denied.

EVANS v. STATE. (No. 12565.)

July 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law  $\S$  511(2), 741(5), 789(2)—Instructions on "reasonable doubt" and corroboration of accomplice not erroneous.

There is no error in the instructions defining a "reasonable doubt," or in those relating to corroboration of an accomplice, of which complaint is made in the motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reasonable Doubt.]

2. Criminal law  $\S$  1159(5) — Appellate court cannot hold verdict contrary to evidence when there is slight evidence to corroborate testimony of accomplice.

"The sufficiency of the corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice to produce conviction of the defendant's guilt is peculiarly a matter for the jury to determine. If the verdict is founded on slight evidence of corroboration connecting the defendant with the crime, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence."

Error from Superior Court, Tallahassee County; E. T. Shurley, Judge.

Robert Evans was convicted of an offense, and he brings error. Affirmed.

J. A. Mitchell, of Crawfordville, for plaintiff in error.

M. L. Felts, Sol. Gen., of Warrenton, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] 1. The court did not err in charging the jury:

(a) "A reasonable doubt is such a doubt as would arise in the mind of an honest juror seeking to do his duty, seeking the truth of the transaction, seeking to do justice between the state and the accused, and would not be such a doubt as would arise in the mind of a dishonest juror or who would go into the jury box for the purpose of discharging the defendant."

(b) "I charge you that it is not essential that the testimony shall of itself be sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty—that is corroborating evidence, or that the corroborating testimony of the accomplice shall be corroborated in every particular—but is necessary, in addition to the corroboration of an accomplice, that the testimony shall be of itself sufficient to raise the inference of the defendant's guilt, and sufficient to connect the defendant with the perpetration of the crime, and tend to show his guilt, and the sufficiency of the corroboration is a question for you to determine."

[2] 2. The chief witness against plaintiff in error was his coindictor, who, in the briefs of counsel for both the state and the defendant, is admitted to be an accomplice. In Hargrove v. State, 125 Ga. 274, 54 S. E. 166, Justice Evans said:

"It is necessary that the testimony of an accomplice be corroborated by evidence connecting the defendant with the perpetration of the offense, in order to authorize a conviction. It is not required that this corroboration shall of itself be sufficient to warrant a verdict, or that the testimony of the accomplice be corroborated in every material particular. Taylor v. State, 110 Ga. 151; Dixon v. State, 116 Ga. 186. Slight evidence from an extraneous source identifying the accused as a participator in the criminal act will be sufficient corroboration of the accomplice to support a verdict. Evans v. State, 78 Ga. 351; Roberts v. State, 55 Ga. 220. The sufficiency of the corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice to produce conviction of the defendant's guilt is peculiarly a matter for the jury to determine. If the verdict is founded on slight evidence of corroboration connecting the defendant with the crime, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. Chapman v. State, 109 Ga. 165."

The conviction in the case under consideration "is founded on slight evidence of corroboration connecting the defendant with the crime," and the jury by their verdict having said that this corroboration was sufficient to authorize a conviction, and their finding having been approved by the trial judge, this court cannot, as a matter of law, say that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. See, also, Anglin v. State, 14 Ga. App. 566, 81 S. E. 804.

2. Criminal law §594(4)—Denial of continuance for sickness of witness held not abuse of discretion.

Under the foregoing ruling, and the facts of the instant case, including the note of the trial judge that "she [the witness on account of whose alleged illness the continuance was asked] was placed upon the stand and subjected to a lengthy examination, and, after seeing her upon the stand and hearing her testify, the court reached the conclusion that she was not too ill for the case to proceed," this court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the judge abused his discretion in denying the continuance.

3. Criminal law §753(1)—Refusal to direct verdict not error.

Under repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, it is never error for the court to refuse to direct a verdict.

Harris & Harris, of Rome, for plaintiffs in error.

Max Meyerhardt, of Rome, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. [1-4] The third headnote above needs elaboration. The plaintiff landlord swore out a dispossessory warrant against the defendants on November 17, 1919, in which she alleged that they had failed to pay the rent for the year 1919, which was due on November 15, 1919, and that she desired possession of the land, and that the defendants had refused to give her such possession. The defendants filed a counter affidavit and gave the required bond. Upon the trial the plaintiff asked for double rent, and the judge charged the jury that, if they found any amount for her, they should double that amount. A verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $372.34 and the possession of the premises was returned, and the defendants' motion for a new trial was overruled, and they excepted.

Counsel for the plaintiffs in error contend that, as no demand for the possession of the premises was shown on the trial, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover double rent. Such is the general rule. However, where, as in this case, the question as to demand is not raised in the counter affidavit, "it will be presumed to have been made as a prerequisite to the issuance of the warrant," and "the plaintiff would be entitled to recover from the tenant double rent from the date of the issuance of the dispossessory warrant." Hindman v. Raper, 143 Ga. 643 (2), 85 S. E. 843; Bowling v. Hathcock, 26 Ga. App. —, 107 S. E. 384.

The words "place of business," as used in the statute defining burglary, mean any house occupied as a place of business by another, in which valuable goods are contained, and this is so regardless of whether such place of business be located in a private or public building.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Place of Business.]

2. Motion for new trial properly denied.

Charlie Davenport was convicted of burglary, and he brings error. Affirmed.

R. W. Durden and Henry O. Farr, both of Brunswick, for plaintiff in error.

A. V. Sellers, Sol. Gen., of Baxley, for the State.

LUKE, J. [1] The defendant was indicted for and convicted of burglary. The indictment charged him with breaking and entering, with intent to commit a larceny, the office of R. S. Pyles, sheriff of Glynn county, the same being the latter's place of business, where valuable goods, wares, and articles were contained. Upon the trial the evidence adduced showed that the sheriff's office was located in the courthouse, and was his place of business, and that valuable articles were stored therein. There was also evidence of both a breaking and an entering. The other necessary elements of burglary were proved.

The only contention of the defendant that warrants any discussion is that the verdict finding him guilty is contrary to law, since he could not be legally convicted of burglarizing a public building. Section 146 of the Penal Code of 1910 defines burglary to be:

"The breaking and entering into the dwelling, mansion, or storehouse, or other place of business of another, where valuable goods, wares, produce, or any other article of value are contained or stored, with intent to commit a felony or larceny." (Italics ours.)

The italicized clause, "other place of business of another," was the provision of the above Code section under which the defendant was indicted and convicted. Had he been indicted for and convicted of burglary of the courthouse, the defendant's contention might be meritorious. However, the mere fact that the place of business burglarized was situated in the courthouse, a public building, would make the offense none the less burglary. Nor would the mere fact that under section 180 of the Penal Code the accused may also have been guilty of larceny from the house prevent him from being legally tried and convicted of burglary, where, as in the instant case, all the necessary elements of burglary were proved. In Keenan v. State, 10 Ga. App. 792, 793, 74 S. E. 297, it was held:

"This statute [Penal Code, § 146] enlarges the common-law definition of burglary; for burglary at common law was the breaking and entering a mansion or dwelling house with intent to commit a felony or larceny therein. This section of the Code includes, not only a dwelling house or mansion, but any storehouse or other place of business where valuable goods of any character are contained or stored. The words 'other place of business,' considered with the context, clearly mean a house used as a place of business, but are not intended to be restricted to a house used as a storehouse or of the nature of a storehouse. They include any house used as a place of business by another, where valuable goods are contained, whether it be a storehouse or not." (Italics ours.)

This decision is clearly authority for the proposition that one may be convicted of burglarizing the place of business of another, regardless of the nature of the house in which the place of business is located.

1. Criminal law § 828—Fuller or more specific instructions should be requested in writing.

None of the grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial contains reversible error; they all relate to the charge of the court, and the portions thereof excepted to are correct statements of the law applicable to the facts of the case; and, if the defendant desired any fuller or more specific instructions, he should have presented to the court a written request therefor.

WILKINSON v. BRAY. (No. 11886.)

July 12, 1921.)

1. Negligence  $\S$ 93(1)—Automobile driver's negligence not imputed to guest.

On the trial of a suit for damages on account of personal injuries resulting from a collision of two automobiles, when the plaintiff was riding in one of them as an invited guest of its driver, the court erred in rejecting evidence that the driver was not in the plaintiff's employ, and not her agent, and that she had no control over the car. This is true because the negligence of the driver of a private vehicle is not imputable to a person riding in it as an invited guest, where that person had no right, or was under no duty, to control or influence the driver's conduct.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$ 302(1)—Ground of motion for new trial requiring reference to other grounds not considered.

Grounds of a motion for a new trial should be complete in themselves; and, when a particular ground is under consideration, reference to other grounds should not be required in order to understand the assignments of error.

3. Highways  $\S$ 175(1)—Municipal corporations  $\S$ 705(4)—Violation of penal statute regulating automobiles on streets and highways is negligence per se.

The violation of a penal statute proximately causing an injury is negligence per se, and the court may so instruct the jury.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. M. Wilkinson against C. W. Bray. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

G. A. Whitaker, of Valdosta, and Dorsey, Shelton & Dorsey, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

E. K. Wilcox, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Mrs. J. M. Wilkinson brought suit against C. W. Bray for damages on account of personal injuries resulting from a collision of the defendant's automobile with an automobile driven by W. E. French, in which she was riding, the plaintiff alleging that the collision was caused by negligence of the defendant in various particulars. The defendant filed an answer denying liability, and alleging that "said collision and all of its consequences, if attributable to the fault of any one, was attributable to the fault and negligence of W. E. French, who was at the time in charge of and driving the automobile in which plaintiff was riding;" the answer containing specific allegations of negligence on the part of French. There was a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled, and she excepted.

[1] 1. On the trial of the case it was shown that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was riding in the car of French as his guest. She offered evidence to show that French had no interest whatever in the mission on which she was going, that he was not her agent or in her employ, and that she had no control over the movements of his car. On objection that this evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, it was rejected. We think this was such an error as to require the grant of a new trial. Section 3475 of the Civil Code of 1910 is, in part, as follows:

"For the negligence of one person to be properly imputable to another, the one to whom it is imputed must stand in such a relation or privity to the negligent person as to create the relation of principal and agent."

In Roach v. W. & A. Railroad Co., 93 Ga. 785 (4), 21 S. E. 67, the Supreme Court held:

"The negligence of the driver and owner of a private vehicle who, by such negligence, contributes to causing a collision with a locomotive, is not imputable to another person riding by invitation in the vehicle, unless that person had some right, or was under some duty, to control or influence the driver's conduct. Such right might arise by reason of the two being engaged at the time in a joint enterprise for their common benefit; and if this were not so, the duty might arise from obvious or known incompetency of the driver, resulting from drunkenness or other cause."

In Metropolitan Railroad Co. v. Powell, 89 Ga. 601 (7), 16 S. E. 118, it was held:

"If the plaintiff herself was free from negligence and her injury was due to the concurrent negligence of the railroad company and the person with whom she was riding in a wagon, he not being her servant, and it not appearing that she was the owner of the horse or wagon, or that she had any agency or concern in procuring or in driving the same, and nothing appearing which tends to show that she was aware of any incompetency in the driver, the company is liable to her for all the damages consequent upon the injury, and can take no credit as to any part thereof on account of the contributory negligence of the driver of the wagon."

Chief Judge Hill in Adamson v. McEwen, 12 Ga. App. 510, 77 S. E. 591, said:

"Where a person riding with another as the latter's guest or companion is injured by the negligence of a third person, 'contributory negligence of the driver is not imputable to the injured person, unless the injured person was in a position to exercise authority or control over the driver, or failed to exercise such care as he could and should have exercised under the particular circumstances, to protect himself.' Colorado & Southern Ry. Co. v. Thomas, 33 Colo. 519, 81 Pac. 803, 70 L. R. A. 681, 3 Ann. Cas. 700. Under this principle, Boykin, who was simply the guest and companion of Adamson, could not be chargeable with the negligence of the driver who was running Adamson's automobile; for, being simply a guest, he had no control or authority over the driver. In the case of Dale v. Denver City Tramway Co., 173 Fed. 789, 97 C. C. A. 511, 19 Ann. Cas. 1223, it is held that the negligence of a chauffeur driving an automobile is not imputable to a person riding in the automobile but having no control over it. See, in this connection, the case of Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652. In the case of Clarke v. Connecticut Co., 83 Conn. 219, 76 Atl. 523, it is said: 'A gratuitous passenger, in no matter what vehicle, is not expected, ordinarily, to give advice or direction as to its control and management.' We deduce from these authorities, as well as from the general principle on the subject, that where one is injured by the negligent conduct of the driver of an automobile, a person who is riding in the automobile simply as an invited guest, and who has no control or management of the machine or of the driver, and no interest in the automobile, cannot be held liable for the negligent conduct of the chauffeur; that in riding in the automobile under these circumstances he is not engaged in a common or joint enterprise with the owner or the chauffeur; and the fact that the guest has agreed to pay the expenses of the party after they have arrived at their destination does not alter the legal conclusion to be drawn from the facts above stated."

See, also, Southern Ry. Co. v. King, 128 Ga. 383, 57 S. E. 687, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 829, 119 Am. St. Rep. 390; Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Barrow, 18 Ga. App. 261 (5), 89 S. E. 383. The foregoing rulings clearly support the position we take that the court erred in rejecting the evidence referred to above.

[2] 2. This court is not called upon to consider the eighth ground of the motion for a new trial, because it cannot be understood without reference to another ground of the motion.

Bowen v. Smith-Hall Grocery Co., 146 Ga. 157(4), 91 S. E. 32.

[3] 3. Certain other grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complain of errors in excerpts from the charge. The chief objection to these portions of the charge is that the court failed to instruct the jury that the—

"failure on the part of the defendant to observe the rules and requirements of the law referred to in said portion of the charge (the law relative to the running and controlling of automobiles) constituted negligence per se."

The tenth ground alleges error—

"because the court failed to submit to the jury at any time an appropriate charge on the doctrine of negligence per se, and failed to charge the jury with reference to the several allegations of negligence per se."

As under the ruling in the preceding portion of this opinion, a new trial is to be had with evidence different from that at the former trial, the judge who presides must adjust his charge to the case made, and, should the evidence show that the defendant had failed to comply with any portion of the law regulating the use of automobiles upon the streets and highways, and in so doing had violated a penal statute, he would of course charge the jury that this act would be negligence per se.

"The violation of a penal statute proximately causing an injury is negligence per se, and the court may so instruct the jury." L. & N. Railroad Co. v. Hames, 135 Ga. 67 (4), 68 S. E. 805.

1. Demurrer not well taken.

The suit was upon an open count, and, as amended, was not subject to the demurrer interposed.

2. Certiorari  $\S$  59 — Assignments of error must point out error; assignment that ruling was error insufficient.

Assignments of error must be specific, whether contained in a bill of exceptions or in a petition for certiorari, and, when based upon a decision of the trial court, must specifically point out the reason why the decision is error. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5183 and 6139; Warren v. Oliver, 111 Ga. 808(1), 35 S. E. 673; Callaway v. Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. 354, 64 S. E. 1106.

(a) In the instant case the petition for certiorari complained that the trial court disallowed an amendment to the defendant's answer, but the assignment of error upon this ruling was merely that it "was error." This assignment of error was not sufficient in that it did not point out why the ruling excepted to was error. Palmer v. Ingram, 2 Ga. App. 200, 58 S. E. 362.

3. Pleading ⚡380 — Evidence to support amendment disallowed properly rejected.

Error from City Court of Tifton; J. H. Price, Judge.

Harrison Woods was convicted of larceny, and he brings error. Reversed.

The prosecuting witness, Rowland, testified that when he hired defendant as the chopper defendant said he did not have a crosscut saw, broad axe, or club axe; that he got them and turned them over to defendant; that he bought a saw and gave it to defendant, and gave him orders to get the two axes; that he had never seen the tools since; that he only loaned the tools to defendant, and did not charge them up to him; that defendant left after working two or three weeks, and went to work for another person; and that defendant owed him $30 when he quit which he had been unable to collect. Defendant's witness Edwards testified that when defendant was working for one Harrell before going to work for Rowland he had a broad axe and a club axe, and had them when he went to work for Rowland; that when he left Rowland he left a crosscut saw in the house of the witness, and it was still there; that he saw defendant buy a club axe, and have it charged to himself. Defendant's witness, Williams, testified that when defendant went to work for Rowland he borrowed a crosscut saw from the witness, and that he then had a broad axe and a club axe, and they were not new tools. Defendant stated that when he went to work for Rowland he had a broad axe and a club axe, and borrowed a crosscut saw from Williams; that he later bought another club axe of a different size, and had it charged to himself, and later paid for it; that when he left Rowland he took all his tools except the saw, which he left with Edwards; that Rowland never loaned him any tools, and he had never taken anything of Rowland's; and that Rowland let him go after one Branch had promised to pay the $30 defendant owed Rowland.—Statement by editor.

1. Motion to dismiss denied.

The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions is denied.

2. Judgment ⚡509—Cannot be collaterally attacked except for fraud or collusion, or defect apparent on face of record.

An unreversed judgment of a competent court cannot be collaterally attacked except for fraud or collusion, or for some defect apparent upon the face of the record or pleadings. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3218 and 5966; Hammock v. McBride, 6 Ga. 178 (1); Smith v. Cuyler, 78 Ga. 654 (2), 3 S. E. 406; Williams v. Lancaster, 113 Ga. 1020 (6), 39 S. E. 471. See, also, in this connection, Civil Code 1910, §§ 4629, 4630, and 5965; McArthur v. Matthewson, 67 Ga. 134.

3. Judgment  $\S$  501, 523—In money rule proceeding, where allegation of fraud insufficient, evidence properly excluded; allegation that judgment was taken for too great an amount does not show fraud; judgment cannot be attacked collaterally for accident or mistake as to amount.

In a money rule proceeding, where C. claims money in the hands of the sheriff, derived from the sale of certain property of B. sold by the sheriff under an execution in favor of A. against B., and A. intervenes and claims the fund, and C. alleges in his petition that the judgment in favor of A. (upon which the execution of A. was based) was obtained through fraud, but the facts as set forth in the petition are insufficient to constitute fraud, it is not error for the court to hold that C. could not go behind the judgment and show by extraneous evidence to the record that B. did not in fact owe A. the amount of the judgment, and to repel evidence offered by C. to support his allegations of fraud.

(a) In the instant case the judgment was collaterally attacked solely on the ground of fraud in its procurement, and the only allegation in the petition as to fraud was that the judgment was taken for too great an amount (the amount of the excess being stated), and was therefore fraudulent "to the extent of this excess." This allegation, if true, does not necessarily show fraud in the procurement of the judgment. The judgment may have been taken for too great an amount simply through accident or mistake, and a judgment cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that it was procured through accident or mistake; and, furthermore, the judgment was not attacked on such a ground. The allegations in the petition being insufficient to show fraud, it was not error for the court to exclude the evidence offered to prove such allegations.

4. No errors committed.

The court, sitting by consent, without the intervention of a jury, committed no material error in its rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, and did not err in rendering the judgment excepted to.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

BROYLES, C. J., and LUKE, J., concur.

BLOODWORTH, J. (dissenting). I think this court should pass an order directing the trial judge to so modify his judgment in this case as to allow the bank to collect from the funds in the hands of the sheriff the principal of the debt, $4,500, interest thereon at 8 per cent. from February 8, 1912, 10 per cent. attorney's fees, and costs. Of course I recognize the presumption in favor of a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction and unreversed, but this presumption may be overcome by proof of fraud. I shall not undertake to quote all the evidence in this case, but the evidence clearly shows that there was due on this indebtedness when the claim was transferred to the bank, only $216 interest, and that this was all the interest the bank ever paid, and that when the bank bought the claim all the interest on the notes up to February 8, 1912, had been paid by R. J. Webb. M. W. Webb swore that he was cashier of the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank when these notes were bought from Mrs. Webb. He further swore:

"We paid what was due on the notes on that date, and $4,716.00 was the amount we all recognized as involved in the deal at the time the notes were transferred to the bank by Mrs. Webb and at the time the deed was made from her to the bank." (Italics mine.)

This same cashier swore that he made the calculation on the notes upon which the judgment was taken, and the calculation shows that interest was calculated for several years prior to February 8, 1912. The judgment based upon this calculation had in it a total of $949.63 of interest and attorney's fees more than was proper. The petition alleges the judgment—

"was taken for an excessive sum, and was for too great an amount, and was therefore fraudulent to the extent of this excess as against these claimants."

To allow the bank to collect this excess of interest and attorney's fees, while other creditors go without even the principal of their judgment, would be unjust, inequitable, and fraudulent. Both the bank and the law should be satisfied if it received what was justly and legally due. In Hinton v. Burns, 20 Ga. App. 469, 93 S. E. 121, Judge Jenkins said:

"A money rule is an equitable proceeding, and the court must, upon proper pleading, award the money in the hands of the officer to the person equitably entitled to it"

—and cited a number of decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court to support this well-recognized principle. The following sections of the Civil Code of 1910 will give us very material aid in determining the question at issue:

"Sec. 5965. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction may be set aside by a decree in chancery, for fraud, accident, or mistake, or the acts of the adverse party unmixed with the negligence or fault of the complainant."

"Sec. 4584. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction may be set aside by a decree, for fraud, accident, or mistake, or the acts of the adverse party unmixed with the negligence or fault of the petitioner."

"Sec. 4629. Fraud will authorize a court of equity to annul conveyances, however solemnly executed, and to relieve against awards, judgments, and decrees obtained by imposition."

"Sec. 5966. Creditors or bona fide purchasers may attack a judgment for any defect appearing on the face of the record or pleadings, or for fraud or collusion, whenever and wherever it interferes with their rights, either at law or in equity."

"Sec. 3218. Creditors may attack as fraudulent a judgment or conveyance, or any other arrangement interfering with their rights, either in law or in equity."

In Hammock v. McBride, 6 Ga. 178 (1), it is held that—

"Creditors or bona fide purchasers may attack a judgment fraudulently obtained, whenever it interferes with their rights, either at law or in equity."

In Smith v. Gettinger, 3 Ga. 140, it was held:

"A judgment in attachment may be set aside in a court of law, upon an issue suggesting fraud or want of consideration, tendered by a judgment creditor of the defendant in attachment."

In Smith v. Oyler, 78 Ga. on page 660, 3 S. E. on page 407, Chief Justice Bleckley said:

"Fraud is not a thing that can stand, even when robed in a judgment."

In Williams v. Lancaster, 113 Ga. 1020 (6), 39 S. E. 471, the Supreme Court said:

"A collateral attack upon a judgment may be made in any court upon the ground of fraud. Civil Code, §§ 5370, 4082" (Civil Code of 1910, §§ 5965, 4629).

Under the above rulings, I think the trial judge should have considered all the evidence offered for the purpose of showing that the judgment in favor of the bank was in excess of the amount actually due it, and when all the evidence in reference to this matter is considered, I think the court erred in holding that in this proceeding the bank should be allowed to collect the entire amount for which judgment was entered.

Railroads §5½, New vol. 6A Key-No. Series —Employé not entitled to recover back time pay under Director General's order.

The court did not err in sustaining the demurrers to the petition and dismissing it.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Pink Christopher against W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Plaintiff alleged that he began work for the railway company about October 1, 1917, in the capacity of machinist's helper, and worked in that capacity at a regular salary of 22 cents an hour until February 15, 1919, when he was discharged; that about January 1, 1918, the railway company was taken over by the United States government, and plaintiff, then being an employé of the railway company, continued his employment and service; that he was entitled to an increase from 22 cents to 45 cents an hour from January 1, 1918, under Supplement No. 4 to General Order No. 27 of the Director General of Railroads issued on July 25, 1918, being an increase of 23 cents an hour for what was known as back time; and that he had demanded payment, but payment had not been made. The Director General demurred on the grounds that no cause of action was stated; that the agreement to pay an increase for back time was a pure gratuity, not legally enforceable; and that it nowhere appeared how much plaintiff claimed to be due from the date of such Supplement to General Order No. 27. The railway company demurred on the same grounds, and on the further ground that no contract or obligation of the company was set out because it was not at the times in question in possession of its properties, operating them or employing persons to work thereon.—Statement by the editor.

C. J. Moore and T. G. Lewis, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Malicious prosecution ¶10, 51—Process ¶168, 171—Petition held not to state cause of action for malicious use or abuse of process; "malicious use of process" defined; "malicious abuse of process" defined.

The petition as amended did not set out a cause of action, and the court properly dismissed it on general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malicious Abuse of Process.]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Lella Roberts against Willys-Overland, Incorporated. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Miss Lella Roberts sued the Willys-Overland Corporation for damages, and in her petition alleged substantially the following facts: That on May 15, 1920, she purchased from the defendant an automobile, for which she paid in cash certain sums of money, and signed certain papers promising to pay other sums; that the defendant induced her to do this by certain representations and agreements, which it failed to carry out, and which she later found to be false and fraudulent; that in the writing which she had been induced to sign the defendant reserved title to the automobile until payment of all the sums stipulated to be paid, and on her failure to make the payments the defendant had the right to sue in "trover" for the recovery of the automobile, although the plaintiff in a court of equity would have had the right to have the whole transaction set aside because of defendant's fraudulent representations; that, when the plaintiff failed to make certain payments as stipulated in the contract, instead of filing "merely a suit in trover" for the recovery of property, the defendant instituted a bail trover proceeding, making the necessary affidavit for the purpose, and as a result of said proceeding the plaintiff was on October 28, 1920, arrested by the marshal of the municipal court of Atlanta, taken in custody, and held for several hours, subject to the gaze of the public; that plaintiff would not have been arrested had the defendant been sued in trover instead of bail trover; that the affidavit made in the bail trover proceeding was maliciously and willfully issued, and was absolutely false, and was made for the sole purpose of humiliating the plaintiff; that the plaintiff is a woman 50 years of age, has resided in the city of Atlanta for a number of years, owns certain property, is highly respectable, and has never been arrested or held in custody before; that the property was not likely to be eloiigned or moved away, and this fact was well known to the defendant; that by reason of the above-stated acts, which were malicious and unwarranted, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $10,000; that there were two alternatives whereby the plaintiff could have prevented the arrest, to wit, by giving bond for the forthcoming of the property or by surrendering possession of the same, but because certain parties were at the time of her arrest out of the city she could not give the required bond; and that she was unable to surrender the automobile, because it was in a garage undergoing repair.

The defendant filed a general and special demurrer to the petition, and upon the hearing of the demurrer the plaintiff filed an amendment, in which she alleged that the damage claimed was for the malicious abuse of legal process. After allowing this amendment, the trial judge sustained the general demurrer, and to this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

J. Walter Le Craw and Fred E. Harrison, both of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Brandon & Hynds and V. B. Moore, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Although the plaintiff, by amendment, alleged that her cause of action was for the malicious abuse of legal process, it is very uncertain from the facts set forth in the petition whether she based her action upon the malicious use or the malicious abuse of legal process. However, in either event the judge properly sustained the defendant's general demurrer, since the facts alleged, when construed, as they must be, most strongly against the pleader, fail to show either a malicious use or a malicious abuse of legal process.

"Malicious use of legal process is where a plaintiff in a civil proceeding employs the court's process in order to execute the object which the law intends for such a process to subserve, but proceeds maliciously and without probable cause. In a suit for damages growing out of such malicious use of process, it must appear that the previous litigation has finally terminated against the plaintiff therein. Malicious abuse of legal process is where a plaintiff in a civil proceeding willfully misapplies the process of a court in order to obtain an object which such a process is not intended by law to effect. In a suit for damages growing out of such a perversion of the court's process, it is not necessary to show that the former litigation was without probable cause, or that it terminated prior to the institution of the suit for damages." McElreath v. Gross, 23 Ga. App. 287 (1 & 2). 98 S. E. 190.

See, also, Georgia Loan & Trust Co. v. Johnston, 116 Ga. 628, 43 S. E. 27. and Brantley v. Rhodes-Haverty Furniture Co., 131 Ga. 276, 281, 62 S. E. 222, and cases cited. In the instant case the facts alleged were legally insufficient to constitute a cause of action for malicious use of process, since it was not alleged in the petition that the previous litigation had finally terminated against the plaintiff therein. Neither did the petition set out a cause of action for malicious abuse of process, since the facts alleged therein were legally insufficient to show that the bail trover proceeding was willfully misapplied or perverted to some use which the law did not intend that such a process should subserve. The petition admits that the title to the automobile was in the plaintiff in the trover proceeding, and that it had the right to sue petitioner in trover. The petition contains also an allegation that the plaintiff could have escaped arrest by either giving bond or surrendering the property, and the facts alleged why she did not take advantage of this right are wholly insufficient to constitute a legal excuse for her failure to do so. The purpose of a bail trover proceeding is to require the defendant to give bond for the forthcoming of the property, and the facts alleged in the petition fail to show that the proceedings in the instant case were instituted for any other purpose.

Judgment affirmed.

JORDAN v. DOUGLAS GROCERY CO.
(No. 12153.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence  $\S$ 423(8)—That married woman executed note and mortgage as surety not admissible, where nobody else signed.

The court did not err in excluding the testimony of the defendant that the note sued on and the mortgage executed to secure it, which were signed by her alone, were signed by her as surety, and that she did not purchase the store and the goods for which the note was given.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$ 302(1)—New trial  $\S$ 41(2)—Admission of evidence not ground for new trial, where other evidence demanded directed verdict; ground of motion for new trial must be complete in itself.

"Though testimony be improperly admitted, yet if, in the opinion of the court, the other evidence is sufficient to authorize the verdict, which ought to have been as it was, independent of the testimony, a new trial should not be granted." Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 145(1).

3. Verdict properly directed.

The court properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Hazlehurst; Gordon Knox, Judge.

Action by the Douglas Grocery Company against Mrs. D. T. Jordan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. D. Dell, of Hazlehurst, for plaintiff in error.

McDonald & Willingham, of Douglas, and Newton Gaskins, of Hazlehurst, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. Mrs. D. T. Jordan gave the Douglas Grocery Company a promissory note, and at the same time executed a mortgage to secure the note. No other person signed either the note or the mortgage. When sued upon the note, she filed a plea denying liability, and alleging:

That, while her name appears as a principal, "she was in reality security or surety for Joe McDaniel, and that said fact was fully known to Douglas Grocery Company; that at that time she was a married woman, and could not become surety or security for any one; and that therefore she is not liable on said note."

On the trial she sought to prove that she signed the note and the mortgage as security, and that she did not purchase the store and goods for which the note was given. In her motion for a new trial she complains that the judge rules out this evidence and directed a verdict against her.

[1] 1. For no reason assigned at the trial did the court err, under the pleadings in this case, either in rejecting the evidence that the defendant "signed said note as security and that she signed said mortgage as security," or in ruling out the evidence that "she did not purchase the store from plaintiff, and never ordered any goods from them, and did not owe them anything." The mortgage itself shows that the note was given for the purchase of a certain stock of goods. The only person who signed the note and the mortgage was the defendant. It is not claimed that any other person was to have signed these papers and by mistake or fraud was prevented from doing so, and the petition contained no allegation of mistake or fraud whatever. Section 8538 of the Civil Code of 1910 says:

"The contract of suretyship is that whereby one obligates himself to pay the debt of another in consideration of credit or indulgence, or other benefit given to his principal, the principal remaining bound therefor." (Italics ours.)

The very essence of a contract of suretyship is that there should be some one liable as principal. This necessarily contemplates that, where such a note is given, there must be at least two parties who signed it and are liable for the payment thereof, the principal and the surety. As only one person signed the note sued on, that person must necessarily be the principal, and the court properly ruled out all evidence offered to show that she was surety. Moreover, the approved brief of evidence shows that practically all the evidence complained of as having been excluded was before the jury, and that it came from the defendant.

[2, 3] 2. The third ground of the amendment to the motion for new trial complains that the court erred in allowing a witness to testify:

"They [Mr. Jordan, Mr. Anderson, and Joe McDaniel] told me Mrs. Jordan would purchase the store."

As this ground of the motion is not complete and understandable within itself, we are not called upon to consider it. However, granting, but not conceding, that the admission of this evidence was error, it is not cause for new trial, because, independently of this testimony, the other evidence demanded the verdict directed by the court. Jordan v. Pollock, 14 Ga. 145 (1); Daniel v. Frost, 62 Ga. 697 (5).

3. The court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

(No. 10667.)

Railroads ~~679~~—Action held one for invasion of abutting owner's inclosure, and not to try title under right of way deed.

An action by plaintiff whose fence was broken and whose close was entered by the servants of a railroad company, who claimed that by virtue of a right of way deed it had title to a portion of the land which abutted on a street, held one for invasion, and not for determination of title; hence the direction of a verdict for defendant on the theory that it established title to a portion of the property was error.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Action by Elias Day against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

McSwain & Craig, of Pickens, for appellant.
Carey & Carey, of Pickens, for respondent.

GARY, O. J. The allegations of the complaint herein are as follows:

"(1) That defendant is a corporation duly chartered by and under the laws of the state of South Carolina, and has a line of railway in said county and state, operated by its agents, employees, and lessees, and said line of railway runs through the town of Easley, and in part through the property now belonging to plaintiff.

"(2) That plaintiff owns two dwelling houses facing and fronting on East Main street in the city of Easley, said county and state, and resides in one of said dwelling houses, and has maintained for a number of years yard fences inclosing the front yards.

"(3) Heretofore, on or about March 8, 1917, the defendant, its agents, servants, and lessees, entered upon the premises of plaintiff in defiance of written notice warning against trespass, and, over protest and disregard of the rights and feeling of plaintiff, did willfully and maliciously trespass on the land of plaintiff, tore down his yard fence, tore up shrubbery and flowers and the ground within said bound of fences, and left same in rough and dilapidated condition.

"(4) The plaintiff rebuilt said fences, and thereafter, on or about March 29, 1917, the defendant by its agents, servants, and lessees did again willfully and maliciously and in defiance, and over the protest of the plaintiff and in disregard of warning, entered upon said land of plaintiff and tore down said fences for the second time.

"(5) That by reason of the unlawful, willful, and malicious disregard of the rights of plaintiff the defendant has caused actual and punitive damage to plaintiff in the sum of $8,000.

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendant for the sum of $6,000 and cost of this action."

The defendant, answering the complaint herein, alleges:

"(1) That it denies each and every allegation thereof except as herein admitted.

"(2) That it has constructed a double track of its line of railway through the city of Easley, but has done no acts connected therewith except upon its own right of way, and has not trespassed or entered upon any land belonging to the plaintiff."

Mrs. Lella Day, for the plaintiff, sworn, says:

"I am the wife of the plaintiff, and was at home on March 8, 1917, when the agents and servants of the defendant came and started tearing down the yard fence, and Mr. Day stopped them by having the foreman arrested. Mr. Day went off somewhere, and later on the same day the hands of defendant, about 30, came back, and I heard a great fuss and noise, and saw that they were tearing down the fence, breaking down the post, pulling down the braces, cutting up the shrubbery and flowers and shade trees, and throwing the rubbish back to the door steps. When they finished they left, though I asked them not to do anything in Mr. Day's absence, but Mr. Steele, the foreman, was obdurate, and didn't treat me politely, I asked him not to disturb my flowers if the property was theirs, but to take it in a legal manner. After Mr. Day had put back the fence, the hands of the defendant came again on March 29th, and tore down the fence again while Mr. Day was sick in bed and unable to get up. I went, at Mr. Day's request, and served a written notice on the foreman, telling them to keep off the premises, but they tore down that part of the fence of the tenant lot. They put the rubbish all over my yard, and walked all over it, and put cigar stubs on my doorsteps."

A. D. Perkins, sworn for defendant, says:

"I am civil engineer, and made this plat of the property in question. It is 100 feet from the center of the right of way of the main line of the railroad, down to the two houses of Mr. Elias Day. It is 42 feet from these two houses, up to the present sidewalk. The railroad intended to widen this street in the direction of the Day houses, 8 feet. That would leave a frontage in each yard of 34 feet. When the second track was put down, it was laid on the south side of the old track. The width of this second tract is 8 feet. There is 30 feet of roadway there now. The public uses it up to the railroad on both sides of the track."

Mr. F. Furlo, for defendant, sworn, says:

"I am a civil engineer for defendant, and know that this plat is correct, and when they laid the double track through Easley on the south side of the old main line track we had to take up a part of the street in front of Mr. Day's house, and when we were tearing down Mr. Day's fence we were taking 8 feet more on the other side of the street, so that the street would not be any narrower than it was originally.

"The plat I refer to is the one made by Mr. Perkins, Exhibit F. In putting down the second track, we used 8 feet of what the town was using as a street, and it insisted that we give for a similar use 8 feet of our right of way on the other side. This was the purpose of opening up the S. It was part of the construction work of laying the double track."

J. M. King, for defendant, sworn, says:

"I was mayor of the town when these things took place, and the town council required the railroad to leave South Main street in front of Mr. Day's house its original width, after laying down the second track, and occupying a part of the original street. We required the railroad to open up the 8 feet in front of Mr. Day's property, before we were willing for it to lay the double track. This was in lieu of that which had been taken by laying down the second double track. This street has been used ever since I can remember as a railroad right of way and a street on it. The city council passed an ordinance requiring anybody that did any work on the streets to first get a permit to do it. The railroad company got this permit when it laid its second track."

The defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor upon the following grounds:

"(1) That under the deed from Jas. S. Smith to the Atlanta & Richmond Air Line Railway, the defendant owns for a right of way 100 feet on each side of the track, measuring from the center thereof.

"(2) That the recitals in said deed as to the matters to be done and not to be done are void, because repugnant to the estate previously granted, and also because the said deed is signed by Jas. S. Smith only, and the mere acceptance of said deed did not bind the grantee thereof or the defendant as to said recitals.

"(3) That the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, as he purchased his land subject to defendant's right of way created by the Smith deed.

"(4) That the recitals and statements in the Jas. S. Smith deed, if of any force, merely creates a personal covenant, of which only the said Smith, or his administrator or heirs at law, could take advantage, and this is true whether said words be a personal covenant or a conditional one. That the said words do not create a covenant running with the land, and if they did there is a want of privity as to the plaintiff, the covenant ceasing or running out upon the death of Joel Ellison, who took a life estate only under the deed to him by Elsie E. Smith and O. H. C. Smith.

"(5) That the plaintiff by his own evidence has shown that he had no title."

His Honor the presiding judge sustained the motion, and the plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

"(1) That his honor erred in not holding that the action at bar is one of trespass quare clausum fregit, and that the testimony clearly showed that the defendant had trespassed within the close of plaintiff by tearing down his fence three times and by digging up his trees and rose-bushes.

"(2) That the presiding judge erred in not holding that the defendant railroad company was liable for such trespass, upon the private premises of plaintiff, inclosed by a fence, over the protest, both oral and written, of plaintiff, and that, assuming that the defendant had title for railroad purposes under its right of way deed to said land, yet it was the duty of the railroad company to recover said land by process of law, and not to take the same by force of arms.

"(3) That the presiding judge erred in not holding that the evidence plainly showed that the defendant was not taking possession of said land for railroad purposes, but merely for a street to carry out its bargain with the town council ofasley, and further erred in not holding that the railroad company had an easement in said land for railroad purposes only, and that the plaintiff might use said land for any purpose not inconsistent with the right of the railroad company, and that a public street is not a railroad purpose.

"(4) That the presiding judge erred in holding that the right of way deed in question is to be construed in the same way as was the deed construed in the case of Hammond v. Railway Co., 15 S. C. 10, whereas the presiding judge should have held that the deed in question in the case at bar was not one based upon forfeiture, or the breach of a condition subsequent, but is a plain right of way deed, conferring an easement for railroad purposes only, and that such railroad company could not dispute the title of the plaintiff, or any other person found in possession of the land under color of title, with a house upon the land and with the fence around the house, and that the railroad company could only use said land, under any circumstances, for railroad purposes.

"(5) That the presiding judge erred in not holding that the absolute legal title in this case does vest in the plaintiff, who with his immediate grantors has been in possession of said land for more than 20 years under color of title, and residing on same; and, furthermore, that the presiding judge erred in not holding that the question of title is not in issue in this case, and that, even assuming that plaintiff does not have a perfect paper title to the land, yet the railroad company would have no right to take possession of said land, and to tear down plaintiff's yard fence and to dig up his trees and rosebushes, except and only for use by the railroad for railroad purposes, and that such railroad could take possession of said land for railroad purposes over the protest of one found in possession with a fence around it and living upon it, over the protest, both oral and written, only by resorting to the courts either for ejectment or for the recovery of so much of the land as might be needed by the railroad for railroad purposes."

Our construction of the complaint is that it sets forth cause of action for damages, on account of the alleged high-handed and lawless manner in which plaintiff's possession was invaded by the defendant, and not to try the title to the land. Therefore there was error on the part of his honor the presiding judge in sustaining the motion for a directed verdict.

Having reached this conclusion, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other questions presented by the exceptions. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

(No. 10645.)

Assignments 48—Instrument held insufficient as equitable assignment to convey equitable title, where possession not taken thereunder.

An instrument, "We * * * do hereby sign all our right, title and interest which we have, or may have, on one lot or parcel of sixty-one acres of land to G., his heirs or assigns," signed by the assignor, while insufficient to convey the legal title, would have been sufficient as an equitable assignment to convey the equitable title to G., had he taken possession thereunder, but was not sufficient to convey equitable title, where he took possession under another claim of right to the land.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by Enoch Lawrence and others against Gertrude E. Burnett and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 104 S. E. 330.

Carson & Tinsley, of Spartanburg, for appellants.

R. B. Paslay, of Spartanburg, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. The facts are thus stated in the master's report:

"On December 9, 1897, Nancy N. Bishop, being the owner of an undivided one-seventh interest in the remainder in the property in question, executed and delivered to Wales P. Gowan, the instrument (Exhibit A), which reads as follows: 'State of South Carolina. County of Spartanburg. We, the undersigned parties named, do hereby sign all our right, title and interest which we have, or may have, on one lot or parcel of sixty-one acres of land to W. P. Gowan, his heirs or assigns. The said lot or parcel of land is the same piece or parcel of land which W. P. Gowan now owns, the same shall be binding on ourselves, our heirs, executors and administrators. Dated Dec. 9, 1897. N. N. Bishop.'

"Wales P. Gowan did not own the property, or any interest therein, at the time this paper was executed. On November 2, 1900, he acquired the life estate of Simeon Gowan in the property, by deed from W. A. Burnett, never recorded. Burnett had purchased Simeon Gowan's interest at sheriff's sale by deed recorded in Book Y. Y., at page 670, and dated November 1, 1886. Simeon Gowan's interest was a life estate and an undivided one-seventh interest in remainder fee.

"Wales P. Gowan went into possession of the property under the deed from W. A. Burnett, and continued to hold it until the death of Simeon Gowan, about 1909. Sarah Gowan, the wife of Simeon, owned a life estate in the property under the will of William Gowan, the father of Simeon, but subject to the life estate of Simeon Gowan. Upon the death of Simeon, Sarah Gowan went into possession of the property until her death, about August, 1915. Nancy N. Bishop had died previous to the death of Simeon in 1909.

"The property originally came from William Gowan, the father of Simeon, who had seven children. The history of the case is stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Hydrick, upon the former appeal. See 109 S. C. 416, 93 S. E. 144. After the death of William, Simeon, Sarah, and Nancy N. Bishop, suit was brought for the partition of all the property which William had conveyed to Simeon. All the property was sold by the master, and the proceeds of sale have been disbursed for the most part.

"Under the instrument hereinbefore set forth, Wales P. Gowan is now claiming one-seventh part of the proceeds of the sale of the 61-acre tract of land. The heirs at law of Nancy N. Bishop are also claiming this part of the proceeds of the sale. In my former report I made no decision as to the instrument hereinabove quoted, deeming that it was unnecessary to the decision, in the view which I took of the case. But the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and the case was sent back in order that this question might be passed upon: Was the instrument sufficient, under the rule announced in Mathis v. Hammond, 9 Rich. Eq. 137, and under the other cases cited by counsel for Wales P. Gowan, to convey the equitable title to Wales P. Gowan?

"After carefully examining the authority cited for the defendant Wales P. Gowan, I conclude that the instrument was entirely insufficient, since those citations do not furnish any authority, as it seems to me, to sustain the position taken by defendant, Wales P. Gowan. * * * The Nancy N. Bishop instrument lacks several of the requirements for a conveyance of land. It is not under seal, it is not witnessed, no consideration is stated, and no sufficient consideration to support such a conveyance of land proved.

"There is an effort by defendant, Wales P. Gowan, to prove a consideration. Carolina Gowan, the wife of Wales P. Gowan, was the stepdaughter of Nancy N. Bishop. She lived in the home of Mrs. Bishop from the time that she was 7 until her marriage at the age of 17. The effort is made to show that on account of the services rendered to Nancy N. Bishop by Carolina Gowan, and on account of her love and affection for her stepdaughter, she made the conveyance to Wales P. Gowan, in order in some way to repay her stepdaughter for the services which she had performed. I think the defendant has shown that Carolina Gowan did render loving services to her stepmother, though whether the services were rendered prior to the execution of the instrument or afterward is not shown. I am satisfied that Nancy N. Bishop had a real and genuine affection for her stepdaughter, and that this affection was well founded. But the instrument quoted is entirely insufficient and inadequate to convey land. It does not estop the heirs at law of Nancy N. Bishop from claiming the proceeds."

So much of his honor the circuit judge's decree as is necessary for a proper understanding of the questions involved is as follows:

"The master reports the instrument hereinabove set out is entirely insufficient and inadequate to convey land. In this he is in error. It was insufficient to convey the legal title, but was sufficient as an equitable assignment to convey the equitable title to W. P. Gowan.

"Carrie Gowan (same as Carolina Gowan) was the wife of W. P. Gowan, and the stepdaughter of N. N. Bishop, who raised her since a girl of 7 years old, and N. N. Bishop felt towards her just as she did one of her own children, and Mrs. Carrie Gowan called her 'Ma' and rendered as great or greater service to her than her own children did.

"Mrs. N. N. Bishop had expressed a desire that Carrie Gowan would share in the division of her property as one of her own children, but she discovered under the title she had she could not do this. So she assigned whatever interest she had in the 61 acres to W. P. Gowan. The assignment was made, and W. P. Gowan held possession of this property under this paper and the Burnett paper for about 13 years, until the death of Simeon Gowan, 1909, when Simeon's widow, who took a life estate after Simeon's death under the will of William, took possession of the property and held during her life. Soon after Sarah Gowan's death this proceeding was instituted.

"It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the report of the master be, and the same is hereby, reversed in so far as said report finds the instrument of N. N. Bishop was insufficient to carry to W. P. Gowan her equitable interest in the 61 acres of land."

The appellant's exceptions are as follows:

"(1) Because the circuit court erred in sustaining the exceptions of the respondents to the master's report in reversing the master and in ruling and holding that the paper executed by Nancy N. Bishop was an equitable assignment of her undivided one-seventh interest in the 61 acres of land or the proceeds of the sale thereof, and that the heirs of Nancy N. Bishop had no interest in the property, and in not holding that Exhibit A was void and inoperative for the lack of consideration.

"(2) In holding and finding as a matter of fact that W. P. Gowan held possession of this property under the paper executed by Nancy N. Bishop for 18 years, until the death of Simon Gowan in 1909."

In remanding the case on the former appeal Mr. Justice Hydrick in delivering the opinion of the court (109 S. C. 423, 96 S. E. 146) said in conclusion:

"Deeming it unnecessary to the decision, in the view which it took of the case, the circuit court did not consider the assignment of Nancy Bishop to appellant, and made no decision as to its sufficiency to convey her interest in the remainder, either at law or in equity. Clearly it was insufficient to convey the legal title, as it was not under seal or witnessed, as required by law. The case was presented upon an agreed statement of facts, and the record is insufficient to enable us to reach a satisfactory conclusion as to whether it was sufficient to convey the equitable title under the rule announced in Mathis v. Hammond, 9 Rich. Eq. 137, and in the cases cited by appellant, especially as we are not informed who, other than appellant, is claiming her interest, and upon what ground such claim is made. Therefore, upon that issue the case must go back for further consideration and decision."

The case of Mathis v. Hammond, supra, shows, that if W. P. Gowan had entered into possession of the land, under the instrument of writing executed by Nancy Bishop, it would have made the contract valid and enforceable. But he did not so enter. The master specifically finds that Wales P. Gowan went into possession of the property, under the deed from W. A. Burnett. The presiding judge does not find that W. P. Gowan entered into possession under the assignment in question, but, merely, that he held possession under the assignment and the Burnett paper. It can scarcely be supposed that the circuit judge intended to find that W. P. Gowan entered into possession under the assignment, as it would be contrary to the contention of

W. P. Gowan, as thus set forth in his fifth exception to the Master's report:

"Because the master erred in holding and finding that W. P. Gowan went into possession of the property under a deed from W. A. Burnett, and in not holding that W. P. Gowan was in possession of the property claiming it as his own before the deed of W. A. Burnett or the instrument of Nancy N. Bishop, and was so holding said property at the time the Nancy N. Bishop instrument was executed; same being held under bond for title given by W. A. Burnett to W. P. Gowan."

There is no testimony showing any other valuable consideration, which is essential to the validity and enforcement of the contract attempted to be created.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect the conclusions herein announced.

WATTS, FRASER, and COTHRAN, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I concur in the judgment, but am not to be understood as approving the implication that possession alone under a voluntary equitable assignment will perfect the legal title; a principle which appears to have been announced upon scant consideration in the case of Mathis v. Hammond, 9 Rich. Eq. 137.

My impression is that an equitable assignment is nothing more than an executory agreement, and can be given effect only upon the establishment of the elements essential to sustain an action for specific performance; possession alone is not sufficient, when the implied contract is without a valuable consideration. I prefer to reserve my opinion as to this matter.

WATSON v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. O. W.
(No. 10673.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

1. Insurance  $\S$ 791(1)—Draftee is "enlisted man" within terms of policy.

A draftee is an "enlisted man," within the purview of a life policy which allowed the insured to join the army, but required notice and payment of extra premium.

2. Insurance  $\S$ 825(1) — Whether insurer waived extra premium held for the jury.

In an action on a life policy which allowed the insured to join the army and go out of the United States, but required an extra premium, the question whether the insurer, which was operating as a fraternal order, waived the extra premium held for the jury; even though the officers of the local branch of the order could not waive anything, it not appearing that the general authorities of the order directed the local clerk, whose duty it was to collect all the funds, to collect the war risk premium.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Mackie Watson against the Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World. From a judgment for defendant on directed verdict, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Grier, Park & Nicholson, of Greenwood, for appellant.

Dial & Todd, of Laurens, for respondent.

FRASER, J. Samuel C. Watson took out a policy of life insurance with the respondent. The policy was payable to the appellant, his wife. The insured was drafted as a soldier, was sent to France, and died there. The policy permitted the insured to join the army and go outside of the United States, but it required notice to the company, and the payment of an extra premium. After the deceased left, his wife went to the clerk of the local camp and talked to him about the payment of her husband's dues. Mrs. Watson was short of money, as the payments had not come from the government. Her purpose was to allow the policy to lapse by not paying the premiums. She was urged by the local clerk to keep up the payments. She consented to pay them, but had to borrow the money to do so. The defendant refused to pay the face of the policy, but tendered the sum of $28.80, which it claimed was due under the terms of the policy. The payment of the full amount was refused, because the extra premium for an enlisted man had not been paid. The plaintiff claimed that her husband was not an enlisted man, but was a drafted man, and that the company had waived the payment of the extra premium. The presiding judge ordered a verdict for the defendant. From the judgment entered upon that verdict, this appeal is taken.

[1] 1. The first point cannot be sustained. The deceased was an enlisted man, under the terms of the policy. See McQueen v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., 106 S. E. 32, filed herewith.

[2] 2. The second point must be sustained. There was evidence of waiver, and the case should have been sent to the jury, under the case of Crumley v. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., 102 S. C. 386, 86 S. E. 954. It is true that the officers of the local camp cannot waive anything, but this clerk was also the agent of the Sovereign Camp, and his duty was to "remit all funds due and belonging to the Sovereign Camp to the Sovereign Clerk, as by law provided." It is also true that this extra war risk premium was to be paid to the Sovereign Clerk at the home office. The respondent says it was to be paid directly to the Sovereign Clerk at Omaha, Neb. The policy does not say it shall be paid directly. The other provision, that the local clerk shall remit all funds, is sufficient provision to cover the extra premium. It appears in the case that no notice of the extra premium was given to that officer, who was authorized to forward all funds. There is no intimation that there was any neglect by any individual agent of the company. There was no evidence or presumption that the beneficiary knew or had possession of the policy, and should have known of the required extra premium. Under these circumstances it was for the jury to say whether the company waived the payment of the extra premium or not.

The judgment is reversed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). Action upon a beneficiary certificate issued by the defendant to Samuel C. Watson, September 24, 1917, payable, upon certain conditions, to his wife, the plaintiff, Mrs. Mackie Watson. The insured died in France while in the service of the United States army on October 18, 1918, having been drafted June 24, 1918, subsequently to the issuing of the certificate. The amount of the benefit was $500 in the event of death during the first year of membership, $750 if within the second year, and $1,000 if after the second year. The insured, having died within the second year, the benefit, if accrued, would be $750, although the complaint is for $1,000.

The certificate contains the following conditions and provisions material to the present inquiry, in substance:

1. If the insured should die outside the limits of the United States while serving in the army or navy, as an officer or an enlisted man, the amount due should be such proportion of the benefit as the period he lived after becoming a member bears to his expectancy of life at the time of his initiation, which would be practically a nominal sum.

2. The insured was permitted to avoid this limited benefit, under the circumstances stated, and secure the full benefit provided for in the certificate by complying with these requirements: (a) The option must be executed within 30 days after entering the service. (b) He shall notify the Sovereign Clerk at the home office, Omaha, Neb., that he has entered the service. (c) He shall pay in advance to the Sovereign Clerk $37.50 per $1,000 of insurance per annum, in addition to the regular assessment, the installment payment of Sovereign Camp fund, for his age as provided in tables of rates in section 56 of the constitution and laws.

3. The insured, who complied with these requirements, was extended the further concession that in the event of his death within the limits of the United States, without having served outside, the total benefit should be paid, together with the war assessments which he may have paid.

These facts are conceded: (1) The insured entered the service of the army after he received his certificate. (2) The insured died in France, beyond the limits of the United States, while in the service. (3) The insured did not within 30 days after his enlistment notify the Sovereign Clerk, at the home office, Omaha, Neb., of that fact. (4) The insured did not pay to the Sovereign Clerk the war assessment provided for in his certificate.

It was also shown that from the date of his certificate, September 24, 1917, to the date of his enlistment, the insured duly paid the ordinary Sovereign Camp assessments, the local camp dues, and the war tax (not the war assessments) to the local clerk at Greenwood; that, after he went over seas, the beneficiary under the certificate, the plaintiff here, continued to make similar payments to the same officer, including the month of October, 1918, the month in which the insured died.

It was also shown that when payments were made to the local clerk he assured the beneficiary, who made the payments that "the full policy would be paid if she kept the dues paid." Section 55 of the rules requires the local clerk to collect the admission fees, the dues, and the Sovereign Camp fund assessments, and section 94 requires him to "remit all funds due and belonging to the Sovereign Camp to the Sovereign Clerk as by law provided." Both the clerk who was in office when the insured received his certificate and the clerk who was in office when the payments were made by the beneficiary, or by some one for her, testified that they knew nothing of the war assessment required; that they made no such collections from any member; that they were not requested by the Sovereign Camp to collect them, and received no literature referring to them.

At the close of all the testimony the defendant moved for a directed verdict for the plaintiff for the amount $28.80, admitted to be due under the condition numbered 1 above; this motion was made upon the grounds set out in the record, which should appear in the report of this case. The motion was granted, and from the judgment entered upon the verdict so directed, the plaintiff has appealed.

The opinion of Mr. Justice FRASER proposes to reverse the direction of a verdict, practically in favor of the defendant, upon the ground that there is sufficient evidence of a waiver by the insurer of the vital conditions in the certificate upon which they rely, by reason of the fact that the local clerk collected the monthly dues and assessments without notifying the insured or the beneficiary of the war assessments required; that the local clerk was authorized to receive and forward all funds due to the Sovereign Camp, which included the war assessments, and that his conduct in not calling the attention of the insured or the beneficiary to the war assessments, was evidence of a waiver by the Sovereign Camp of the necessity of such payments.

I do not concur at all in this view, and am of opinion that the verdict was rightly directed. An analysis of the limiting condition (which reduces the benefit to a very small proportion of its face value) shows that it affects only one class of certificate holders, those who enter and die abroad in the service; and their policies are affected only when these two contingencies concur: until they do concur, the policies are perfectly sound; a certificate holder, so long as he is not so unfortunate as to meet both, suffers no diminution of the benefit.

If Watson, without going abroad, (1) had remained in the service here, or (2) died in the service here, or (3) been discharged from the service, or (4) had returned from abroad and remained in the service here, or (5) died in the service here, or (6) been discharged from the service, his policy would have been perfectly good, from the date of the certificate, continuously against these six contingencies, so long as the dues and assessments ordinarily required were paid by or for him. The seventh contingency, that one which happened, he made no provision against. He had a perfect right to take his chances against it, and save the $37.50 if he so desired. How could the defendant know that he had not determined to take this chance until he had done what he contracted to do in the event that they, and not he, were to assume the chance? The policy required that if the defendant was to assume that chance the insured should notify the home office within 30 days after his enlistment, and pay annually, while the increased risk lasted, the war assessment of $37.50 per $1,000 of insurance. This he did not do, and in my opinion cannot force upon the defendant a risk that they specifically contracted with him that they would not assume unless he complied with the conditions referred to.

It would have made no difference if the defendant had had positive knowledge that Watson had enlisted in the service, or if the ordinary dues and assessments had been paid directly to the home office; they could not possibly have known to a certainty that he would be sent overseas; Watson himself could not; doubtless he hoped that he would not be, and in that event the extra assessment would not be needed, for its only effect would have been to secure him against the contingency of dying in the service abroad. What the defendant was charged with knowing was that if Watson desired to be insured against that contingency he could secure it by giving the notice and paying the war assessment. He did neither, and the defendant had the right to assume that, not being willing to pay for it, he did not desire it.

The provisions of the certificate under consideration do not constitute or make conditions under which a forfeiture of the policy will be insisted upon; they simply provide for an exemption from liability on account of the death of the insured under the circumstances mentioned, in the service in a foreign land. That they had the right to impose this limitation as an increase of the hazard can no more be questioned than a provision against liability in case of suicide, which has never been suggested as a ground of forfeiture, but is recognized as a contractual exemption. That they could not constitute a ground of forfeiture is shown by the unquestionable right of the insured to pay the ordinary assessments and continue his insurance in full force, with the exception that it did not cover the contingency against which he had the contractual right to protect himself, but did not.

In Mattox v. Insurance Co. (Ga. App.) 103 S. E. 180, the policy provided that it should be void if the insured within five years engaged in military service in time of war without the written consent of the company; that, upon breach, the liability should be limited to a return of the premiums; but that the policy should cover such risks if the insured, within 31 days after enlistment, should pay to the company at its home office such extra premium as might be required. The insured paid the first premium in June, 1917, and arranged for the second in June, 1918; he enlisted in August, 1918, remained in camp until October 1st, and then sailed for France; on October 15th, he died at sea, not having notified the home office of his enlistment or paid the war assessment. The court decreed in favor of the defendant, holding: entered military service, he must pay an extra premium to keep the policy in force for any amount except for the premium which he had paid, and that it was incumbent upon the insured, if he desired to keep the policy in force for its full value, to notify the company of his intention to enter military service, so that the company would have an opportunity to demand of him the extra premium required, under the terms of the war clause, for such service."

I cannot conceive of a fairer proposition than that contained in the policy. This nation was at war; its resources and men were pledged to contribute to its successful conclusion; the company knew that some of its members would be called to the colors; common sense teaches that the entrance of a member into this service tremendously increases the hazard against which, in ordinary conditions, the company undertook to insure, and the basis on which the ordinary assessments were levied. With this increased hazard thrust upon them, the company had the right, and it was its duty, to make provision against it. It did so by contract solemnly entered into, and by which the insured was as much bound as the company.

The contract notified the insured that the company stood for liability upon every contingency except his death in the service upon foreign soil, when the war was actually being waged, and where, of course, the hazard was greatest. It notified him that he could extend the insurance to cover this solely excepted risk by complying with certain requirements which have been referred to. It guaranteed him further that, if he should comply with these requirements, and die in this country without having gone abroad, all of the war assessments paid should be returned. It is difficult to imagine a provision more reasonably calculated to protect the rights of the company and at the same time to make a generous concession to the insured, for, in strict justice, the payment of the war assessments would have been compensated for by the assumption of the increased hazard which was probable, and the company would have been under no obligation to have returned them.

As to the evidence of a waiver by the company of the right to insist upon exemption from liability under the excepted contingency which actually occurred, bear in mind that the engagement by contract was that the company would not be liable in the event that the insured died in the service abroad, unless he complied with the requirements essential to the assumption by the company of that particular risk. In other words, the compliance was made a condition precedent to such engagement by the company; there was no contract covering this risk until the condition precedent was met. It therefore does not present a case of forfeiture or one of waiver by the company of the condition. In quite a similar case from Arkansas

"It will be observed that the provision of the policy now under consideration is not for a forfeiture, but is merely an exemption from liability on account of death occurring under certain circumstances. It is not a case where acceptance of premiums with knowledge of the forfeiture constitutes recognition of the continued, valid existence of the policy; nor does the case fall within the principle that a forfeiture is waived where an insurance company, when it enters into a contract, has knowledge through any of its authorized agents of facts which would work a forfeiture. * * *

"There was no forfeiture provided for at all, but the company had, as before stated, the right to stipulate under what circumstances it should be liable. The insured had the right to pay the premium and continue the policy in force while he was in the military service of the government, notwithstanding the exemption of the company from liability for death occurring during the period of that service."

This is a much stronger case for the plaintiff than the one at bar, for there the agent of the company not only knew of the provision in the policy relating to service, but accepted the ordinary premium under his construction that the exemption only affected death in battle. The court, however, held that it did not present a case of forfeiture or waiver of a forfeiture, and that the agent was without authority to project the company into a contract which they had not entered into. See, also, Field v. Western Life Indemnity Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 227 S. W. 530; American Nat. Ins. Co. v. Turner (Tex. Civ. App.) 226 S. W. 487; Mississippi Centennial Exp. Co. v. Luderbach, 123 Miss. 828, 86 South. 517; Long v. St. Joseph Life Ins. Co. (Mo. App.) 225 S. W. 106; Carter v. Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World (Tex. Civ. App.) 220 S. W. 239; Reid v. Am. Nat. Assur. Co., 204 Mo. App. 643, 218 S. W. 957; Miller v. Illinois Banker's Life Ass'n, 138 Ark. 442, 212 S. W. 310, 7 A. L. R. 378; Slaughter v. Protective League Life Ins. Co. (Mo. App.) 223 S. W. 819; and Ruddock v. Detroit Life Ins. Co. (Mich.) 177 N. W. 242.

It will be noted that the effect of the provision, primarily, is to exempt the company from liability under the stated contingency. It does not assume the risk at all until the conditions have been performed; a marked difference between it and a contract which assumes the stated risk primarily, and provides for relief under certain circumstances upon the happening of which a forfeiture convenes. In the one case there is no opening for a forfeiture; in the latter there is, which may be defeated by waiver. It is inconceivable to me that a party may be waived into a contract which it has not entered into, waived into the assumption of a risk which it expressly declines to assume except upon conditions which have not been performed.

A case may be imagined where the policy would be of no effect at all unless it applied to certain exempted risks which were necessarily incident to the occupation of the insured, known to the company at the time the policy was issued, and upon which premiums were accepted. The company under the circumstances might well be held estopped from claiming the exemption; but, not constituting a forfeiture, there would be no applicability of the doctrine of waiver. Here, however, we have a case where the policy remains of force as to all contingencies but the excepted one, and the failure of the insured to provide for it may well be assumed by the company to have been intentional.

Assuming, however, that the doctrine of waiver is applicable to the case, the facts relied upon to produce a waiver by the insured are: (1) The knowledge of the local clerk that the insured had enlisted in the service. (2) The payment by or for the insured of the monthly dues and assessments. (3) The declaration of the local clerk that the policy would be paid if the monthly dues and assessments were kept up. An insuperable barrier to the benefit of a waiver are the terms of the statutes (§ 2755, vol. 1, Code of Laws 1912), as follows:

"No subordinate body, or any of its officers or members shall have the power or authority to waive any of the provisions of the laws and constitution of the association, and the same shall be binding upon the association, and each and every member thereof and their beneficiaries"

—which has been construed by this court in the following cases: Ourrence v. Woodmen of the World, 95 S. O. 61, 78 S. E. 442; Crumley v. W. O. W., 102 S. O. 386, 86 S. E. 954; Vant v. Grand Lodge, 102 S. O. 413, 86 S. E. 677; Outlaw v. National Council, 107 S. O. 226, 92 S. E. 469; Sternheimer v. United Commercial Travelers, 107 S. O. 291, 93 S. E. 8; Dillingham v. Junior Order, 113 S. O. 430, 102 S. E. 721.

In addition to this, subdivision A of section 69 of the rules of the insurer, made by the terms of the application and certificate a part of the contract, provides:

"No officer, employee, or agent of the Sovereign Camp, or of any camp, has the power, right or authority to waive any of the conditions upon which beneficiary certificates are issued, or to change, vary, or waive any of the provisions of this constitution or these laws nor shall any custom on the part of any camp or any number of camps—with or without the knowledge of any sovereign officer—have the effect of so changing, modifying, waiving or foregoing such laws or requirements. Each and every beneficiary certificate is issued only upon the conditions stated in and subject to the constitution and laws then in force or thereafter enacted."

But if neither of these provisions could be invoked for the protection of the insurer, the evidence relied upon carries no probative force whatever in establishing a waiver by the insurer of the exemption upon which it relies.

The knowledge by the local clerk of the fact that the insured had enlisted in the service could furnish no possible evidence of the waiver, for the apparent reason that the policy was good against all contingencies except the one under consideration. The local clerk, as well as the insurer, may well have assumed that the insured assumed that risk himself.

For the same reason the payment of the ordinary monthly dues and assessments may be assumed to have been made to keep the policy alive to all contingencies except the one that carried the exemption; the local clerk could not have refused to accept the payments as they were made, it would be illogical, therefore, to hold that the company is prejudiced by what the clerk had to do.

The declarations of the local clerk were clearly outside the scope of his employment, and in fact, as the testimony shows, were made without any knowledge whatever of the provisions requiring notice of enlistment and payment of the war assessments. Waiver is the voluntary relinquishment of a known right; it could hardly be held that the local clerk could waive a provision in the contract that he knew nothing of.

Local camp dues and the ordinary assessments payable monthly, necessary to maintain the beneficiary certificate in force and effect for any purpose whatever, were payable to local camp clerk. Neither the camp clerk nor any other local official had any duty in connection with the payment of the extra war assessment, which was an additional premium, payable for an extra hazard, which might obtain during the life of the policy. Therefore, no local camp official had any authority, real or apparent, to demand, collect, receive, and remit the additional war risk assessment; hence there could be no waiver of the notice and payment of the war risk assessment. The cases of Vant and of Sternheimer, cited above, are in point here.

I think that it is a strained construction to hold that because the local clerk was authorized to collect and remit funds due to the Sovereign Camp he was authorized to collect and remit the war assessments. There is nothing in the record to show that he was so authorized; nothing to show that he knew anything about such assessments; on the contrary he testified that he had never so much as heard of them; and the policy requires that the remittance be made to the Sovereign Clerk. It does not use the word "directly," but that is the evident purport. Even if this construction should be allowed, the insured utterly failed upon the other requirement of notice to the Sovereign Clerk at the home office of his enlistment.

To characterize the evidence relied upon as evidence of a waiver is a misnomer. There is no provision for a forfeiture, and there can therefore be no waiver. The effect appears to be to modify the terms of the written contract by parol testimony and to avoid the rule by denominating it a waiver.

I think, therefore, that the circuit judge was entirely right in directing the verdict as he did, and that the judgment below should be affirmed.

BRADLEY v. VAN WYCK et al. (No. 10695.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

Master and servant  $\S$  276(1)—Nonsuit properly granted for failure to make case.

In an action for the death of an employee, where plaintiff failed to show how he was killed, to prove the specifications of negligence alleged, or to show any actionable negligence on the part of defendants, a nonsuit was properly granted.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Solomon Bradley, as administrator, etc., of Pickens Bradley, deceased, against O. P. Van Wyck, trading as the Greenville Mattress & Manufacturing Company, and others. From an order granting a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bonham & Price and B. F. Perry, all of Greenville, for appellant.

Martin & Blythe, of Greenville, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from an order of Judge Prince granting a nonsuit. The action was brought for the death of Pickens Bradley. He was in the employment of the respondent. He was a mattress filler, and worked in the mattress factory, in what is known as the basement. The allegations of negligence in the complaint were:

"That the master failed to furnish the plaintiff a safe place in which to do his work and failed to furnish safe and suitable appliances; and, second, that the master failed to warn and instruct the deceased as to the danger of the electricity on that particular day."

After all the testimony was in, his honor granted a nonsuit upon the ground that there was no evidence tending to show that the deceased was in the performance of any duty required of him at the time he met his death. The appellant appeals and by six exceptions alleges error in his honor's ruling.

The exceptions are overruled. The appellant failed to show how deceased was killed, and the appellant failed to prove the specifications of negligence as alleged in the complaint, and failed utterly to show any actionable negligence on the part of the respondent. The evidence shows, at the time the deceased was killed, the machine was not in operation, but he was filling the mattress by hand.

Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

Appeal and error §722(1)—Each exception must contain complete assignment.

Under Rule 5 of the Supreme Court (90 S. E. vii) each exception must contain a complete assignment of error, and a mere reference therein to any other exception then or previously taken, or requested charge, will not be considered.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; Edward McIven, Judge.

Action by W. O. Hayes against J. Mason McGill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

J. S. Brice, of York, for appellant.

W. W. Lewis, of York, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This statement appears in the record:

"This was an action brought by the respondent, W. G. Hayes, for the purpose of recovering the sum of $1,600 from the appellant, from whom respondent alleged he had purchased a certain truck, and that the appellant had guaranteed that the truck was sound and in good condition, and practically new; and that respondent, relying on the express warranty of the plaintiff, bought said truck, and afterwards discovered that it was worn out, and only good for old junk; and as there had been a complete failure of this warranty the respondent asked that he might be allowed to return the truck to appellant and recover the purchase price of $1,600."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,600 and the defendant appealed on five exceptions. They, however, cannot be considered, as the appellant has failed to comply with the requirements of Rule 5 of this court (90 S. E. vii), which is as follows:

"Each exception must contain a concise statement of one proposition of law or fact, which this court is asked to review. * * * Each exception must contain within itself, a complete assignment of error, and a mere reference therein to any other exception then or previously taken, or request to charge, will not be considered."

Appeal dismissed.

WATTS and COTHRAN, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. I dissent. While the exceptions might have been clearer, yet it seems to me that it is clear enough for consideration that the appellant intends to complain that his honor charged the jury the law of implied warranty when the plaintiff had alleged an express warranty. The point is not that his honor the trial judge misstated the law as to implied warranty, but that his error was in charging the law of implied warranty in a case in which the plaintiff relied upon an express warranty. The respondent had not been misled, and the question should be decided.

It seems to me that his honor did charge the jury that, if the plaintiff failed to establish his express warranty upon which he relied, then the jury might still find for the plaintiff under the implied warranty, if he had not bought a sound article for a sound price. I do not so understand the recent cases.

For this reason I dissent.

Action by Joseph P. Poole against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cotthran, Dean & Cotthran, of Greenville, for appellant.

Martin & Blythe, of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The plaintiff was riding in his automobile on a public highway, near the city of Greenville. He crossed the main line of the defendant railway company in safety. When he came to a spur track, a box car loaded with goods, consigned to Fall River, Mass., came suddenly upon him and injured his car, and also inflicted injury upon the person of the plaintiff. The freight car was not attached to an engine and was being operated with no means of control. The action was for actual and punitive damages. The case was tried and a verdict rendered as follows: "We find for the plaintiff twelve hundred and fifty dollars." From the judgment entered on this verdict, this appeal is taken, and raises the question of the liability of the defendant for punitive damages.

The verdict does not show that punitive damages are included, but the question of punitive damages is fairly made and should be decided. The record shows:

"The defendant requested the following charge: 'The railway company in this case is shown to have been an interstate commerce carrier at the time, engaged in interstate commerce, and, that being the case, all instrumentalities of the carrier are exclusively within the control of the laws of the United States. I charge you that the laws of the United States which forbid the imposition of punitive damages upon a master for the willful tort of his servant, unauthorized or unratified by him, must be applied in this case; and even though the acts complained of were such as to justify the imposition of punitive damages under the laws of South Carolina, the jury in this case cannot impose such damages unless they believe from the evidence that the railway company authorized or ratified such acts of its employees.'

"The presiding judge refused to charge as requested, and charged as follows: 'Now I might as well make a ruling at this point. The defendant sets up here that the railroad was engaged in interstate commerce, and that for that reason it is not liable to punitive damages, unless the act was ratified by the railroad company. I have been very much interested in the discussion about that; but, after having my attention called to the fact that the case that I was familiar with to some extent myself I had not looked at it in that view, I take it that punitive damages cannot be recovered against interstate carriers, when he is engaged in interstate commerce, where Congress has acted upon the subject, that he is engaged in interstate commerce. That is where it refers to the conduct toward the person party to the contract or passenger, where a person is on a train; but it has no application here. Where a railroad company is passing through this state, although it may be engaged in interstate commerce and injures some third person that is not concerned with the contract involved, and therefore I take it that this is to be governed by our state law, or the common law as administered in this state, and if you find that the railroad was wilful in this case, and that it willfully operated as the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, if the plaintiff was injured, then they would be liable for punitive damages."

[1, 2] We have been cited to no federal statute, and we know of none, that covers the case. The state law governs in the absence of a federal statute, and the state law unquestionably allows punitive damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

Railroads — 116—Contract liability for loss of cars a question of fact.

In an action by a packing company against a railroad for the value of refrigerator cars owned by the packing company and destroyed by fire on the railroad's tracks, plaintiff company's claim of liability against the railroad being grounded on a stipulation in the rules of the Master Car Builders' Association, whether or not plaintiff company's cars were received and were to be handled by defendant railroad under exactly the same terms and conditions as the cars of a regular railroad company, a member of the Car Builders' Association, was one of fact; the evidence offered by plaintiff company tending to support such theory.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Thomas S. Sease, Judge.

Action by the Terry Packing Company against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed, and case remanded for new trial.

Frank G. Tompkins, of Columbia, and W. A. Townes, of Wilmington, N. C., for appellant.

Benet, Shand & McGowan, of Columbia, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action by Terry Packing Company for $1,385.60, the value of three refrigerator cars owned by it, destroyed by fire at Punta Gorda, Fla., while upon the tracks of the defendant. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed, entered upon a verdict by direction of the circuit judge, the defendant appeals.

The facts of the case are substantially as follows:

Terry Packing Company is a corporation engaged at Columbia, S. C., in the purchase, distribution, and sale of fresh fish, shipped in carload lots from Punta Gorda, Fla., to Columbia and other points. The refrigerator cars used for this purpose belonged to Terry Packing Company. In May, 1915, three of the cars were returned empty to Punta Gorda and placed upon the track of a dock owned by the defendant, and alongside of a fish-packing plant of certain vendors, who sold fish to the Terry Packing Company, awaiting loading and shipment. On June 27, 1915, a fire of incendiary origin destroyed the fish-packing plant and the three cars. The defendant was in no way to blame for the fire.

The plaintiff makes no charge of negligence against the defendant, nor does it seek, in the complaint, to hold the defendant liable as a common carrier. It relies upon a certain stipulation in the rules of the Master Car Builders' Association, to the effect that "damage done to any car by unfair usage, derailment, or accident" is assumed by the railroad company handling the car. It seeks to connect itself with those rules, so as to get the benefit of such assumption of responsibility by the defendant.

The rules of the Master Car Builders' Association are a set of rules adopted by practically all of the railroad companies in the United States, providing, in the interchange of cars, for repairs made upon cars of one line when broken on the line of another company, and for the loss of or damage to such cars by fire or otherwise. Among these rules is the rule above quoted. The plaintiff was not a member of that association; possibly, having no railroad of its own upon which the cars of other companies might operate, it could not become a member; it did not sign any contract, or secure a contract from the defendant, entitling the plaintiff to the benefits of the Master Car Builders' rules.

The plaintiff relies upon the following circumstances to establish the same obligation on the part of the defendant to it as the defendant owed to members of the Master Car Builders' Association, in the matter of responsibility for the destruction of a car by fire, regardless of its culpability.

The plaintiff became dissatisfied with the handling of its goods in the refrigerator cars belonging to the railroad companies and certain transportation lines, and determined to lease or buy cars of its own. Accordingly the plaintiff in April, 1913, opened negotiations with the car accountant of the defendant, who wrote the plaintiff on April 28, 1913, that he could probably secure cars from a certain party in Chicago. In that letter the car accountant stated that the cars would be "handled under our tariffs" allowing compensation to the plaintiff at the rate of three-fourths of a cent per mile, loaded and empty, while in service. He also stated that, when it became necessary to repair the cars, the work would be done and bills rendered by the mechanical department of his road. Nothing was said in that letter to indicate that the rules of the Master Car Builders' Association would be binding upon the defendant or upon the plaintiff. Between April 27th and August 20th the plaintiff secured 10 refrigerator cars, and on the latter date so notified the car accountant. He replied on the 21st, stating that he had issued instructions permitting the cars to remain in service and added:

"I am inclosing herewith copy of our tariff, which governs the handling of refrigerator cars of private ownership, and by reference to page 19 you will note that we pay three-fourths cents per mile on loaded or empty movements, with the provision that any excess empty mileage, at the end of a fixed period of time, will be billed for at regular tariff rates. This applies to cars in service."

There is nothing in this letter to indicate that the rules of the Master Car Builders' Association would be binding upon either party. The president of the plaintiff company testified that when the cars were put in service the car accountant furnished the defendant (evidently meaning the plaintiff) with a copy of said rules; that repair bills were sent to the plaintiff every month, based upon the schedule set out in the Master Car Builders' rules, and were paid; that during the time the plaintiff owned the cars they were used by railroads all over the United States, for which he had received compensation from the various railroads using them; that after they were put in service the plaintiff had no further control over the cars, and they would be moved on various lines without plaintiff's consent or knowledge; that all cars tendered for traffic had to comply with the said rules; and that plaintiff was specifically notified by the car accountant that its cars must be in accordance with the Master Car Builders' rules, if he wished them operated over the line of the defendant or other roads.

The question whether or not the plaintiff's cars were received and were to be handled by the defendant under exactly the same terms and conditions as the cars of a regular railroad company, a member of the Master Car Builders' Association, is one of fact. The evidence offered by the plaintiff tends to support that theory, and therefore the motion of the defendant for a directed verdict was properly refused; but it does not necessarily establish that fact. The plaintiff nowhere testifies that there was an express agreement that all the terms of the Master Car Builders' rules should be applicable to his arrangement. He relies upon an inference from certain facts to establish that fact; that because he was furnished with the rules, that the repairs were made and paid for according to the rules, that his cars had to come up to the standard of the rules, it follows that there was no difference between him and any other transportation line owning cars used by the defendant. As a matter of law, we cannot say that this is true. The correspondence shows only a reference to the matter of repairs, and the furnishing of the rules might be deemed compatible with their limitation to this feature; so with the settlement of the repairs and the required equipment.

If the Master Car Builders' rule as to the responsibility for the destruction of the car should appear, upon a determination of the facts in issue, applicable to the relation existing between the parties, a further question, as to which we express no opinion, would arise, whether or not that rule would apply to a car not in service at the time of its destruction, under the tariff regulations specifically invoked and referred to in the correspondence as governing the situation.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

GOUGH v. TEXAS CO. (No. 10684.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

Corporations §308(11)—Whether agent was allowed 30 days after termination of agency, to make collections so as to be entitled to commissions, held for the jury.

In an action by a former agent of an oil company for commissions on collections made after termination of the agency, wherein it conclusively appeared that the written contract providing that commissions on uncollected accounts were forfeited was waived by an extension of time, the question whether the agent was given 15 or 30 days to make collections held for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chester County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by S. A. Gough against the Texas Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry & McLure, of Chester, for appellant.

Gaston & Hamilton, of Chester, for respondent.

FRASER, J. Prior to July 1, 1920, the plaintiff had been the agent of the defendant company at Chester, S. C. On June 30, 1920, the defendant sent to Chester Mr. Dority, its assistant superintendent, to check up the plaintiff's business and to install Mr. McGuire, the new agent. The plaintiff was working under a written contract that provided for sales on commissions. The contract provided that on the termination of the agency all commissions on uncollected accounts should be forfeited. When Mr. Dority completed the settlement, he told Mr. Gough, the plaintiff, that he would allow him commissions on all claims he collected prior to July 15th, and asked him to take the new agent around with him, and introduce him to the customers. The plaintiff agreed to continue his collections and carry the new agent, but said 15 days is not enough time in which to collect $4,000, in July, and claimed 30 days instead. It is not denied that the plaintiff, at his own expense of travel, in his own machine, did make the collections. The defendant tendered to the plaintiff pay for collections made prior to July 15th, but refused to pay commissions on claims that he collected after that day, and before the end of July. Mr. Dority, the assistant superintendent, states that he did not protest against the extension to 30 days, instead of 15, as he said it would have done no good to protest. At the close of the testimony the defendant moved for a directed verdict, on the ground that there was no evidence of a waiver of the offered extension of 15 days. This motion was refused.

There are several exceptions, but they raise but one question. The motion was properly refused. There is no question but that the written contract was waived. The only question is, Was it waived for 15 or 30 days? There was abundant evidence of a 30-day waiver to carry the case to the jury. The judgment is affirmed.

WINTHROP v. ALLEN. (No. 10698.)

1. Landlord and tenant §223(4)—Tenant's counterclaim in action for rent held to plead fraud, entitling him to punitive damages.

In a landlord's action for rent, tenant's counterclaim, alleging that landlord, in violation of his agreement not to disturb labor residing on land under landlord's control, but employed by tenant, "deliberately, and with the intention of doing injury to the defendant, willfully, and negligently moved about 20 negro laborers away, took a number from the fields of the defendant, and began working them in the fields of the plaintiff, thereby depriving defendant of the only possible means of harvesting his crop," held to entitle tenant to punitive damages on the ground of fraud.

2. Action §27(2)—Tenant's counterclaim held to state cause of action for tort, entitling him to punitive damages.

In a landlord's action for rent, defendant's counterclaim, alleging that landlord violated his agreement not to disturb labor residing on land under landlord's control, but employed by tenant, and "deliberately, and with the intention of doing injury to the defendant, willfully, and negligently moved about 20 negro laborers away, took a number from the fields of the defendant, and began working them in the fields of the plaintiff, thereby depriving defendant of the only possible means of harvesting his crop," held to state a cause of action in tort entitling tenant to punitive damages; the allegations as to the contract being merely preliminary to the action based on the tort.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by Frederick Winthrop against Paul N. Allen, in which defendant filed a counterclaim. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hugh O. Hanna and Geo. Warren, both of Hampton, for appellant.

J. W. Manuel, of Hampton, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record:

"This case was brought by the plaintiff to recover rent alleged to be due by the defendant to him, for certain real estate for the years 1913 and 1914. The defendant answered by general denial, and as a counterclaim alleged that during the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 the plaintiff willfully and negligently committed certain acts, resulting in damage to the defendant, and asked for a judgment of $25,000 by way of a counterclaim. At the close of the defendant's testimony, plaintiff made a motion for a directed verdict against the defendant, for the sum of $555.05; and the plaintiff also made a motion for a directed verdict, as to the defendant's claim for punitive damages, on the ground, to wit: that punitive damages cannot be awarded for the breach of a contract, unless fraud be both alleged and proved, and that there was no allegation of fraud in the counterclaim filed in this case. After hearing argument by counsel, the court ruled as follows: 'I refuse the motion for the direction of a verdict, in favor of the plaintiff for so many dollars. The question of punitive damages is eliminated. I am going to cut that out.'"

The charge of the presiding judge sufficiently states the case and pleadings.

Turning to the charge we find the following:

"The plaintiff alleges that for two years he rented to Mr. Paul Allen, the defendant, certain lands, and that there is a balance due him for rent of $555.05, which is still unpaid, and he asks for a judgment at your hands for that amount, $555.05.

"Mr. Allen, the defendant, comes in with his answer, and for a first defense he denies each and every allegation in the complaint of the plaintiff. He alleges that during the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, the plaintiff, through his agents, servants, and employees, acting under the express direction and within the scope of their employment, willfully, wantonly, carelessly, negligently, and with a total disregard to the rights of this defendant, broke his express agreement and contract with this defendant, to the effect that the labor then residing on certain lands in Hampton county, S. C., under the control of the plaintiff, and on the lands of the defendant, would not be disturbed by the plaintiff, but would be allowed to work the lands which Robert Winthrop had rented to the defendant, such contract and agreement being broken by the said plaintiff by having the said labor intimidated and coerced against working for the said defendant, and by having said laborers moved away and taken out of the crops of the defendant, then being raised by the said defendant, during the harvesting seasons of 1913 and 1914; that the plaintiff had expressly agreed to allow the defendant the privilege of employing said laborers, about 25 or 30 in number, during the year 1913, and had ratified this express agreement on several occasions.

"That the defendant during the year 1913 planted said lands, putting down large quantities of fertilizers on the said lands, amounting to about $450, and planting seeds costing about $100, at a cost to the defendant for labor and plows for the planting and cultivation, of about $800 or more; that at harvest time and at the time that cotton was to be picked, the plaintiff, notwithstanding his agreement not to do so, deliberately, and with the intention of doing injury to the defendant, willfully, and negligently moved about 20 negro laborers away, took a number from the fields of the defendant, and began working them in the fields of the plaintiff, thereby depriving defendant of the only possible means of harvesting his crop."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $555.05, and the defendant appealed.

The vital question in the case is raised by the following exception:

"His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that the law in this case does not allow punitive damages, and in refusing to submit the question of punitive damages to the jury: the error being that the counterclaim of defendant was based on an action ex delicto arising out of the contract, and in such an action the law does allow punitive damages, and the same should have been submitted to the jury."

[1] The first question we will consider is whether the allegations of the counterclaim were sufficient to entitle the defendant to punitive damages on the ground of fraud. The allegations of the counterclaim which we have italicized show that the plaintiff, not only committed a breach of the contract, by willfully invading the rights of the defendant, but likewise removed about 20 negro laborers from the fields of the defendant, for the purpose of financial benefit to himself. In 12 R. C. L. 229, we find the following, under the definition of fraud:

"Fraud assumes so many different hues and forms that courts are compelled to content themselves with comparatively few general rules for its discovery and defeat, and allow the facts and circumstances peculiar to each case to bear heavily on the conscience and judgment of the court or jury, in determining its presence or absence. While it has often been said that fraud cannot be precisely defined, the books contain many definitions, such as the unlawful appropriation of another's property by design."

See, also, Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407. These authorities render unnecessary the citation of others, in order to show error on the part of his honor the presiding judge.

[2] The next question that will be considered is whether the allegations of the counterclaim that the plaintiff willfully and wantonly invaded the rights of the defendant entitled him to punitive damages. The following definition of a tort is quoted with approval in Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407:

"The word 'tort' means nearly the same thing as * * * civil wrong. It denotes an injury inflicted otherwise than by mere breach of contract; or, to be more nicely accurate, a tort is one's disturbance of another in rights which the law has created, either in the absence of contract or in consequence of a relation which a contract had established between the parties."

It is true, the answer alleges that the plaintiff willfully, wantonly, carelessly, negligently, and with a total disregard of the rights of the defendant, broke his express agreement and contract with the defendant in the manner therein stated; but it also alleges a cause of action for damages arising ex delicto; the allegations as to the contract being merely preliminary to the action based on tort. Pickens v. Railway, 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 567; Hellams v. Tel. Co., 70 S. C. 83, 49 S. E. 12; Harrison v. Tel. Co., 71 S. C. 386, 51 S. E. 119; Cabe v. Ligon, 115 S. C. 430, 105 S. C. 739. We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities to sustain the generally recognized and well-settled principle that whenever the allegations of a complaint or counterclaim are sufficient to constitute an action ex delicto, and that it was committed willfully, wantonly, and with a total disregard of the injured party's rights, he would be entitled to punitive damages.

The respondent's attorneys argue that, while it is true punitive damages are recoverable for fraud in an action for damages arising ex contractu, the injured party is not entitled to punitive damages, in an act on where the tort is accompanied with willfulness or wantonness. They cite the following authorities to sustain this proposition: Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407; Prince v. Ins. Co., 77 S. C. 187, 57 S. E. 783; Givens v. Electric Co., 91 S. C. 417, 74 S. E. 1067; Donaldson v. Temple, 96 S. C. 240, 80 S. E. 437; Reaves v. Tel. Co., 110 S. C. 233, 96 S. E. 295. In the first-mentioned case this court, after stating that there were allegations in the complaint appropriate to an action for damages arising ex contractu, but also to an action of tort, committed with a fraudulent and malicious intent, used this language:

"Under the allegations of the complaint it was a fraudulent act on the part of the defendant when he intentionally disposed of the land as the owner thereof, knowing that it was conveyed to him by way of mortgage, and that it belonged to the plaintiff (but, of course, subject to the mortgage). The question, then, is presented whether, in an action arising out of a breach of contract, attended with a fraudulent act, the defendant is liable for exemplary damages. There is no doubt as to the general principle that in an action for breach of contract the motives of the wrongdoer are not to be considered in estimating the amount of damages, and that he is only liable for such damages as are the natural and proximate result of the wrongful act. When, however, the breach of the contract is accompanied with a fraudulent act, the rule is well settled, certainly in this state, that the defendant may be made to respond in punitive as well as compensatory damages."

The ruling of the court that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages was based upon the principle that fraud is a tort. No reference whatever was made to torts committed with willfulness or wantonness, for the reason that no such question was involved, and was not argued.

In the case of Prince v. Ins. Co., 77 S. C. 187, 57 S. E. 786, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the alleged failure of the defendant to issue to him a policy of insurance on his life. It was that, although the plaintiff had performed his part of the contract in full, the defendant refused to issue the policy, but instead willfully and wantonly attempted to compel plaintiff to accept another policy of insurance, by threatening plaintiff with imprisonment. The court said:

"The final question for consideration is whether or not punitive damages are recoverable in this case. * * * This is * * * an action on contract, and unless fraud is alleged and proved, punitive damages cannot be recovered for the breach. The general rule is thus stated in Sedgwick on Damages (8th Ed.) § 603: 'It may be considered to be established that the motives of the defendant in breaking his contract are to be disregarded, and consequently, exemplary damages are not recoverable.' In this state, however, in the early case of Rose v. Beattie, 2 N. & McC. 538, the doctrine was suggested that where a breach of contract is accompanied with a fraudulent act, punitive damages are recoverable, but not for a breach unaccompanied by fraud. This principle has been recently laid down as the law in the case of Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232. As no fraudulent act is here alleged, exemplary damages cannot be recovered."

In the said case the plaintiff alleged the failure and refusal of the defendant to comply with his part of the contract, and that in so doing he acted willfully and wantonly, but the plaintiff did not allege such facts as were sufficient to show willfulness or wantonness on the part of the defendant; furthermore it was stated in the opinion that the action was on contract. Mr. Chief Justice Pope, who delivered the opinion quoted from Sedgwick on Damages for the purpose of showing the marked difference between mere motive and acts accompanying the breach or a contract.

Even if the language we have quoted is susceptible of the interpretation that punitive damages are recoverable when there is a breach of contract accompanied with a fraudulent act, but that such damages cannot be recovered, when the tortious act is committed willfully or wantonly, then it is a mere dictum which is not to be followed.

In the case of Givens v. Electric Co., 91 S. C. 417, 74 S. E. 1067, the court uses this language:

"Evidence was admitted, over defendant's objection, to prove remote and speculative damages, the court holding that the complaint alleged a willful and wanton violation of the contract, which, if proved, would entitle plaintiff to punitive damages. This was error. Punitive damages are not recoverable for breach of contract, except where the breach was accompanied by an intent to defraud the other party to the contract. Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232. There is no allegation of fraud in this case. Therefore punitive damages are not recoverable, notwithstanding the allegation of a willful and wanton violation of the contract by the defendant."

In that case the action was for damages for breach of a contract. The only authority upon which Mr. Justice Hydrick relied to sustain the proposition announced by him is Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407, which we have already shown does not sustain his view. While there were allegations to the effect that the defendant willfully and wantonly broke the contract, no facts were alleged which were sufficient to constitute a tort.

We need not discuss the case of Donaldson v. Temple, 96 S. C. 240, 80 S. E. 437, as the ruling therein was based entirely upon the authority of Givens v. Electric Co., 91 S. C. 417, 74 S. E. 1067.

In Reaves v. Tel. Co., 110 S. C. 233, 96 S. E. 295, the only reference made by the court to the question under consideration is as follows:

"Nor is there any doubt of the rule that punitive damages are not recoverable for the mere breach of a private contract, in the absence of circumstances giving rise to a cause of action for fraud. Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407."

FLANAGAN v. GLENCOE COTTON MILLS. (No. 10702.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$  1177(7)—Where evidence not fully developed cause will be remanded for new trial.

In an action by the bookkeeper and director of a cotton mill to recover the balance of the bonus voted him with themselves by the directors, after his obligation to the corporation for the share purchased by him should be marked paid, evidence as to the corporate transactions, particularly the ratification of the directors' acts by a stockholders' meeting, held insufficient to permit a final judgment, so that the case should be remitted to the trial court for full showing as to the facts.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by C. A. Flanagan against the Glencoe Cotton Mills. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial, with directions.

Nettles & Tobias, and Weston & Aycock, all of Columbia, for appellant.

Nelson, Gettys & Mullins, and D. W. Robinson, all of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This evidence tends to show: That the plaintiff was the bookkeeper of the defendant mill. That the mill bought in the stock of one of its deceased stockholders at 50 cents on the dollar and resold it at par to some of the people who were in with the management of the mill. The defendant purchased 25 shares and gave his obligation to the mill for the purchase money. He was then made a director. The mill had not been making money, but it became prosperous and gave by way of bonus to its directors about $40,000. This gift was ordered by the directors. Subsequently a stockholders' meeting was had and the action of the directors was approved. These directors owned a large majority of the stock. The plaintiff was secretary of the board, but he did not send out any notices of a stockholders' meeting. We are left only to presume that the stockholders were duly notified. Plaintiff demanded that his obligation to the corporation be marked paid, and asked for judgment for the balance. Some, if not all, of the directors, who were voted a bonus, are said to have returned it; but there is no sufficient proof of it, or of any circumstances that rendered the payment of a bonus necessary or proper, or an indorsement of it by the corporation.

It would be manifestly unfair, on this partial and incompetent statement of facts, to make a final judgment. As the record now stands, it appears that the directors voted a bonus to each other, and then resolved themselves into a stockholders' meeting and approved the action. A bonus equal to 40 per cent. of the capital stock was given to the directors, with no explanation, except that they had the money. No authority sustains that. The plaintiff paid out a part of it as federal taxes; so there should be a full investigation, in order that complete justice may be done.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, that the case be sent back to the court of common pleas for a full showing as to the facts of the case, and an accounting by all who took part in the $40,000 bonus, and that all the directors be made parties hereto.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (concurring). Action in court of common pleas, Richland county, instituted April 7, 1920, for a balance of $5,838.42 appearing on the books of the defendant to be due to the plaintiff. The alleged indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff arose out of the following transactions: For several years prior to the year 1919, and up to and including the month of November of that year, the plaintiff was employed by the defendant as bookkeeper; he was also secretary of the corporation; he resigned in November, 1919; at the time his resignation took effect the books of account of the defendant, kept by the plaintiff, showed a balance to his credit of $5,838.42, as the plaintiff alleges, on account of plaintiff's salary as bookkeeper and a bonus paid to him by the corporation during the year 1919 and credited to his salary account. We assume that the plaintiff intended to allege that the bonus was voted to be paid, and not actually paid, but credited as stated. The complaint is in quite skeleton form, and is accompanied by no statement of account, the items of which make up the account, his salary, credits, payments, or the alleged bonus.

The defendant answered, denying any indebtedness to the plaintiff, setting up a counterclaim upon a note for $2,500, executed and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant on April 23, 1915, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, upon which payments had been made as follows: October 2, 1916, $250; October 9, 1918, $200; and November 2, 1918, $50—and demanding an accounting by the plaintiff by reason of the matter hereinafter set forth.

The facts connected with this controversy, which we understand are admitted without question, are as follows:

The plaintiff entered the employment of the defendant in 1914, and continued as its bookkeeper until some time in November, 1919; the salary began at $100 per month, raised to $125, later to $150, and during the year 1918 it was $300. Some time in 1915, the exact date is not clear, the corporation bought from the estate of George C. Moseley

$10,000 of its own stock at 50 cents on the dollar. This sum was in turn sold by the corporation to the plaintiff (bookkeeper), T. H. Wannamaker, Jr. (a director), R. C. Clayton (a director), and Miss Martin (stenographer), at par; these parties taking $2,500 each, and giving their notes severally therefor to the corporation. The plaintiff testified:

"And the dividends and special bonuses were credited on the stock [we assume he intended to say "the note"], and the last bonus in the early fall of 1919, of $900, which was the balance I owed, I was instructed to charge off."

On the 16th of January, 1919, possibly about the peak of industrial prosperity, succeeding a period of unexampled flood tide in manufacturing profits, the directors of the corporation, including T. H. Wannamaker, president, T. H. Wannamaker, Jr., vice president, R. C. Clayton, and the plaintiff, who had been elected a director shortly after his acquisition of the 25 shares, held a meeting, at which, as the minutes show:

"It was decided to call a meeting of the stockholders for the purpose of determining what bonus shall be appropriated to the several officers of the mill."

The reason for this action, if it can be so denominated, was thus expressed in the minutes:

"In view of the large profits of 1918, and because of the fact that all of the officers had been working on moderate salaries previous to this time, it was felt that they were entitled to a liberal share of the profits under these abnormal conditions."

Accordingly a meeting of the stockholders was held on January 23, 1919, at which the only stockholders present were the two Wannamakers, Clayton, and the plaintiff; the elder Wannamaker voting the stock of Miss Martin by proxy. The plaintiff testified that as secretary he did not send out to the stockholders notice of this meeting; that Wannamaker usually did this, but he did not know whether he did so on this occasion or not. At any rate, no stockholder was present except those who were interested in the proposition to vote bonuses to the officers. It does not appear that any resolution was adopted, or even proposed; the minutes simply containing this memorandum:

"The directors were authorized to pay the following bonus to the several officers of the mill for the year 1918:

T. H. Wannamaker.....	$15,000.00
T. H. Wannamaker, Jr.....	10,000.00
R. C. Clayton.....	7,500.00
C. A. Flanagan.....	7,500.00

"There being no further business the meeting adjourned."

It appeared that the plaintiff was admittedly entitled to certain credits upon the $2,500 note given by him to the corporation for the 25 shares of stock; the dates and amounts of said credits are set out in the answer and have been repeated in the foregoing statement. The amount which would have been due upon this note, after deducting the above admitted credits, has been liquidated by the allowance of certain bonuses to the plaintiff, which, however, appear to have been entered upon his account as credits upon the verbal direction of the president, without corporate action in reference thereto.

The amount of the bonus which the stockholders' meeting of January 23, 1919, authorized the directors to allow to the plaintiff, $7,500, was not actually paid, but passed as a credit to the plaintiff's salary account. Of it the plaintiff charged himself with certain items for income tax, paint, coal, and "perhaps other items," amounting to $1,661.58, which he drew out, leaving a claimed balance in favor of the plaintiff of $5,838.42, all of which is bonus money. This is the foundation of his claim.

The defendant's motion, severally, for nonsuit, directed verdict on the plaintiff's claim, and directed verdict on the defendant's counterclaim, were refused by the circuit judge. The case was submitted to the jury which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The defendant appeals.

The entire balance claimed by the plaintiff is necessarily a part of the $7,500 bonus allowed to him by the action of the directors and stockholders in the meeting of January 16, 1919, and January 23, 1919. It is apparent, therefore, that the plaintiff's alleged cause of action depends upon the validity of that action and upon the further question, assuming that such action was so far valid as to prevent the recovery of the money by the corporation in case it had actually been paid, whether, not having been actually paid, such action constitutes the basis of an action in favor of the plaintiff against the corporation.

Upon the first question suggested, the validity of the bonus allowance to the plaintiff: Two most salutary principles of corporate management are in obstruction: (1) The corporate assets belong to the stockholders; (2) the directors of a corporation are trustees for the stockholders. While the minutes of the directors' meeting of January 16, 1919, do not show a formal resolution of the board appropriating the bonuses, they do show a decision by the board that such action should be taken, and that for the purpose of a show of legality a stockholders' meeting be called, no date being fixed, to determine the amount of the allowances. At that meeting on January 23, 1919, to which it does not appear that any stockholder, other than the participants were invited, formal action appears to have been taken fixing the amount of allowances. The stockholders attending that meeting were the same who, as directors, had come to a decision on the 16th. Their action upon its face as stockholders was nothing more or less than their action as directors.

Considered as the action of the board of directors, the allowances were for services already performed and to the men selected as trustees of the corporation, and upon both grounds were without consideration and void. The attempted action of the stockholders' meeting was that of a majority of the stockholders, consisting alone of those who were the beneficiaries of the allowances. Majority stockholders cannot for selfish purposes act in hostility to the interests of the corporation, with the effect of defrauding nonassenting stockholders.

Even if it should be conceded that the stockholders had the power to vote this bonus, the circumstances under which that action was taken were not such as to receive the sanction of this court. The directors met, and without taking any formal action upon the matter, in which every one of them was personally interested, "decided" to call a stockholders' meeting to determine what bonus should be appropriated to the several officers of the mill, as if they had already "decided" the main question, and desired the action of the stockholders only in fixing the size of the melon that was to be cut. They took pains to spread upon the minutes the reasons for allowing the bonus, "the large profits of 1918," "moderate salaries," and "profits under these abnormal conditions." The stockholders, whose money was being appropriated to this generous purpose, and who had passed through the lean and hungry years since 1910 without dividends, were not consulted; it was not deemed necessary, we apprehend, to give them notice, as those who were to participate in the bonus had control of the corporation. The profits, abnormal though they may have been, belonged to the stockholders, and it seems only fair that, when their property to the extent of $40,000, 40 per cent. of the capital stock, was to be donated, they were entitled at least to be consulted.

A further consideration is conclusive of the issue in the case. The bonus was a gift, in violation of the trust imposed upon the directors, either in their capacity of directors or in the swift change to stockholders; it was never paid, and at best amounts to no more than a promise to pay. Being without consideration and void, it cannot form the basis of an executory contract. Pitts v. Mangum, 2 Bailey, 588; Bennett v. Cook, 28 S. C. 353, 6 S. E. 28.

The judgment of this court should be that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed; that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial; that upon said new trial the defendant be allowed judgment against the plaintiff for the amount due on the $2,500 note, less the credits admitted in the complaint; that the defendant be allowed, if so advised, to amend its answer, setting up an additional counterclaim for the $1,661.58 admitted by the plaintiff to have been received out of the $7,500 bonus.

SEACOAST PACKING CO. v. LONG.
(No. 10704.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Evidence ~~§~~44(9) — Written subscription contract cannot be varied by parol.

A written subscription to corporate stock cannot be varied by proof of a parol contract made by the parties soliciting the subscription.

2. Corporations ~~§~~90(5)—In action on stock subscription, allegation as to parol agreement and fraudulent representations of solicitors held not to state a defense.

In an action on a stock subscription, allegations that parties soliciting the subscription made a certain parol contract and made fraudulent representations do not state a defense where nothing is alleged to show any connection between the corporation and those soliciting the subscription.

3. Corporations ~~§~~90(1)—Stock subscription enforceable, though made before organization.

It is not a defense to an action on a stock subscription that the subscription was made before the corporation had come into existence as bona fide subscription to the capital stock is a condition precedent to the formation of the corporation.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Beaufort County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by the Seacoast Packing Company against R. A. Long. From an order striking out certain defenses as sham, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Randolph Merdaugh, of Hampton, for appellant.

W. J. Thomas, of Beaufort, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The complaint alleges that the defendant, along with others, subscribed in writing for five shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation at a par value of $100 per share and had failed to comply with the terms of the subscription.

The defendant, for a second defense, alleges a failure of the plaintiff to comply with a certain parol contract made by "the parties soliciting his subscription," and that the representations were fraudulently made. The third defense was that the subscription was made before the corporation had come into existence. On motion these defenses were stricken out as sham. From this order this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] I. Inasmuch as a written contract cannot be varied by parol, and nothing was alleged to show any connection between the corporation and "those who solicited the subscription, this defense could be stricken out 'without argument.'"

[3] II. Inasmuch as bona fide subscription to the capital stock is a condition precedent to the formation of a corporation, this defense also fails "without argument."

The exceptions are overruled, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). Action to recover an unpaid subscription of $500 to the capital stock of a proposed corporation. The defendant admitted making the subscription, but alleged as defenses to the action, that he made the subscription upon the representation of the parties soliciting subscriptions: (1) That the corporation would not be formed until the whole amount of the proposed capital stock, $150,000, had been subscribed for by bona fide subscribers; (2) and upon the further representation by said parties that two of the subscribers had covenanted and agreed to underwrite $50,000 of the subscriptions; and (3) upon the further assurance that the business to be conducted by the corporation was the operation of a packing plant; (4) that the whole amount of the proposed capital stock has not been subscribed for; that the representation as to the underwriting of $50,000 thereof was false; that the corporation has contracted to go into other business in addition to the operation of a packing plant; (5) that he would not have made the subscription but for the foregoing representations, and that by reason of the false and fraudulent character thereof there has been a failure of consideration in his subscription, that the same is of no force and effect, and that he had been relieved of all liability thereon; (6) that the subscription was made to a company which was not in existence at the time it was given and was without consideration.

Upon motion of plaintiff's attorney the circuit judge passed an order striking out as frivolous, sham, and irrelevant the foregoing defenses, "except any allegations of fraud and misrepresentation therein contained."

There is, of course, no merit in the defense numbered (6) in the above enumeration. The corporation cannot be formed until the requisite subscriptions have been made, which are necessarily valid before the actual existence of the corporation takes place.

Should there be any merit in the other defenses, the other should be reversed as utterly incapable of execution. To strike out all of the allegations of fact constituting the fraudulent misrepresentation and leave only the bald allegation of fraud and misrepresentation, would render that which was left without supporting allegations. Should there be no merit in these defenses, the whole of them, including the allegations of fraud and misrepresentations, should have been stricken.

The several defenses above outlined, with the exception of the sixth, which upon its face is untenable, will now be considered.

The first defense in the enumeration adopted herein is based upon the alleged false representation that the entire capital stock of $150,000 would be subscribed before the corporation would be formed. This is a perfectly valid condition to a subscription, a prudent provision, which a subscriber who puts his money into a proposed venture has the unquestionable right to insist upon, taking the very sensible position that, while he may be willing to risk his money in an enterprise organized with sufficient capital to meet the demands of the business, he is not willing to be foster father to a cripple. This, however, is not the misrepresentation of a fact, but rather an assurance of the policy of the corporation, a condition which the subscriber has the right to impose, but which, to become effectual, must be in writing and a part of the original subscription. A subscription to stock is a contract, and when evidenced in writing, is subject to the same rule as to parol evidence that all other contracts are subject to.

"Under the general rule of evidence that a written agreement cannot be varied or added to by parol evidence, it is not competent for a subscriber to stock to allege that he is but a conditional subscriber. The condition must be inserted in the writing in order to be effectual." 1 Cook on Corp. (6th Ed.) § 81.

If, therefore, the defendant may not be able to establish this condition attached to his subscription, in the manner provided by law, he cannot claim the benefit of it. That is a matter, however, that may arise upon the trial of the case; it is no ground for striking out the defense as frivolous, sham, and irrelevant. If it be valid defense, when properly established it cannot be thus characterized. In the case of Groce v. Jenkins, 28 S. C. 172, 5 S. E. 352, the court holds that it is not necessary to allege in the complaint that an agreement as to lands, sought to be enforced, was in writing; that is a matter of proof not pleading under the statute of frauds. By analogy, it is not necessary to allege that the representation was in writing and a physical part of the contract of subscription; that is a matter of defense, one of evidence, and not pleading. The question of the authority of the promoters to bind the corporation by assurances or representations is discussed in reference to the second defense.

The second defense is based upon the alleged false representation that two of the subscribers, presumably men of means, had covenanted and agreed to underwrite $50,000 of the subscriptions. This representation differs very materially from the provision or assurance referred to above in the discussion of the first defense. To state that Mr. Richardson and Mr. Christensen had so agreed is the statement of a fact, not a promise or an assurance; a most persuasive, inducing argument in securing the defendant's subscription, particularly in view of the previously discussed assurance in reference to the subscriptions to the entire capital stock. If, as we must assume from the allegations of the complaint, the defendant would not have subscribed but for this representation, and it was false, the defense was good, and should not have been stricken out.

It is suggested that the complaint does not show any connection between the corporation and those who made the representation. It must be remembered that the corporation had not at that time been created; there was no one in a position to speak for it except the promoters. If the corporation seeks to take advantage of the canvassing work of these promoters, it cannot accept the benefits without the burdens.

In 1 Cook on Corp. (6th Ed.) § 104, it is said:

"The well-established rule now is that a corporation cannot claim or retain the benefit of a subscription which has been obtained through the fraud of its agents. The misrepresentations are not regarded as having actually been made by the corporation, but the corporation is not allowed to retain the benefit of the contract growing out of them, being liable to the extent that it has profited by such misrepresentations. The question of the authority of the agent taking the subscription is immaterial herein. It matters not whether he had any authority, or exceeded his authority, or concealed its limitations. The corporation cannot claim the benefits of his fraud without assuming also the representations which procured those benefits. Parol evidence is admissible to show the fraud, since it does not vary or contradict the contract, but shows that no contract was legally entered into."

It was therefore error in the circuit judge to strike out the defense.

The third defense is based upon the alleged false representation that the business to be conducted by the corporation was the operation of a packing plant. This statement or promise or assurance is ruled by the observations made in connection with the first defense.

The judgment of this court should be that the order appealed from is reversed.

CITIZENS' & SOUTHERN BANK et al. v. STATE et al. (No. 2305.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Taxation ⚡590—In suit to enforce liability of persons diverting trust funds, joinder of state and county not misjoinder.

The petition is not demurrable upon the ground of misjoinder of parties.

2. Action ⚡50(10)—Pleading ⚡21—Petition to enforce liability of parties diverting funds of bank not duplicitous or inconsistent.

The petition is not duplicitous or inconsistent.

3. Taxation ⚡572, 584—Taxes not "debt" collectible by suit; suit held not one for collection of taxes.

Taxes are not a "debt" within the usual meaning of that word, and cannot be collected in a suit at law, in the absence of express statutory authority. Properly construed, the petition is not one having for its purpose the collection of taxes by a suit at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Debt.]

4. Taxation ⚡584—Trusts ⚡348, 359(2)—Trustees misapplying assets and persons assisting them accountable to persons injured; equitable petition will lie to recover misapplied trust funds; suit in equity maintainable against persons misapplying funds of bank without paying taxes.

Where funds in the nature of trust funds are misapplied by persons acting in the character of trustees, they, and all persons aiding and assisting in the misapplication of such assets with knowledge of such misapplication, are accountable to the person injured for such misappropriation, and an equitable petition will lie in behalf of such injured person to recover such misapplied trust funds.

5. Demurrer properly overruled.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Suit by the State of Georgia and another against the Citizens' & Southern Bank and others. Demurrers to the petition were overruled, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The petition of the state of Georgia and the county of Chatham alleged in substance as follows: On or about December 30, 1918, the directors of the Merchants' National Bank of Savannah entered into a tentative agreement with the Citizens' & Southern Bank, a corporation of this state, for the liquidation of the affairs of the first-named bank. A meeting of stockholders of the Merchants' National Bank was held on January 14, 1919, at which were present and represented, either in person or by proxy, shareholders owning two-thirds of the capital stock. Joseph Hull and others were elected as directors. The directors elected V. B. Jenkins as cashier. A resolution was adopted authorizing and directing the liquidation of the affairs of the Merchants' National Bank through the Citizens' & Southern Bank; and V. B. Jenkins was elected liquidating agent. By virtue of this resolution all the assets of the bank became a trust fund in the hands of the directors of that bank, primarily for the purpose of the payment of its debts, and then for the purpose of distribution among its stockholders. The tentative agreement of December 30, 1918, for liquidation of the Merchants' National Bank was ratified by its stockholders and by its directors on January 14, 1919. Plaintiffs are advised and believe that under the terms of the agreement the price to be paid to the stockholders by the Citizens' & Southern Bank for their shares of stock was $140 per share. In pursuance of this agreement the Citizens' & Southern Bank paid to the directors of the Merchants' National Bank the sum of $700,000, or other large sum, which sum became a fund primarily for the purpose of paying the debts of the Merchants' National Bank, and the amount remaining after the payment of its debts was to be distributed among its shareholders. The assets of the Merchants' National Bank had not been distributed on January 1, 1919, and were intact. On that date the state and county taxes due on the stock of the Merchants' National Bank for the year 1919 became due and payable. On April 16, 1919, V. B. Jenkins, as cashier of the Merchants' National Bank, made returns for its state and county taxes for the year 1919 of 5,000 shares of stock of the stated value of $434,000. The fund arising from the sale of the assets of the Merchants' National Bank so paid by the Citizens' & Southern Bank became a trust fund, first, for the purpose of paying the debts of the bank, next for the purpose of distribution among its stockholders, and the Citizens' & Southern Bank became a trustee of such fund for that purpose. The fund arising from the sale of the assets of the Merchants' National Bank also became a trust fund in the hands of V. B. Jenkins, liquidating agent, primarily for the purpose of paying the debts of the bank, and afterwards for distribution among its stockholders. All the assets of the Merchants' National Bank have been distributed by the Citizens' & Southern Bank, the directors of the Merchants' National Bank, and V. B. Jenkins, as liquidating agent, to the stockholders of the Merchants' National Bank, leaving unpaid the taxes due the state of Georgia and the county of Chatham. The Citizens' & Southern Bank and the directors and the liquidating agent, not regarding their duty in the premises as trustees, have failed to pay such taxes. The amount due the state and county for taxes for the year 1919 by the Merchants' National Bank on its shares of stock is $8,193.92, besides interest from December 20, 1919, and the cost for issuing the tax execution. The defendants have been stubbornly litigious and have caused plaintiffs unnecessary trouble and expense in the collection of the tax fi. fas., and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover of the defendants reasonable attorney's fees and expenses of litigation. The plaintiffs file this petition in behalf of themselves and such other creditors of the Merchants' National Bank as may intervene; and they pray judgment against the Citizens' & Southern Bank and the directors of the Merchants' National Bank (naming them), and against V. B. Jenkins as liquidating agent, for the sum of $8,193.92, besides interest, cost, expenses, and attorneys fees incurred in bringing this suit. There is also a prayer that the Citizens' & Southern Bank answer, not under oath, what sum of money it agreed to pay to the Merchants' National Bank for its assets, and that the directors be required to answer what amount of money the Citizens' & Southern Bank agreed to pay the Merchants' National Bank for the sale of its assets, and on what date the first payment was made and the amount thereof; also that V. B. Jenkins, liquidating agent, be required to answer what dividends were paid to the stockholders and the dates of payment, and what payments were made to him as liquidating agent by the Citizens' & Southern Bank for the assets of the Merchants' National Bank, and on what date the first payment of the same was made.

The defendants demurred to the petition, because: (1) There is a misjoinder as to plaintiffs, in that the declaration joins as plaintiffs the state of Georgia and the county of Chatham, which parties have not a joint interest and whose demands are separate. (2) There is a misjoinder of causes of action, in that the declaration attempts to join two separate demands and to enforce by one proceeding distinct and separate claims. (3) The declaration joins two distinct claims of two distinct plaintiffs as a joint claim, and asserts a liability for the aggregate. (4) The declaration is duplicitous and contradictory and is not consistent, in that it undertakes to proceed against the Citizens' & Southern Bank as a trustee for the fund involved, and against the directors as trustees, and against V. B. Jenkins, liquidating agent, as trustee, charging these three separate defendants as alleged trustees, and charging each separately. (5) No cause of action is set forth in the declaration against the defendants or any of them. (6) The state of Georgia, suing to recover an alleged tax claim, has no right to maintain the suit. (7) The county of Chatham, suing to recover an alleged tax claim, has no right to maintain the suit. The other grounds of the demurrer state in different ways a general demurrer. The court overruled the demurrer, and the defendants excepted.

Adams & Adams, of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error.

Geo. W. Owens, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. The first three grounds of the demurrer raise the contention that the petition is demurrable because of misjoinder of parties, in that the declaration attempts to join separate demands and to enforce by one proceeding distinct and separate claims. It is argued that the state of Georgia and the county of Chatham are distinct plaintiffs, and that a suit for a demand due to the county cannot be maintained by the state of Georgia, and vice versa; that different tax amounts are due and the claims are separate and distinct. We think that this contention is without merit. The petition shows that but one execution was issued for the tax, in a stated amount, and this included taxes due both to the state and to the county. Executions for nonpayment of taxes against persons who are not required to pay to the treasurer are issuable by the tax collector of their respective counties as soon as the last day for payment has passed. Civil Code 1910, § 1151. The Code also provides that the several tax collectors of this state shall keep a stub book of tax receipts, and enter on the receipt and the stub attached thereto the name of each taxpayer in their respective counties, the amount of taxes assessed against him, and itemize the same, stating the amount due the state, county, poll tax, or any other professional or special tax. Civil Code 1910, § 1228. It will thus be seen that the tax collector is the collector for both the state and county, only one tax fi. fa. is issued for both, and the defendants are the same, and their liability to the state is the same as their liability to the county, except as to the amount owing to each, which depends on the difference in rates of taxation. The county is a part of the political subdivision of the state. It would be useless, therefore, to issue two fi. fas. against the same defendants and levy them upon the same property, and the law will not require a useless thing to be done.

[2] 2. The petition is also demurred to on the ground that it is duplicitous and contradictory. We think that this ground of the demurrer is also without merit. The suit is brought against the directors of the Merchants' National Bank and its agent, who delivered the property, and the Citizens' & Southern Bank, which received it. All of the defendants were parties to the transaction of the purchase and sale and to the liquidation of the Merchants' National Bank. They all had a common purpose, and it cannot be held that an action brought against all three is inconsistent. First National Bank of Sparta v. Wiley, 150 Ga. 759, 105 S. E. 308. And see Morrison v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 150 Ga. 54, 102 S. E. 354.

[3, 4] 3. The other grounds of the demurrer are merely general demurrers stated in different ways. It is insisted by the plaintiffs in error that the state of Georgia and the county of Chatham sued to recover an alleged tax claim, and have no right to maintain the suit. It is argued that the petition means that the two plaintiffs are creditors of the Merchants' National Bank, that their claims are "debts," and that they have no right to a judgment as creditors asserting "debts." Properly construed, we do not think that the petition is open to this criticism. The petition has not for its purpose the collection of taxes as such, but it seeks to hold the defendants, who have acted, not technically as trustees, but in a trust relation with reference to certain funds, liable for the diversion of such funds, which should have been applied by them in good conscience to the payment of taxes due the state and county on property which had been sold and the funds misapplied by them. It is unquestionably true that according to the weight of authority taxes are not a "debt" within the usual meaning of that word; but there is authority holding that a tax is a debt. State of N. C. v. Georgia Co., 112 N. C. 34, 17 S. E. 10, 19 L. R. A. 485; 7 Ann. Cas. 22; Albany County v. Durant, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 182; People v. Weber, 164 Ill. 412, 45 N. E. 723; McInerny v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410; United States v. Pacific R. Co., 4 Dillon, 66, Fed. Cas. No. 15,983; State v. Duncan, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 679. The petition in the present case, properly construed, cannot be regarded as a suit at law to collect taxes as a debt of an individual taxpayer. The plaintiffs here are not creditors in the ordinary sense, and their claims are not debts. State v. S. W. R., 70 Ga. 11 (8), 13, 33; Georgia R. Co. v. Wright, 124 Ga. 596, 621, 53 S. E. 251. Taxes in this state cannot be collected by a suit at law, in the absence of express statutory provision. Id. See DuBignon v. Brunswick, 106 Ga. 317, 325, 32 S. E. 102; State v. W. & A. R. Co., 136 Ga. 619 (2), 626, 627, 71 S. E. 1055. The present is not a suit at law to collect taxes as such, but is a proceeding, alleging that the directors of two corporations and the cashier of one of them agreed to the liquidation of one of the corporations, and the agent of one, under agreement, did bring about the liquidation, received and paid out all of the proceeds from the sale, and failed and refused to pay the taxes upon property which had been returned, which taxes were due by the bank which went into liquidation; and the present proceeding was instituted to recover of these defendants the amount which is due by the selling corporation for taxes on account of the misappropriation of the funds arising from the sale of the assets of the bank which went into liquidation under the agreement as stated in the petition. There is nothing in the petition to show that any real estate was sold by the selling corporation. In Atlanta Real Estate Co. v. Atlanta National Bank, 75 Ga. 40, it was held that—

"The directors and managers of a corporation who control and have charge of its effects, are trustees for the stockholders, and both they and others who, with knowledge of their misappropriation, aid them in diverting its property, would be liable to the injured parties."

In the opinion in that case it was said:

"That such of the defendants as control the corporation or had charge of its effects are trustees for the stockholders is a proposition too well established to be denied, * * * and * * * both they and others who, with a knowledge of their misappropriation, aided them in diverting its property, would be liable to the injured parties, is an equally well settled principle."

In the instant case it appears that the Merchants' National Bank on April 16, 1919, returned its property for state and county taxes for that year to the amount of $484,000. The taxes amounted to $8,193.92, and this amount was not paid, but, in the language of the learned trial judge, they "ought in law and good conscience to have been paid." The consideration of the selling bank, $700,000, having passed into the hands of the Citizens' & Southern Bank, cannot be levied on by the sheriff. This is a case where funds in the nature of trust funds were misapplied, and which calls for the aid of a court of equity. Without it the plaintiffs are remediless. Civil Code 1910, § 3784, declares:

"All persons aiding and assisting trustees of any character [italics ours], with a knowledge of their misconduct, in misapplying assets, are directly accountable to the persons injured."

The property of the liquidating bank having been disposed of by the two banks and their agent, no property of the Merchants' National Bank could be found upon which to levy the fi. fa.; the assets turned over to the plaintiff in error being in money. Nor could a writ of garnishment avail; for the answer would necessarily be, under the allegations of the petition, that there is no property, it having been paid out to the stockholders of the Merchants' National Bank; and it is manifest that mandamus would not lie. For every right there is a remedy; and while, as already stated, the suit cannot be maintained as one at law to collect taxes, yet, under the facts alleged in the petition, a court of equity will require the defendants, who are essentially trustees of the property misapplied, and who have misappropriated the funds of the selling bank, a part of which should have gone to the payment of these taxes, to respond to the injured party in a sum equal to the amount misappropriated. See, in this connection, Anderson v. Adams, 117 Ga. 919, 43 S. E. 982; Morrison v. Fidelity, etc., Co., supra. There is no question of the fact that the amount of taxes claimed by the state and county is due and unpaid. But learned counsel for plaintiffs in error argues that the remedy by execution is exclusive, and that this necessarily inhibits every other form of procedure by the state and county. A number of cases are cited in support of this contention, viz.: Marye v. Diggs, 98 Va. 749, 37 S. E. 515, 51 L. R. A. 902; Gatling v. Commissioners, 92 N. C. 536, 53 Am. Rep. 434; Johnson v. Howard, 41 Vt. 122, 98 Am. Dec. 568; Bradford v. Storey, 189 Mass. 104, 75 N. E. 256, 257; City of Rochester v. Bloss, 185 N. Y. 42, 77 N. E. 794, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 694, 7 Ann. Cas. 15; Marion County v. Woodburn Mercantile Co., 60 Or. 367, 119 Pac. 487, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730; Louisville Water Co. v. Com., 89 Ky. 244, 12 S. W. 300, 6 L. R. A. 69; Baldwin v. Hewitt, 88 Ky. 673, 11 S. W. 803, 805; First National Bank v. Fancher, 48 N. Y. 524.

There are two lines of decision on this question, some of them holding in accordance with the above view. But, on the other hand, there are decisions holding that a remedy created by statute for the collection of taxes, unless the statute expressly makes it so, is not exclusive of all others. See note to case of Grell Bros. Co. v. Montgomery, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 738, 741, citing U. S. v. Chamberlin, 219 U. S. 250, 81 Sup. Ct. 155, 55 L. Ed. 204, reversing 156 Fed. 881, 84 C. C. A. 461, 13 Ann. Cas. 721. See, also, State v. New York Life Ins. Co., 119 Ark. 314, 171 S. W. 871, 173 S. W. 1099. Compare Preston v. Sturgis Mill Co., 183 Fed. 1, 105 C. C. A. 293, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1026; Succession of Mercier, 42 La. Ann. 1135, 8 South. 732, 11 L. R. A. 817; Post v. Taylor County, 2 Flip. 518, Fed. Cas. No. 11,302; Garrett v. Memphis (C. C.) 5 Fed. 870. Our own statute does not expressly make the remedy by execution exclusive. In the Chamberlain Case, supra, Mr. Justice Hughes, delivering the opinion of the court, said that an action would lie on behalf of the United States under a statute which "creates an obligation to pay the tax, and does not provide an exclusive remedy." And see Darnell v. State, 174 Ind. 143, 90 N. E. 769. Cooley on Tax. (3 Ed.) 17, states both rules as follows:

"It sometimes becomes a question whether a tax can be regarded as a debt in the ordinary sense of that term, so that the ordinary remedies for the collection of debts can be applied to it. In general it will be found that statutes imposing taxes make special provision for their collection, and do not apparently contemplate that any others will be necessary; but these may, nevertheless, fail; and the question then arises whether the tax must fail also, or whether resort may be had by the state to such remedies as would be available to individuals to enforce demands owing to themselves. But instances have occurred of tax laws which provided for laying the tax, but made no provision whatever for collection. In such case it may well be held that the Legislature contemplated the enforcement of the tax by the ordinary remedies; and therefore, if the tax was assessed against an individual, that assumpsit or debt would lie for the recovery thereof. The same reasoning would support a proceeding in equity to enforce a lien for the tax when assessed, not against an individual, but against property; and some courts have gone so far as to hold that the imposition and assessment of a tax create a legal obligation to pay, upon which the law will raise an assumpsit, although the statute has given a special remedy. But in general the conclusion has been reached that, when the statute undertakes to provide remedies, and those given do not embrace an action at law, a common-law action for the recovery of the tax as a debt will not lie."

The remedy by execution is obviously not an adequate one in a case like the present; nor is garnishment or mandamus an adequate remedy. Section 1151 of the Civil Code of 1910 is as follows:

"Executions for nonpayment of taxes, against persons who are not required to pay to the treasurer, are issued by the tax collectors of their respective counties as soon as the last day for payment has arrived, and must be directed to all and singular the sheriffs and constables of this state."

The Legislature surely did not intend, by the passage of the act authorizing the collection of taxes by execution, to foreclose the state and county in a case like the present, from collecting trust funds misapplied, where state and county taxes are admitted to be due and are withheld. Equity is the correction of that wherein the law by reason of its universality is deficient. The remedy by execution in the instant case is obviously deficient. There is no property of the Merchants' National Bank which can be reached by execution or garnishment, but there was trust property in the hands of the defendants which has been misapplied and which can and ought in good conscience to be recovered of them by a court of equity for the party injured. In 26 R. C. L., § 339, it is said:

"In states in which an action at law may be maintained for the collection of a tax, whether by virtue of statutory authority or otherwise, it is generally held that a court of equity will aid in the collection of a tax when the remedy at law proves inadequate"

—citing State v. Georgia Co., supra, which was a civil action in the nature of a creditors' bill, brought by the state of North Carolina and county of Guilford for the appointment of a receiver for the defendant corporation, to collect its assets and pay its debts. "It stands on complaint and demurrer." In delivering the opinion of the court, Clark, J., said, in part:

"The imposition of a tax clearly implies the intention to collect. If the plaintiffs cannot bring a creditor's suit, they cannot prove their claims in a suit brought by another, and would thus be compelled to stand idle and see a private creditor, or even a stockholder, bring suit and absorb the entire assets of the delinquent corporation. Thus the sovereign would be placed beneath the subject, the creator below the corporation of its own creation. The principle that the absence of an adequate statutory remedy preserves the right of action is recognized by all the authorities. Gatling v. Commissioners [92 N. O. 536]; Cooley on Taxation, p. 13, note and cases therein cited.

"Moreover, throughout all the authorities a clear distinction seems to run between the cases where a private plaintiff brings an action to compel and levy the collection of taxes to pay a debt due him and where the sovereign seeks to collect its own taxes for the general purposes of government. The citizen has only such remedies as are given to him; the state has inherently all remedies not voluntarily and unequivocally relinquished. * * * If this was a creditors' bill by private individuals seeking to collect a debt of $60,000 against a debtor who had fraudulently removed his assets out of the state, they would be entitled to the present remedy for the appointment of a receiver. * * * If private individuals under these circumstances can have a receiver appointed, the state and county have a remedy at least as broad. The day has gone by in North Carolina when men by uniting themselves in a corporation can obtain exemption from taxation which they could not claim as individuals. Const. art. 5, § 3. Neither can corporations now claim to be exempt, in the enforcement of the collection of taxes, from any process which would lie in favor of or against individuals for the collection of taxes or other debts. Indeed, the debt due the state for taxes is a preferred debt. It is expressly recognized as a debt, and preferred by the statute for the settlement of estates of deceased persons (Code, § 1416) and in bankruptcy proceedings. It also has the distinction that neither the homestead nor offsets can be claimed against it. In all this there is evidence that public policy provides not a lesser, but a broader, remedy for the collection of taxes than for other indebtedness. When there is property subject to levy, taxes are collectible usually in that mode. But when the property has been spirited away the state does not necessarily lose its debt, but has at least the same remedies for its collection as are given to its humblest citizens. It is hardly necessary to note that this is not a proceeding to assess the defendant for taxation. That has been done in the appropriate forum, the amount due has been adjudged, and the defendant has acquiesced by abandoning any appeal therefrom. The present proceeding is to enforce collection of the taxes so adjudged due, by proceedings which would be open to any one else against a debtor who had removed all his property from the jurisdiction of the court."

In view of our own statutes and laws on this and kindred subjects, the reasoning of Judge Clark is peculiarly appropriate to the present case. Our Code declares that—"In the payment of the debts of a decedent, they shall rank in priority in the following order: * * * Unpaid taxes or other debts due to the state or United States." Civ. Code 1910, § 4000.

And while it is true that under our decisions taxes may not be a "debt" within the strict meaning of that word, yet, so far as we are aware, this court has not gone further than to hold that an action at law will not lie in this state to collect taxes as a debt; and it has not held, where an adequate remedy is not provided by statute, that equity will not assume jurisdiction in aid of the statute to collect trust funds which have been misappropriated and which should be collected and applied to taxes due the state and county.

[5] In the view we take of this case the petition sets out an equitable cause of action, and the court below did not err in overruling the demurrer.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. BROOKS.
(No. 11707.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. July 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Suit held barred by limitations.

"Where a suit to recover damages for the homicide of an employee of a railway company is brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), by the administratrix of the deceased employee, the action is barred by the statute of limitations where it was commenced more than two years after the date of the homicide sued for, but within two years from the date of the appointment of the administratrix."

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; D. W. Blair, Judge.

Action by Eugenia Brooks, administratrix, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed in conformity to answers of the Supreme Court (107 S. E. 878) to certified questions.

Randolph & Parker and S. F. Parham, all of Atlanta, and J. Glenn Giles, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

J. Caleb Clarke, and Westmoreland & Smith, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. On March, 31, 1917, Mrs. Eugenia Brooks as the administratrix of R. B. Brooks, filed suit against the Seaboard Air Line Railway, alleging in part that R. B. Brooks was her son; that while in the employ of defendant and engaged in interstate commerce he was killed by the negligence of the defendant, that he was unmarried and that at the time of his death, May 14, 1913, she was dependent upon him for support. The defendant filed a demurrer as follows:

"First. Said petition sets forth no cause of action against this defendant. Second. Because said petition shows that R. B. Brooks died on May 14, 1913, and that therefore the cause of action, if any ever existed against this defendant, is barred by the statute of limitations, and because, by the act of Congress commonly known as the federal Employers' Liability Act, upon which said suit is based, viz. that act of Congress of April 22, 1908, it is provided 'that no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued,' and it appears from the allegations of the petition that more than two years have elapsed from the time the cause of action accrued, to wit, the date of the death of said R. B. Brooks, before the filing of plaintiff's suit, said suit being filed in the clerk's office of this honorable court on the 31st day of March, 1917."

The trial judge overruled the demurrer, and the defendant excepted. This court certified to the Supreme Court the following question:

"Where a suit to recover damages for the homicide of an employee of a railway company is brought, under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. § 8662) by the administrator of the estate of the deceased employee, is the action barred by the statute of limitations where it was commenced more than two years after the date of the homicide sued for, but within two years from the date of the appointment of the administrator?"

The headnote above is the answer of the Supreme Court. The full opinion of that court will be found in 107 S. E. 878.

Under this ruling the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the demurrer, and the judgment must be reversed.

CITY OF WARRENTON v. BRADSHAW.
(No. 12183.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Municipal corporations §176(5), 183(4)—Allegation that salary of marshal was fixed at certain amount must be proved, when denied; statute prohibiting change of salary during term repealed as to marshal.

The court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; R. N. Hardeman, Judge.

Action by T. B. Bradshaw against the City of Warrenton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

L. D. McGregor, of Warrenton, for plaintiff in error.

R. W. Ware and M. L. Felts, both of Warrenton, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. T. B. Bradshaw sued the city of Warrenton for $226.64, which he insisted was due him as his salary as marshal of the city from February 15 to April 23, 1920, at $100 per month. The second and third paragraphs of his petition are as follows:

"Second. Petitioner alleges that on the — day of October, 1919, he was duly elected marshal of said city for a period of one year, by the qualified voters of said city of Warrenton, Ga.

"Third. Petitioner alleges that the salary for the marshal of the city of Warrenton, Ga., was fixed by the mayor and councilmen of said city at twelve hundred dollars ($1,200.00) a year, or $100.00 a month for twelve months."

In its plea the city denied these paragraphs. On the trial the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, and the city excepted.

Paragraph 3 of the petition, which is quoted above, was distinctly answered and expressly denied by the plea of the defendant. This denial required proof of the allegation that the salary of the marshal was fixed by the mayor and council (called in the charter "commissioners") at "$1,200.00 a year, or $100.00 per month for twelve months." The record does not show that any such proof was made. Extracts from the minutes of the city council were introduced, which showed that on October 30, 1919, the election of Bradshaw as marshal was formally declared by the commissioners; that on December 15, 1919, his salary as marshal was fixed at "$100 for the period from December 15, 1919, to January 15, 1920"; that on February 14th a warrant was ordered "drawn for $100 for T. B. Bradshaw for the period from January 15, 1920, to February 15, 1920," and on the same date it was "ordered that salary of T. B. Bradshaw as marshal of city of Warrenton, Ga., for period from February 15, 1920, to March 15, 1920, be fixed at $5, and that specified duties of said Bradshaw for said period be the enforcement of all ordinances of the city of Warrenton, and his hours of duties be from 11 o'clock a. m. to 12 o'clock noon fast time, each day during that period," and that on March 15th his "salary as marshal for the period from March 15, 1920, to April 15, 1920, was fixed at $5, and his hours of duties fixed from 11 a. m. to 12 m. fast time, each day, during the period stated."

In their brief counsel for the defendant in error insist that when their client was elected marshal in October, 1919, the salary of the marshal was $100 per month, and that the mayor and council, having fixed the salary at $100 a month at the beginning of the term, "had no right to reduce the salary of an officer as originally fixed by them"; and in support of this contention they quote from section 5 of the act of 1859 (Ga. L. 1859, p. 212), that the salaries of certain officers, including the marshal, "shall not be increased or diminished during their continuance in office," and say:

"There is nothing in any subsequent act amending the charter of Warrenton which reveals this provision of the act of 1859 denying to commissioners the right to increase or diminish the salary of this officer during his term of office."

In this the learned counsel are in error. The act to amend the charter of the city of Warrenton (Ga. L. 1915, p. 980) expressly amended section 5 of the act of 1859 by striking therefrom all reference to marshals, and the amendment of 1915 made the limitation as to increasing or diminishing salaries apply only to the salaries of tax collectors, tax receivers, and treasurer. The act of 1915 (Ga. L. 1915, pp. 962, 963) provides for the annual election of the marshal for the city by popular vote, and further provides:

That "said marshal so elected shall be paid such salary as may be fixed by the commissioners of the city of Warrenton," and that "it shall be the duty of the commissioners of said city of Warrenton to prescribe the duties of the marshal of said city."

As the record does not show that the said commissioners fixed an annual salary of $1,200 a year, or $100 per month for 12 months, but, on the contrary, shows that the salary fixed by the commissioners for the period of time covered by the suit was $5 per month, the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for.

Judgment reversed.

WATSON et al. v. COX et al. (No. 10677.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 15, 1921.)

1. Deeds ⇨54—Delivery necessary.

Unless a grantor delivered the deeds that he had drawn up either to the grantees or in escrow, and unless he parted with them intending to part with control of them, the deeds were never fully executed, and the grantor did not divest himself of the fee in the land, but if he did deliver the deeds in this manner the fee passed immediately to the grantees named.

2. Deeds ⇨58(3)—Delivery to scrivener held to convey title.

When grantor delivered to the scrivener deeds in which his children were grantees, held, that there was a valid delivery.

3. Dower ⇨20—Not defeated by voluntary deed made in contemplation of marriage.

A voluntary deed made in contemplation of marriage, and to defeat the future right of dower, does not prevent the inchoate right of dower of a subsequent wife from attaching to the land of which the husband was possessed at the time of his marriage; she being, through no fault of hers, ignorant of such transfer of title.

4. Dower ⇨31, 38—Attaches upon consummation of marriage.

Upon the consummation of marriage the law causes the inchoate right of dower to attach, whether there be a contract in writing or not, and it is beyond the power of the husband to destroy this right after marriage.

5. Dower ⇨20—Deeds held executed to defeat dower.

Evidence held to show that deeds involved were made in contemplation of marriage and for the purpose of defeating dower.

6. Trial ⇨398—Findings and conclusions of trial court held not inconsistent.

Findings of trial court that there was no testimony to show that deeds in question were made with the intention of defrauding defendant wife or that they were made in contemplation of marriage held not inconsistent with a conclusion of the court that the deeds under the circumstances were a fraud upon the marital rights of such wife, and hence that they did not bar her inchoate right of dower, and appellate court could sustain such conclusion, although the wife did not appeal from the alleged inconsistent findings of fact.

7. Deeds ⇨108—Clause as to postponement of possession held not to destroy force of instrument.

A clause, "Providing, nevertheless, that G. * * * and M. are not to have possession nor is the deed to take effect until the youngest, M., shall become twenty-one years of age," contained in a deed otherwise providing that they were to have and hold all and singular the premises forever, held not to destroy the force of the instrument, it being apparent that grantor was anxious to safeguard the interest of the grantees during their adolescence, the fee vesting immediately, and possession and use being reserved to the grantor and his estate until M. should attain her majority.

Fraser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; James E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Action by Dora Cox Watson and others against Samuel M. Cox and others. From a decree, various parties, plaintiffs and defendants, appeal. Decree modified and affirmed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for plaintiffs.

Wm. G. Sirrine and Stephen Nettles, both of Greenville, for defendants.

FRANK B. GARY, A. A. J. This is an action in which the relief sought is the removal of a cloud on the alleged title of the plaintiffs to the land described; an adjudication that the plaintiffs own the fee in the lands; an injunction against S. C. Cox mortgaging or disposing of the said land; and a declaration that Mrs. Annie Cox has no claim of dower therein.

The case comes before this court upon numerous exceptions to the decree of his honor the presiding judge. Some of the exceptions are filed by the plaintiff and some by the defendants.

There are three main questions raised by the pleadings. These embrace several minor questions:

First. Did S. M. Cox make a delivery of the deeds in question and thereby divest himself of the fee in the lands referred to?

Second. Was the wife whom he married after he signed the deeds thereby prevented from acquiring an inchoate right of dower in said lands?

Third. Does the deed in favor of the grantor's grandchildren, Gilmer, Marion and Mary Thompson, convey an estate to them?

Should the first question be answered in the negative, there would be no reason to consider the other questions. We will consider them in the order named.

In 1911 the defendant Sam M. Cox, after having reared a large family, lost his wife. His children were the plaintiffs, except Royal Cox, Bessie May Shannon, and Gillman Thompson, who are his grandchildren. The defendants Marion Thompson and Mary Thompson are also his grandchildren. The parents of these grandchildren, who were children of S. M. Cox, are dead. Mrs. Annie Cox is the second wife of Sam M. Cox. She was married to him after the deeds were signed by S. M. Cox, but while he was in possession of the land and apparently the owner of it.

The complaint alleges that the deeds were executed on the 14th of March, 1914, in pursuance of a family settlement with the children and grandchildren of S. M. Cox. The answer put in issue this claim, asserting that the deeds were never delivered, though signed by S. M. Cox and turned over to L. E. Childress, his alleged agent.

[1] There is no difference of opinion as to the principles of law that should affect the first question, to wit, that unless the grantor delivered the deeds that had been drawn up by him either to the grantees or in escrow, unless he had parted with them intending to part with control over them, the deeds were never fully executed, and the grantor did not divest himself of the fee in the lands; if he did deliver the deeds in this manner, the fee passed immediately to the grantees named.

Our inquiry will therefore be directed to the question of what conclusion of fact must be reached in the light of the circumstances surrounding the transaction.

The testimony shows that Sam M. Cox was well advanced in years; in fact, had passed the allotted period. He had been a widower for three years. His life was comparatively lonely, although his children, who had married, looked after him. He had accumulated about 350 acres of land, presumably with the assistance of his wife and children. As is usually the case with men of his age and in his situation, "his fancies lightly turned to thoughts of love," or rather to thoughts of matrimony. His own statement is that he always intended to marry again, but had not selected his spouse to be. His children were naturally solicitous about his intended marriage. They were necessarily concerned, as all right-thinking children would be, lest their father become, at his age, the victim of some designing woman. This is not intended as a reflection on the woman he did marry. For ought that the court knows she may be a good woman who makes the old man a dutiful wife. The children under the circumstances would naturally be the beneficiaries of his property after his death. He does not seem to have had any other idea than that his children should inherit his property. They would most naturally be concerned about anything tending to dissipate the estate.

Whether what thereafter took place was due to this natural and commendable solicitude of his children for their father and the property in which they had a moral, if not legal, interest, or whether it was due to their cold-blooded and selfish insistence, the fact remains that he voluntarily procured a survey to be made of his lands, a division to be made according to where he thought the lines should run, and had the children pay for the surveys. He was apparently under no compulsion then. After he had procured plats to be made of the several tracts, he sought a lawyer and procured deeds to be made of the several tracts in favor of his children and grandchildren respectively. He does not seem to have been under any fear or compulsion at that time. None of the grantees were then present threatening or coercing him, even though they had previously manifested concern about his talk of marriage. After signing these deeds in the presence of witnesses he turned them over to the scrivener to be kept by him. There is a conflict here as to what the grantor's directions were. The scrivener who is disinterested says that he directed him to keep them until his death, and at the grantor's death deliver them to the respective grantees. Upon cross-examination he is uncertain whether he said, "Keep them until my death," etc., or, "Keep them for me and give them to my children," etc. He is uncertain as to the verbiage. The scrivener held the papers for several years. The old man married. Then it was that the confusion arose. He said he had not conveyed his property and took steps to undo what had been done and to undo what had been acquiesced in for several years.

If we might enter the realm of speculation, we would readily conclude that when this good woman found herself mated to an old man, presumed to be possessed of considerable property, but in reality without more than a life estate, she let her displeasure or disappointment at the situation be known to him in no uncertain terms. It should not be surprising that when so accosted, after long acquiescence in what had been done, he suddenly sought to undo it.

We need not speculate, however, when we conclude that Sam M. Cox did the things enumerated voluntarily, and not under compulsion. Besides, the evidence shows that he told Mat Cox, his brother, that he had divided his property and deeded it to his children and left the deeds with Mr. Childress to be kept as long as he lived, and after his death to be delivered to the children. He said he did not want the children to see the deeds because some of them might be dissatisfied about what he had left them or given them. He said nothing at the time about wanting to recall the deeds.

To J. Frank Epps, a lawyer of high character, he said he had made deeds to his land to his children and delivered them to Mr. Childress to be delivered to the children upon his death; that before his second marriage he had cut his property up, some to one child and some to another; that he thought he had the whole thing settled; but that circumstances had come up, his second marriage, the dissatisfaction of his wife, the anxiety of his children, etc., that caused trouble.

The anxiety of the children as elsewhere explained was due to the fact that the deeds were held by Childress and were not recorded. The dissatisfaction of his wife was, it seems, due to the fact that she had just learned that he had disposed of practically all of his property, except a life estate.

Mr. Epps further testified that—

"The impression left on my mind was that Sam Cox thought that he was in a mess and didn't know what to do. His children were after him and so was his wife."

There was friction between the children and the stepmother. It was under these circumstances that he sought to palliate a dissatisfied wife, by repudiating acts long acquiesced in, and, until his marriage, never questioned.

When Sam Cox had this land surveyed, divided, and platted, and procured the various deeds to be drawn up, and signed in the presence of witnesses, and then turned them over to Childress, he surely intended to do something effective. He either intended to fully execute deeds, or his conduct was idle. It makes but little difference whether he directed Childress to keep the deeds and deliver them after his death, or to keep them for him and deliver them to his children, he must have intended that through this medium they should be transmitted to the various grantees.

We prefer and do conclude that he intended to do something effective rather than that his conduct was idle and amounted to nothing. We cannot accept his statement made in his present predicament that he intended to mislead his children and make them think he had done something for them when he had not. He says now:

"I don't doubt but that the children thought that they [the deeds] were good. I just meant to hold them off so that they would let me alone and let me die in peace."

[2] Such avowed duplicity does not commend itself to us, but tends rather to discredit other statements made by him. In view of his oft-repeated statements in different form and to different people that he had deeded his property to his children, and in the light of all the circumstances, we are of the opinion that, when the grantor delivered the deeds referred to to Childress he intended that it should be made certain that his children and grandchildren would get his land, that the dower right of any future wife would not complicate matters, and that he would reserve all he needed—a life estate. It was a complete execution of the deeds, and had the effect of divesting S. M. Cox of the fee in the land in question, but of reserving to him a life estate therein. At the same time there was in contemplation the barring of the dower right of any future wife. The decree of the circuit judge is therefore in this particular affirmed.

[3,4] Was the wife whom S. M. Cox subsequently married thereby prevented from acquiring an inchoate right of dower in said lands? There is little or no question as to the law. The difficulty is to determine whether or not the circumstances will warrant the application of these well-known principles, to wit, that a voluntary deed made in contemplation of marriage and to defeat the future right of dower does not prevent the inchoate right of dower of a subsequent wife from attaching to the land of which the husband was possessed at the time of the marriage, she being through no fault of hers ignorant of such transfer of title. Upon the consummation of marriage the law causes the inchoate right to attach whether there be a contract in writing or not; and it is beyond the power of the husband to destroy this right after marriage.

There is nothing in the case of McAulay v. McAulay, 96 S. C. 86, 79 S. E. 785, in conflict with this statement of the law. There the question under consideration was whether or not a deed made in derogation of a premarriage agreement not in writing would be set aside as in fraud of the wife's right to participate in the distribution of the husband's estate. It was conceded that the deed would be void; in so far as it purported to affect the wife's dower right to a distributive share in the land conveyed fraudulently a written contract would be essential; that a verbal contract could not be proved, because it would be within the statute of frauds. In the case before us the law makes the contract that casts upon the wife the inchoate right immediately upon the marriage. This right when it attaches cannot be defeated by the husband. In this respect the right differs from right to participate in a distribution which can be preserved as against deeds by a written contract, but not otherwise.

We are not now confronted with the question of whether or not Mrs. Cox has a valid claim against the land as heir at law or distributee. Indeed such question would be premature now, nor could such claim be successfully made as against the deeds; there being no evidence of a written agreement. That was the question before the court in McAulay v. McAulay, supra. This case holds that a voluntary deed made in contemplation of marriage would defeat a future wife's rights in the land conveyed, as heir at law or distributee, unless such rights were preserved by a written contract. That a verbal contract or agreement would be within the statute of frauds.

One of the reasons assigned for this holding is that one may do whatsoever he pleases with his property, and that even after marriage the husband might by a conveyance destroy the wife's right to a distributive share in the land conveyed. Such reasoning does not apply to the wife's right of dower. The law gives her the right of dower at her marriage, and places that right beyond the control of the husband.

For this reason and for the additional reason that the wife's dower right was not in question, but was conceded, we think that the case of McAulay v. McAulay, supra, is not in conflict with nor does it supersede the law as laid down in Brooks v. McMeekin, 37 S. C. 285, 15 S. E. 1019, which seems applicable to the case before us, in so far as Mrs. Cox's inchoate right of dower is concerned. That law is impressively expressed in the following statement:

"We are enabled, therefore, to declare it to be the law, as derived from our own decisions, that in this commonwealth, marriage is a valuable consideration paid by the wife for those rights and estates that by our law are accorded to the wife as a wife."

This was said with reference to dower.

We quote further:

"Here was a man of confessedly weak health. Is it to be a matter of censure that the woman he asked to be his wife and the mother of his children considered that he was the owner of a large plantation well stocked? This wife said she knew that her husband was the owner of this landed property, and that any change in the ownership was studiously withheld from her. So much so that she was not aware until a year or so after her husband's death that there was any claim that he was not the owner of these lands. Was she not deceived? Did not both Henry and Stephen Gibson secretly confederate to destroy an estate that they both knew the law would give her at her marriage? Was this not a fraud? Marriage to a woman is a valuable consideration for the purchase of the privileges of wifehood, with all the rights affixed to that relation by the law of the land [italics added]; and any secret combination to defeat the vesting of those rights, between the husband, the vendor, and his vendee, is an actual fraud."

Taking this to be the law, let us see what the circumstances will warrant us in holding as to the facts. Let us see if the deeds were made with a view to marriage and to defeat a future right of dower. It will be remembered that Mr. Sam Cox was a widower well advanced in years having a large family of children and some grandchildren. In the natural course of events the old man would not live long. Apparently he was on good terms with his family. His children and grandchildren would naturally inherit his property. The old man was talking of marrying again. The children opposed it. They were concerned lest he marry and thus destroy their expected patrimony, patrimony that they had a moral right to expect. We think the testimony warrants us in saying that to avert such consequence they urged him to make such disposition of his property as would save their expected patrimony to them. He says he made the deeds in consequence of their insistence. Their insistence was on account of their fear that a future wife would acquire interest in the property. It did not amount to coercion. Mr. Childress testifies that—

"On several occasions he talked with me about his children being after him to deed them his property because they were afraid he would marry again."

Mr. Sam Cox testifies:

That the deeds were given to Childress in March, 1914. "At that time I intended to marry again, but had not decided whom I would marry. When I became engaged to my present wife I was living on the land involved in this suit. I don't think I told my wife about these deeds until some time after the marriage."

He says further in answer to the question:

"Q. What did he [George] say to you Mr. Cox? A. He just simply said: 'Pa there has been so much trouble and disturbance, you just simply make a deed and marry whom you please.' Q. What did you do then? A. I went and asked Childress to write me off some deeds."

He says further:

"I didn't want it done, but they kept arguing with me about marrying."

It seems that the conclusion is irresistible that the deeds were made with a view, not only of dividing his land during his lifetime, and reserving all he needed—a life estate—but of preventing the attaching of the right of dower of some future wife, whoever she may be. It makes no difference on whose initiative or suggestion this was done, if this was the purpose of the deeds, a future wife's right of dower would not be barred if the circumstances justified her belief that he still owned the land. We have concluded that this was one of the purposes of the voluntary deeds.

[5] In view, therefore, of the law and of what we find to be facts, we conclude that the deeds made at the time and in the manner detailed did not bar the inchoate right of dower of Mrs. Annie Cox, who was ignorant of the existence of the deeds and who married Mr. Cox having reason to believe that he was the owner of the land. The decree of the circuit judge is affirmed in this particular.

[6] Objection is made that Mrs. Cox has not appealed from certain alleged findings of fact by the circuit judge, which facts would absolutely prevent the conclusion reached by the circuit judge if unreversed by this court. Mrs. Cox does ask, however, that the conclusion be affirmed on certain additional grounds, to wit, that the circuit judge should have found as facts the reverse of what he is alleged to have found.

It is always well to adhere to the rules promulgated for hearing appeals, and we would not encourage any laxity in this regard; nor would we sanction any serious departure from those rules, especially if the departure affected injuriously the opposing side.

The case before us presents a peculiar situation. The circuit judge's conclusion is favorable to Mrs. Cox. She therefore does not wish to reverse it. In arriving at his conclusion the circuit judge incidentally says that, "there is no testimony to show that the deeds were made with the intention of defrauding the defendant, or that they were made in contemplation of marriage," circumstances that are essential to preserve a future wife's marital rights in the property if it is conveyed. He goes on, however, and finds that the deeds under the circumstances were a fraud upon the marital rights of Mrs. Cox.

It seems to us that the circuit judge must be understood to have meant that the making of the deeds was not intended to affect the marital rights of this particular individual as contradistinguished from an intention to affect any person whom S. M. Cox should marry. Taking this view of his honor's language, there is nothing inconsistent in his conclusion. In any event it would be taking too narrow a view of the court's duties if we should decline to consider her contention because it might not be in exact accordance with the rule, when she is making an honest effort to have the court pass upon it. Had it been necessary, we would have considered her "additional ground," under the circumstances ex gratia.

[7] This brings us to the last question: Does the deed in favor of the grantee's grandchildren Gillman, Marion, and Mary Thompson convey any estate to them? This deed was executed under the same circumstances and at the same time as were the other deeds referred to. It is regular in every respect except that the following words appear in the habendum clause:

"To have and to hold all and singular the premises before mentioned unto the said Gillman Thompson, Marion Thompson, and their heirs and assigns forever. Providing, nevertheless, that Gillman T., Marion T., and Mary T. are not to have possession nor is the deed to take effect until the youngest, Mary, shall become twenty-one years of age."

The circuit judge holds that the last sentence is such an inconsistent provision as will destroy utterly the force of the instrument. We cannot take this view of it. These three grandchildren were as much the objects of the grantor's intended bounty as any of the children or other grandchildren. The circumstances under which he sought to deliver to these children their part of his estate are the same as those under which he gave to the others their part. The only difference was that he was anxious to safeguard the interest of the three grandchildren during their adolescence, and he attempted by this provision to do so. Surely the court will not prevent his well-meant, but misdirected, efforts along this line to destroy their inheritance unless the rules of construction imperatively demand it. The boast of equity jurisprudence would indeed be empty and unmeaning if it should permit such results.

In the case of Merck v. Merck, 83 S. C. 329, 65 S. E. 347, 137 Am. St. Rep. 815, a deed was in the usual form of a conveyance of land with warranty clause, except that it contains after the description of the property the following words:

"This deed is not to go into effect until after my death."

The words under consideration by us are:

They "are not to have possession nor is this deed to take effect until the youngest, Mary Thompson, shall become twenty-one years of age."

Citing Williams v. Sullivan, 10 Rich. Eq. 217, the court held that the title to the property passed on execution of the paper, the right to the use and possession only being postponed until the death of Mrs. Sullivan (the grantor). The court said:

"It does not strain the meaning of the words, 'This deed is not to go into effect until after my death,' to construe them in connection with the whole paper, as expressing the intention of the grantor to say, 'I do mean to make a good deed of conveyance to Laurence C. Merck, but I hold back from him for myself the beneficial rights of possession and enjoyment of the land while I live.'"

By the same token it would not strain the meaning of the words before us for construction to construe them in connection with the whole paper, as expressing the intention of the grantor to say:

"I do mean to make a good deed to the Thompson children, but I hold back from them for the benefit of myself and my estate the beneficial rights of possession and enjoyment of the land until the youngest shall have attained her majority."

The language used in the case relied on by the circuit judge (Singleton v. Bremer's, Adm'r, 4 McCord, 12, 17 Am. Dec. 699) and the surrounding circumstances are very different from the language and circumstances of the present case. The language there was:

"I do hereby in case of my death give to Tabitha Singleton (a free brown woman) my house and lot. * * *

The court said:

"The natural import of the terms used in the first part of this paper would unquestionably give it the effect and operation of a will."

A sale of property by the testator was said to be an ademption of the legacy. The court held that no fee vested. The case is not an authority in point, except that it recognizes the undisputed principle of the common law that a fee cannot be created to take effect in future. In the case under consideration the fee vested immediately, but the possession and use were reserved to S. M. Cox and his estate until the youngest grantee should attain her majority. The decree of the circuit judge is therefore in this particular modified.

The circuit judge did not pass upon the rights of George Cox, but the question is fairly raised by the pleadings and by the exceptions. We cannot, therefore, brush aside the question as unimportant, but should decide it.

In view of the admissions made by George Cox as they appear from the testimony, he is in no position to assert any title under the deed in question. His claim is therefore denied.

The decree of the circuit court is modified in the particulars named.

EUGENE B. GARY, C. J., WATTS, J., and WILSON, A. A. J., concur.

FRASER, J. (dissenting). The plaintiffs are the children and the defendants Marion Thompson and Mary Thompson are the grandchildren of the defendant Samuel M. Cox. Samuel M. Cox owned a large tract of land. His wife died, and some, at least, of his children became restive for fear that he would marry again and dispose of his property in some way that would defeat their prospective inheritance. The children urged him to divide up his land so that their interests might be secure. He told them that if they would employ a surveyor he would divide the land. They did employ a surveyor, and Mr. Cox showed the surveyor where to run the lines. Some time after the plats were made he took the plats to a neighbor and friend, Childress, who was a lawyer, but not in active practice, and asked him to prepare the deeds, nine in all. Mr. Cox signed the deeds in the presence of two witnesses and left them in the possession of Mr. Childress. How Mr. Childress was to hold them is the question in this case. This action was brought to declare the delivery and absolute delivery, and that the title was in the children and grandchildren, subject to a life estate in Mr. Cox. Mr. Cox denied that the delivery was absolute and claimed that Mr. Childress was merely to hold the deeds subject to his order, and to be delivered to the grantees at his death, in case he did not withdraw them in his lifetime. The circuit judge found that the delivery was absolute. In argument the attorneys for the children and grandchildren say there is one question of fact:

"Was the circuit judge in error in concluding as a matter of fact that the deeds were placed in the hands of Childress by S. M. Cox with unconditional instructions to deliver them to the grantees upon his death, and without any reservation in S. M. Cox of the right to revoke or recall them during his lifetime?"

There are only two witnesses who testify as to what was said at the time of delivery, to wit, Childress and S. M. Cox.

Childress testified that Cox said:

"Keep them until my death and deliver them to the children."

He also testified:

"Q. Mr. Childress, when Mr. Cox gave you those deeds and told you to keep them, didn't he say, 'Keep them for me until my death and then give them to my children?' A. He might have had it that way. I would not be certain; I would not be certain. Q. You would not swear that he did not say that. A. No; would not."

Mr. Childress is very uncertain as to the language that accompanied that delivery to him. When Mr. Childress was asked if Mr. Cox did not say that the reason the deeds were left with him was that Mr. Cox had no place to keep the deeds and he was afraid to keep them in his house, for fear that his children might get possession of them when they came to clean up his house, Mr. Childress answered:

"I do not know whether he said that or not. Q. Well, if Mr. Cox testifies positively that he did say it, you would not deny it, would you? A. No; I would not deny it, for I don't remember."

Mr. Cox testifies that he left the deeds with Mr. Childress to hold for him (Cox); that he did not regard the deeds as anything more than postal cards to be withdrawn at his will; that at the time of the signing of the deeds, and up to the time that this immediate controversy arose, he never doubted his right to change his mind and recall the deeds from his attorney and friend; and that he had left the deeds with Mr. Childress as his attorney and friend, so that he might be free in his disposition of the property. In order for the children to succeed, they must show the delivery was unconditional. They attempt to show that cardinal fact by one witness and that witness frankly states that he is uncertain as to what was said. Who was most likely to remember? Mr. Cox. There are only two witnesses as to the circumstances connected with the delivery—one confessedly uncertain; the other clear and positive. The weight of the testimony is clearly with Mr. Cox. Then as to the light from circumstances: When Mr. Childress was nearer to the facts in question than he was when he testified, he says that he moved from the neighborhood, but before going he offered to give up the custody of the papers, but Mr. Cox told him to keep them because he had no place to hide them from his children. Mr. Childress has delivered the papers to Mr. Mat Cox, a brother of S. M. Cox, and one deed to George Cox, a son of S. M. Cox, but always on the order of S. M. Cox, and we see in the record no evidence that the grantees were consulted as to their wishes in the matter. There is no evidence of an agreement between Mr. Cox and his children that the deeds should be executed. Indeed, some of the grantees said the subject of deeds had not been spoken of between them and their father, and George Cox, one of the grantees, signed a written statement in which he expressly disavows any claim under the deed to him. It is reasonably clear that, when Mr. Cox signed the deeds and left them with Mr. Childress, it was his intention that after his death his children and grandchildren should take the land as set forth in the deeds, but until he had done an irrevocable act he could change his mind and change the disposition of the property. Mr. Cox further testifies that he had two propositions in contemplation. One was to make a will, and the other was to make the deeds subject to his recall while he lived, and, if not recalled while he lived, then to be delivered at his death; that he considered the undelivered deeds the safer way, as it would avoid a possible contest of his will.

From a layman's point of view, the explanation is reasonable, but it is said that Mr. Cox treated the deeds as absolutely delivered when his brother suggested the delivery of the deeds to the grantees and a reconveyance from them of a life estate. This was a compromise arrangement, and cannot have the effect of converting a previous conditional delivery into an absolute delivery.

It is said that Mr. Childress refused to allow Mr. Cox to have a reservation of a life estate written into the deeds. The record shows that the objection was based upon the absence of the subscribing witnesses, and not on the ground that Mr. Cox could not alter the deeds.

The question in this case is: What was the intention of Cox at the time he delivered the deeds to Childress? The surrounding circumstances throw little light on the question in favor of an absolute delivery. The circumstances point the other way. Mr. Cox makes a clear, positive, reasonable statement. Mr. Childress is confessedly uncertain.

I see nothing in the record upon which to base a finding that the children helped their father to accumulate this property. I cannot consent to take a man's property from him, when, as here, the direct positive testimony is in his favor, and the witness against him confessedly does not know.

MEYER v. MATTHEWS. (No. 10683.)

Wills  $\S$  634(8)—Remainder held vested, so that, on death of testator's child leaving issue, property passed to issue.

Where testator devised land and personalty to his wife for life, directing that at her death the property should be sold and the moneys equally divided among his named children, but that if any child should die not leaving lawful issue portions allotted to him should revert back to the other children, a child named took a vested remainder upon condition that if such child failed to survive the widow or leave issue the same should revert, etc., hence, where one of testator's daughters died before the widow, leaving issue, her share did not revert to the other children, though the issue died before the period of distribution, but it passed to heirs of the issue.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Jas. E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Suit by Elizabeth Meyer against Rosa G. Matthews, for the construction of a will.

From a judgment denying the latter the right to share in the estate, she appeals. Modified.

Holman & Boulware, of Barnwell, for appellant.

Charles Carroll Simms and J. O. Patterson, Jr., both of Barnwell, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This appeal involves the construction of a will, the material provisions being as follows: Testator first directed that certain personal property—

"be sold and that the proceeds be equally divided among my wife Jane and my six children, viz.: Ella, Ira, Lawton's child Bertha, Caleb, Mary Jane, and Elizabeth. * * * I also further give to my said wife, during her life, all of my real estate and the balance of my personal property. After the death of my wife, I want my real estate and the remainder of my personal property sold, and the money equally divided among my children as above named, with the same provision in regard to my daughter Ira as above stated. It is my desire that if any of my children should die not having lawful issue, that the portions allotted to them should revert back to my other children, with the same proviso in regard to my daughter Ira as above stated."

After the death of the testator, and before the death of his widow, the life tenant, his daughter Mary Jane died, leaving her husband and an infant child, which died before the death of the life tenant, its father being its only heir at law. Thereafter, and prior to the death of the life tenant, the father, H. B. Matthews, conveyed his interest in said estate to his second wife, Rosa Matthews, the appellant.

His honor the circuit judge (who adopted the report of the master) ruled that only those who answered the description of children or grandchildren of the testator at the time of the life tenant's death could take under the will, and therefore that Rosa G. Matthews was not entitled to the share, which Mary Jane would have taken if she had survived the life tenant. This was error. In the first place, it is only necessary to cite the cases of McFadden v. McFadden, 107 S. C. 101, 91 S. E. 986, and Avinger v. Avinger, 107 S. E. 28, to show that Mary Jane took a vested remainder. She, however, took it upon the condition that if she died before the termination of the life estate not having lawful issue the portion allotted to her should revert to the testator's other children. As she died leaving lawful issue, her interest in the estate was not divested, the condition upon which her portion was to revert to the testator's other children having failed.

"When there is a clear vested interest, * * * the express contingency upon which it was to be divested not having happened, the construction of the clause giving the vested interest is not to be affected by anything connected with the contingency that would otherwise have divested the estate." McGregor v. Toomer, 2 Strob. Eq. 51; Walker v. Alverson, 87 S. C. 55, 68 S. E. 966, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 115.

CRYMES v. GAUL CONST. CO. et al.
(No. 10694.)

1. Contracts ¶309(2)—Destruction of building being remodeled and failure to restore it held not to relieve contractor or surety.

Where contractors employed to remodel a building were to get the building as it stood, and own all of the building except what was used in the new work, and receive a specified amount for their undertaking, and were to be answerable for and restore and make good all damages, etc., occasioned or rendered necessary by fire, etc., the contractors and their surety were not discharged by the destruction of the building by fire before completion of the work, and by the owner's failure to restore it to the condition it was in when the contractors began to remodel it.

2. Contracts ¶309(2)—Failure of owner to pay insurance money to contractor held not to defeat liability for contractor's default.

Where a contract for the remodeling of a building did not provide that if the building burned down the insurance money was to be used in rebuilding it, the failure of the owner to pay the insurance money to the contractors for use in restoring the building after its destruction by fire, or to pay the amount of the contractor's loss, did not discharge the contractors or their surety.

3. Principal and surety ¶86—Completion by owner upon contractor's default after destruction of building not condition of surety's liability.

Under a contract for the remodeling of a building, where the building was destroyed by fire and the contractors abandoned the contract, the owner was not required to complete the building in order to render the surety liable, as the surety could relieve itself from liability by completing the contract itself.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Crymes against the Gaul Construction Company and another. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stephen Nettles, of Greenville, for appellants.

B. A. Morgan and Cothran, Dean & Cothran, all of Greenville, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from order of Judge De Vore overruling a demurrer interposed by defendants to complaint of plaintiff. The action was for damages by plaintiff against contractors and surety on their bond for failure to restore the residence which was destroyed by fire after the contractors had completed about 80 per cent. of their work. By agreement the original contract specifications and bond were treated as part of the complaint, for the purpose of passing upon the demurrer, the demurrer interposed was upon the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. The exceptions are:

"(1) Because under the terms of the contract the contractors did not assume responsibility for the integrity of the old building, and consequently its destruction by fire operated to discharge them from further performance under the contract and to discharge the bonding company from further liability as surety on the contractor's bond.

"(2) Because the plaintiff did not restore or offer to restore the building to the condition it was in when the contractors began to remodel it, and under the contract this was a condition precedent to any obligation on their part to go on with the work and to any liability on the part of the surety for their failure to do so.

"(3) Because plaintiff's failure to procure insurance on the building to protect the interests of the contractors was such a breach of the contract as to excuse the contractors from further performance and to discharge the liability of the bonding company as surety.

"(4) Because the plaintiff did not pay or offer to pay the contractors the whole or any part of the insurance money, to be used by them in restoring the building, this being under the contract a condition precedent to any obligation on their part to rebuild and to any liability on the part of the surety for their failure to do so.

"(5) Because the plaintiff did not pay or offer to pay to the contractors the amount of their loss by the destruction of the building, to be used by them in restoring the building, this being under the contract a condition precedent to any obligation on their part to rebuild and to any liability on the part of the surety for their failure to do so.

"(6) Because the plaintiff has not completed the building, and until he has done so the liability of the surety on the contractor's bond cannot be determined."

[1] The demurrer admits the allegations of the complaint to be true, and the contract was before Judge De Vore. The complaint alleges in paragraph 10 that—

"The contractors shall be answerable for, restore, and make good all injurious damages, re-erectations and repairs occasioned or rendered necessary by defective material, bad workmanship, fire, and trespass or otherwise, previous to the completion and delivery of the same."

The complaint, contract, and specifications show that the contractors assumed responsibility for the whole job. The allegations of the complaint admitted to be true by the demurrer set forth fully the things embraced in the undertaking laid before the contractors. They were to get the building as it stood, so much money for their undertaking and job, and the work was to be completed the following August. The contractors were to own all of the old building, except what was stipulated to be retained by the owner, to wit, "Old material torn out and not used in new work. * * *"

Exceptions 1 and 2 are overruled.

Exception 8 is overruled. Plaintiff took out insurance to protect his interest and that of the contractors, Gaul Construction Company. The contractors sued Crymes for the whole of insurance and failed, not because they had no interest, but on other grounds. Policy was taken out when work began. At that time there was no part of the house new. They sued for destruction of old building, and lost out.

[2] Exceptions 4 and 5 are overruled. Nowhere does the contract provide that if the house burns down the insurance money is to be collected and used in building the house.

The contractors contracted to complete the job and the bonding company made the contract a part of their obligation. The court adjudged the contract abandoned; the building is not erected, the undertaking not performed. The contractor having defaulted, his surety must respond for any breach of duty on the part of the contractor. The bonding company is not that of an ordinary surety but the bonding company is in the business of underwriting for hire.

[3] Exception 6 is overruled. The surety can relieve itself from liability by completing the contract which it underwrote; as it is Crymes has no house, is out large sums of money advanced unaccounted for, which in his complaint he alleges is his damage, and admitted by demurrer to be true. All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

TURNER v. GUEST et al. (No. 10696.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Will §601(4)—Devise of remainder held to give fee simple.

A clause in a will devising real estate after the death of the life tenant to testator's four sons for their use and possession during their natural lifetime, but not to be subject to their debts or to be sold by them and to descend to their heirs, gives to the sons a fee simple.

2. Will §506(3)—Widow of deceased son held entitled to share under will regardless of nature of estate.

Where the will gave a remainder to testator's four sons for their lives and then to descend to their heirs, the widow of a son, who died after testator, leaving a son who had subsequently died, is entitled, on the death of the life tenant, to the share which her husband would have taken under the will, as the heir of her husband and of their son, regardless of whether her husband had a fee or only a life estate, since in either event it was vested.

3. Partition §85, 87—Evidence that debts and improvements were paid from income sustains finding against claim for accounting therefor.

Evidence that the income from the property and the work of the life tenants in possession thereof, including plaintiff's husband, had paid the debts against the property, sustains a finding that defendants had not sustained the issue for an accounting as to debts and improvements.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Suit for partition by Mattie Guest Turner against H. T. Guest and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bonham & Price, and H. C. McKnight, all of Greenville, for appellants.

Martin & Henry, of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The appellants in their argument on appeal thus state the facts and issues:

"John Guest, a resident of the upper section of Greenville county, died in March, 1884, leaving certain lands and a will and codicil, the construction of which is a material part in this case. John Guest had been married twice, his first wife being Nancy Guest and his second wife, Jane Guest. By his first wife, the deceased had two sons, the defendants H. T. Guest and John E. Guest. By his second wife, he had two sons, the defendants Squire E. Guest and William Guest, the predeceased husband of the plaintiff, Mattie Guest Turner. William Guest died May 22, 1894, leaving his wife and posthumous child. This posthumous child died in about four weeks after its birth. Plaintiff had moved away from the home of her husband's people, and later married again. Jane Guest, the widow of John Guest, died on May 12, 1917, and this suit is brought to partition land under the will. The master held that the sons of John Guest had a fee-simple title to the land upon the death of the life tenant, Jane Guest, in May, 1917. The master entirely ignored the question of the improvements placed on the land by Squire E. Guest and the money advanced by the three eldest sons in paying off the debts of the estate."

Argument.

"The exceptions raise three questions:

(1) Did the four sons of John Guest have a fee-simple interest in the land under the terms of the will upon the death of Jane Guest?

"(2) Was the defendant Squire E. Guest entitled to an accounting with the plaintiff for the new buildings erected by him upon the land in which the plaintiff claims an interest?

"(3) Are the defendants entitled to reimbursement for the money which they paid out to satisfy the mortgages and debts against the land?"

The portion of the will of John Guest upon which appellants' case rests are:

"Item 4. It is my will that after the death of my wife, Jane Guest, that that part of my land that was inherited by my first wife, Nancy Guest, to be equally divided between H. T. Guest and John E. Guest, and the remaining part to be equally divided between Squire E. Guest [and] William Guest, the use and proceeds and possession of which is to be theirs during their natural lifetime, but not subject to any debt of their contracting or by them sold, but descend [to] their lawful heirs."

To this last will and testament the following codicil was made:

"I this day make this change or alteration in item 4th of the within will made by me on the 8th day of May, 1883. That a straight line shall be run beginning at the old spring on the river and running a northwesterly course to the corner where the land inherited by my first wife, Nance, and the land I bought joins on Langfords land and the southwest side of said [land], to be divided between H. T. Guest and John E. Guest, and other side divided according to directions in Item 4th of the within will." "And that item 4th shall read lifetime or widowhood instead of lifetime."

[1, 2] The master and circuit judge held that the sons of John Guest took fee-simple interests. The authorities, too numerous to cite, hold that words such as are used here carry a fee simple. Even if these words should be construed in their popular and not in their legal sense, it can avail the appellants nothing. (The devise to Jane for life, with remainder to William for life, with remainder to the heirs of William, would certainly give William a vested interest in whatever estate he took. After the life estate to William, his share went to his lawful heirs, i. e., to his wife and child, and on the death of the child its share went to its mother, the plaintiff herein. The interest of William went, under the will, to the plaintiff in either case.)

[3] The appellant claims that the master and trial judge ignored the issue as to improvements, and money advanced to pay the debts. In this the appellant is mistaken. The master held, "None of the other issues raised by the parties is sustained by testimony." In this holding by the master there was no error. The income from the property and the work of the sons, William included, paid the debts and made the improvements. At least there was no evidence from which a contrary finding could have been made.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. I concur in the result. So far as the interest of the plaintiff is concerned it makes no difference whether the sons take fee-simple titles or life estates with remainders to their children. I reserve my opinion upon the effect of the provision forbidding a sale of the property, which under McWhite v. Roseman, 114 S. C. 177, 103 S. E. 586, is indicative of an intention on the part of the testator that the sons should not take fee-simple estates.

CLARK v. COLUMBIA RY., GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (No. 10690.)

1. Evidence §219(1)—Testimony that company did not notify decedent's administrator of injury inadmissible.

In an action against a street railroad for death of a passenger in an automobile which collided with a car, testimony that defendant did not notify plaintiff administrator of the injury was properly rejected, there being no foundation for it, as there was no showing that any agent of defendant railroad knew whom to notify, and no attempt to show it.

2. Evidence §215(3)—Letters of company admitting place of accident dangerous properly excluded.

In an action against a street railroad for death of a passenger in an automobile which collided with a car, two letters written by defendant company to the mayor of the city admitting that the place of the accident was dangerous were properly excluded, the danger admitted having no connection with the actual cause of the accident.

3. Appeal and error §1053(3)—Error in admission of ordinances in action against street railway for death harmless in view of instruction.

In an action against a street railroad for death of a passenger in an automobile which collided with a car, if the introduction of ordinances of the city regulating the speed of automobiles was erroneous, such error could not have affected the result where the trial court charged that deceased was not responsible for the running of the automobile, as he had no control of it or the driver, his host.

4. Negligence §141(11)—Instruction on guest's responsibility for running of automobile not prejudicial.

In an action against a street railroad for death of a passenger in an automobile which collided with a car, there was no error prejudicial to plaintiff administrator on the part of the trial court in charging the jury that deceased was not responsible for the running of the automobile, deceased not being able to control the management of the car, and not being liable therefor.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by W. D. Clark, as administrator of the estate of W. W. Clark, deceased, against the Columbia Railway, Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tompkins, Barnett & McDonald, of Columbia, for appellant.

R. Beverly Herbert, of Columbia, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is an action for death by the wrongful act. The testimony tends to show that deceased was invited to enter the automobile of another to go to Camp Jackson; that they were going down Gervais street in the city of Columbia, following a street car of the defendant going to the camp; that in going along the street there was another automobile standing on the street so as to obstruct the way; that the automobile driver swerved the car in which the deceased was riding towards the center of the street; that the automobile skidded further toward the center of the street and was struck by another street car of the defendant going in the opposite direction, and the deceased received mortal wounds from which he died during the day. The defendant denied negligence, and pleaded contributory negligence, etc.

[1] The first exception complains of error in refusing to allow the plaintiff to show that the defendant did not notify the plaintiff of the injury. The testimony was properly rejected. There was no foundation for it. The case falls to show that any agent of the defendant knew whom to notify, or any attempt to show it.

[2] The second and third exceptions complain of error in excluding two letters written by the company to the mayor of Columbia, admitting that the place of the accident was a dangerous place. The letters were properly excluded. Even if the letters within months afterwards could have been admitted, the danger admitted had no connection with the cause of the accident.

[3] The fourth and seventh exceptions complain of error in allowing the introduction of ordinances of the city of Columbia, regulating the speed of automobiles. Even if error, it could not have affected the result, as his honor charged the jury that the deceased was not responsible for the running of the automobile, as he had no control of it or the driver, whose guest he was.

[4] The fifth and sixth exceptions complain of error in charging the jury the law in regard to the responsibility of those riding in an automobile, who had the right to control the running of the car. His honor charged the jury that the deceased was not responsible for the running of the car. The charge condensed means: Where one is riding in a car as a guest, and cannot control the management of the car, he is not responsible for negligence; but if he can control it, he is responsible. In this case, however, the deceased could not control the management of the car, and he is not liable. There was certainly no prejudicial error there.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BRITT v. McCORMICK COUNTY COMMISSION et al. (No. 10688.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Injunction §252(8) — Attorney's fees in procuring dissolution held "damages," within bond.

The bond, executed by plaintiff on procuring temporary restraining order, entitling defendants to "damages" sustained, held to warrant court, on dissolution of such order, in allowing defendants attorney's fees for services in procuring the dissolution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Damage—Damages.]

2. Injunction §252(8)—Award of attorney's fees to defendants on dissolution of restraining order limited to fees for only such counsel as was proper or necessary.

Defendants, on dissolution of temporary restraining order, were not entitled as damages, under plaintiff's bond, to fees of all three attorneys employed to procure dissolution, since any one of the three could have attended to the matter, and since plaintiff under such bond was liable for fees to only such counsel as was proper or necessary.

3. Injunction §252(8)—$208.90 allowance as attorney's fees on dissolution of temporary restraining order held excessive.

Allowance of $208.90 as attorney's fees to defendants on dissolution of temporary restraining order, under bond allowing plaintiff damages, held excessive, and will be reduced to $100.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of McCormick County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by J. E. Britt against the McCormick County Commission and others. From an order allowing fees to attorneys of the defendants for procuring the dissolution of a temporary restraining order, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Tillman, Mays & Harris, of Greenwood, for appellant.

Joseph Murray, of McCormick, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from an order of his honor, Judge Memminger, allowing fees to attorneys of respondents for procuring the dissolution of a temporary restraining order issued by his honor, Judge De Vore. Upon the hearing before Judge De Vore he dissolved the same, and dismissed that case as being without merit.

[1] Exceptions 1, 2, and 3 allege error, and deny that any attorney's fees can be recovered in this action. These exceptions are overruled. The appellant obtained the injunction, and put the respondents to the necessity of employing attorneys to obtain relief. It was decided by Judge De Vore that an unjust restriction had been placed upon the respondents by the action of the appellant; that the payment of attorney's fees was necessary on the part of the respondents, in order to obtain their rights; that to that extent they were damaged by the action of appellant in procuring the restraining order; and that under the bond of appellant he had agreed to pay such damages as respondents sustained. The employment of counsel and paying fees of counsel by respondents were damages natural to the obtaining of the order of injunction, and appellant should be required to pay a reasonable fee therefor.

[2, 3] Exceptions 4, 5, 6, and 7 will be considered together. They complain that his honor should have held that the regular attorney should have attended to the litigation, for his fixed yearly compensation, and that the respondents could not employ three different attorneys; that the allowance was excessive and unnecessary; that one of the attorneys who was paid a fee, had nothing to do with the vacation of injunction, but acted on an entirely different matter; and that it was error to allow for hire of automobile. Mr. Murray, according to the evidence, was not employed to attend to all matters of litigation. The respondents had the right to employ counsel to aid them in their duties and attend to the matters of litigation. They could select their own counsel and pay them a reasonable compensation, but they could not employ more lawyers than were necessary. We are bound to hold that they employed more counsel than was proper or necessary. Either of the three could have attended to the matter for them, and no doubt have gotten good results. A fee of $100 would have been ample compensation in a case of this character. No fees or costs should have been allowed, except for services for obtaining the order of dissolution of injunction.

The exceptions only question the allowance of attorney's fees and hire of automobile. Judge Memminger gave respondents judgment against the appellant for $208.90 and costs of the master, including $15 for stenographer and master in taxing his costs will not be allowed costs for taking down the testimony, as stenographer is paid for that. The judgment is modified by deducting $108.90 therefrom, as only $100 is allowed respondents for all counsel fees paid by them in this litigation.

Judge Memminger's decree, as modified, gives judgment for the sum of $100 and the costs of master to be taxed as indicated, and $15 for the stenographer taking the testimony before the master.

Modified.

DONALD v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE RY. CO. (No. 10685.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Master and servant §—286(1)—Negligence question for jury.

In action for death of an employé, where the evidence to sustain the specifications of negligence was susceptible of more than one inference, the question of negligence was for the jury.

2. Master and servant §—333—Judgment for injuries to servant held properly entered on verdict exonerating fellow servant joined as defendant.

In action against a railroad and one of its employes for death of another employé, an entry of a judgment for the defendant employé on verdict exonerating him does not require court to grant judgment for the railroad found negligent where the evidence conclusively shows that agents and servants of the railroad other than the one joined as defendant are guilty of negligence contributing as a proximate cause to the accident.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

Action by Margaret T. Donald, as administratrix, against the Atlantic Coast Line

Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rutledge, Hyde & Mann, of Charleston, for appellant.

Logan & Grace, of Charleston, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered on a verdict for $5,000 in favor of plaintiff against defendant, as damages, by reason of the death of Michael J. Murphy, an employé of the defendant railroad company, due to injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent and wanton acts of the defendant. The cause was tried by Judge Sease and a jury at the October term of court, 1920, for Charleston county; at the trial his honor eliminated from the jury the question of punitive damages.

The exceptions, three in number, raise the questions:

"First. Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to grant the motion for a nonsuit, made upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove by any sufficient testimony that the defendant railroad company was guilty of any act of negligence charged against it.

"Second. Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant railroad company, made upon the ground that the only inference from the testimony is that before the engine was moved due warning was given to Mr. Murphy, if he was then under the engine, that the engine was about to be moved.

"Third. Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to direct that judgment be entered in favor of the defendant railroad company, as well as the defendant Sheehan, upon the ground that the negligence claimed to be the basis of the recovery against the company was the negligence of the defendant Sheehan; and the jury having acquitted Sheehan of negligence, no verdict could properly stand, or judgment be entered thereon, against the defendant railroad company."

As to the exceptions alleging error in not granting a nonsuit or direction of a verdict, the plaintiff alleges as specifications of negligence:

"(a) By causing and allowing said engine No. 549 to move over the said Murphy while he was about the duties of his employment, so as to crush and mangle him.

"(b) In failing and omitting to see that the said Murphy whose whole attention was directed upon the work which he was required to do and who was totally unaware of the terrible danger in which he was placed, got himself into a position of safety before moving said engine No. 549.

"(c) In failing and omitting to give the said Murphy any notice or warning that said engine was about to be moved, so that he would know what was going on.

"(d) In not causing and requiring and seeing that the said Murphy was in a place of safety before moving said engine, which said defendants knew that the said Murphy was busily engaged in repairing, and his whole mind and attention was directed to his work.

"(e) In causing and allowing the said Thomas J. Sheehan, who was a machinist, and unauthorized to do so, to move said engine and thus cause the death of the said Michael J. Murphy.

"(f) In failing and omitting to provide the said Murphy with a reasonably safe place to work by reason of the facts above set forth."

[1] A reading of the evidence will determine in the affirmative that there was evidence to sustain some of the specifications of negligence, and that the evidence was susceptible of more than one inference, under a long line of decisions of this court this fact automatically carries the case to the jury, and it would have been reversible error on the part of his honor either to have granted a nonsuit or have directed a verdict as asked for.

The exceptions raising these questions are overruled.

[2] Exception raising the third question is overruled on the ground the evidence shows that Sheehan was not the only agency by which the deceased was injured and died. The evidence conclusively shows that other agents and servants were in some manner careless and negligent, which in some manner contributed as a proximate cause of deceased's injury and death.

The testimony shows that Sheehan was not the sole agency that brought about deceased's death.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Railroads  $\Leftrightarrow$  5 1/2, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal Director General not liable in punitive damages for willful tort of agents.

The federal Director General of Railroads in control of a railroad is not liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of his agents and servants.

On Petition for Rehearing.

2. Appeal and error  $\Leftrightarrow$  1151(1)—Appeal being from portion of verdict allowing punitive damages, judgment should have been modification of trial court's judgment to such extent.

Where defendant federal Director General of Railroads appealed only from such portion of verdict against him as allowed punitive damages for the willful tort of his agents and servants, the judgment of the Supreme Court should have been a modification to such extent of the judgment of the trial court, both for actual and punitive damages, and not an order for new trial nisi.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Jessie H. Massey against Walker D. Hines, Director General and Agent of Railroads. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment, in so far as for actual damages, affirmed, in so far as for punitive damages, reversed.

Glenn & Glenn, of Chester, and Thomas F. McDow, of York, for appellant.

Samuel E. McFadden, of Chester, and John R. Hart, of York, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. The sole question in this case is whether or not the Director General of Railroads while in federal control of a railroad is liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of his agents and servants.

[1] The question is answered in the negative by the decisions of this court in Rowell v. Hines, 114 S. C. 339, 103 S. E. 545; Ginn v. Hines, 114 S. C. 236, 103 S. E. 548, and by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Missouri, etc., Railroad Co. v. Ault, decided June 1, 1921, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —, where it is declared:

"The purpose for which the government permitted itself to be sued was compensation, not punishment."

The judgment of this court is that so much of the judgment of the circuit court as is for $8,000 actual damages, be affirmed, and that so much of the judgment as is for $12,000 punitive damages be reversed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS and FRASER, JJ., concur.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] The appellant herein has filed a petition for a rehearing of this appeal upon the ground that the appeal was only from such portion of the verdict as allowed punitive damages, and that the judgment of this court should have been a modification of the judgment to that extent, and not an order for a new trial nisi. The position of the appellant is sustained. Salley v. Railroad Co., 79 S. C. 388, 60 S. E. 988; Elmsom v. Railroad Co., 94 S. C. 431, 77 S. E. 723, 78 S. E. 231; DeLeach v. Railroad Co., 106 S. C. 155, 90 S. E. 701; Calhoun v. Railroad Co., 106 S. E. 781. The agreed case shows:

"The appellant now appeals to the Supreme Court from so much of the verdict and judgment as awarded punitive damages to the respondent, and asks that the verdict and judgment in so far as punitive damages are concerned be set aside and vacated. The appellant by this appeal makes no question as to the verdict for $8,000 actual damages, and only appeals from the verdict and judgment for punitive damages. The appellant does not ask for a new trial, but does ask that the verdict and judgment for $12,000 punitive damages be reversed, set aside, and vacated by this court."

The argument for the respondent states:

"Defendant appeals to this court only as against punitive damages awarded plaintiff, and upon the legal ground that under the law the defendant, Director General, as Agent of Railroads, cannot be sued for willfulness, and therefore no recovery, verdict, or judgment can be had against him for punitive damages. And this is the whole question presented by this appeal."

It is ordered that the judgment at the foot of the opinion which has been filed be stricken out, and the following substituted in lieu thereof:

The judgment of this court is that so much of the judgment of the circuit court as is for $8,000 actual damages be affirmed, and that so much of the judgment as is for $12,000 punitive damages be reversed.

RYAN v. NEW ENGLAND MUT. LIFE INS. CO. (No. 10672.)

Insurance §=668(15)—Whether insurer, in accepting usual premium and failing to reply to insured's letter stating his understanding of policy terms, waived payment of extra war premium held for jury.

Under a life insurance policy limiting the insurer's liability, unless the insured, if he engaged in military service in time of war, paid an extra premium within 31 days, where insured, more than 31 days after entering an officer's training school, wrote to the company's agent, informing him of such fact and asking whether, if he died in the service, his beneficiary could collect, to which the agent replied that she could, but that, when he received his commission, he must pay the extra premium, whereupon insured wrote, enclosing a check for the regular premium, and stating he understood from the agent's letter that until he went abroad there was no extra premium, and the agent accepted the premium and made no reply, such letter was admissible, the evidence showing it had been received, and the contents, if correctly stated by plaintiff, tending to show waiver, which was for the jury.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; M. L. Smith, Special Judge.

Action by Loretta M. Ryan against the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lee & Moise, of Sumter, and Buist & Buist, of Charleston, for appellant.

John H. Clifton, of Sumter, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action on a policy of life insurance, issued by the defendant, to Jno. B. Ryan, Jr., on the 26th of July, 1917, in the sum of $2,500, wherein his wife, the plaintiff, was named as the beneficiary.

The application of Jno. B. Ryan, Jr., for the insurance, contained these words:

"I further agree that said policy shall be void, if within five years from its date, I engage in military or naval service in time of war, without the written consent of the company previously obtained."

The supplemental application contains this provision:

"If within five years from the date of this policy the insured shall engage in any military or naval service in time of war, the liability of the company in event of the death of the insured while so engaged, or within six months thereafter, will be limited to the return of the premiums paid hereon, exclusive of any extra premium paid for military or naval service, less any indebtedness to the company hereon; unless before engaging in such service or within thirty-one days thereafter, or at the time of paying the first premium due hereon, if the insured shall be then so engaged, the insured shall pay to the company at its home office in Boston, Mass., such extra premium as may be required by the company, and in like manner shall pay annually thereafter on each anniversary of this policy or within thirty-one days thereafter, while the insured shall continue to be so engaged, such extra premium as may be required by the company."

The policy thus provides:

"This clause is by mutual agreement attached to said policy prior to its delivery, and is hereby expressly incorporated therein."

The plaintiff introduced in evidence the following letter:

"Greenville, S. C., Box 807, June 23, 1918.

"Mr. Robert J. Guinn, Atlanta, Ga.—Dear Sir: On May 15, 1918, I entered the service of the United States by becoming a member of the Fourth Officers' Training School at Camp Sevier. Will you advise me by return mail what effect this will have on my policy No. 337355, which was issued in July 1917.

"If I am killed or die in the service, whether while in this country or abroad, can my beneficiary collect this policy?

"Awaiting your reply before paying the premium due on July 26, 1918, I remain,

"Yours very truly, J. B. Ryan, Jr."

"I understand from yours of the 25th, that until I go abroad there is no extra war premium due on my policy.

"Yours very truly, J. B. Ryan, Jr.

"Please send receipt to Box 807, Greenville, S. C."

John B. Ryan, Jr., was commissioned a second lieutenant of infantry on the 25th of August, 1918, and died on the 4th of October, 1918.

The following statement appears in the record:

Letter from Jno B. Ryan, Jr., to R. J. Guinn, dated June 30, 1918, offered in evidence. The defendant's attorney objects to the introduction of the letter, there being no proof that it was ever mailed or received by Mr. Guinn, and that a waiver of a condition in a policy of insurance could not be established by an alleged letter claimed to have been written and mailed without proof that the same was received by the company or some officer or agent of the company.

The plaintiff testifies on cross-examination by defendant's attorney, and also on direct examination by plaintiff's attorney, that she wrote the letter in question, mailed it at the main post office in Greenville, S. C., duly stamped and addressed to Mr. Robert J. Guinn, at Atlanta, Ga. "I knew the address of Mr. Guinn, and had received letters from him." Over defendant's attorney's objection letter introduced in evidence and marked Exhibit D. "In this letter that my husband dictated to me, in which it says, 'Check inclosed for $81.50,' the check was put in that letter, in the letter of June 30, 1918. We left Camp Sevier about July. I don't remember the exact date, and went to Camp Gorden at Atlanta, and was called back to Camp Wadsworth. While in camp I kept copies of the letters. I had a book with carbon copies, and I wrote them and made the carbon copies. I had no typewriter."

R. J. Guinn thus testified in behalf of the defendant:

"The premium due in July, 1918, was paid to me by check. I had no original letter inclosing the check. There was no such letter that I remember. Usually no letter accompanied the check. I am positive that no letter came with this remittance. If any letter did come, I am positive no notice was sent with the premium that Mr. Ryan was in the service. I am positive that no letter came other than this: 'Enclosed find check for premium.' Most of them just send check with no letter. * * * I attend to all the correspondence out of the ordinary; all letters from the policy holders that required an answer were answered by me personally, or I would give direction as to how to answer the same. * * * I have made search of all letters in our files and all copies of letters, and have not found the original letter from John B. Ryan, Jr., alleged to have been written on June 30, 1918."

Upon the close of the defendant's testimony, the defendant moved to strike the letter from the record, on the ground that it had been admitted in evidence by reason of the presumption that the letter having been mailed according to the plaintiff's testimony, it was presumed to have been received, but that, the defendant's testimony having conclusively shown that the letter had not been received, the presumption had been rebutted. His honor refused to strike the letter from the record.

At the close of all the testimony, the defendant's attorneys made a motion for the direction of a verdict, which was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

The appellant's attorneys did not argue the exceptions separately, nor do we deem it necessary to consider them in detail.

There is no question, that the letter which Jno. B. Ryan, Jr., mailed to the defendant, inclosing the check for $81.50, in payment of the second premium, due on his policy of insurance, was delivered to the defendant. But the issue was whether the contents of the letter were correctly stated in the plaintiff's testimony. If so, they tended to show waiver on the part of the defendant, and the case was properly submitted to the jury.

Affirmed.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). The facts of this case are very clearly stated in the opinion of the Chief Justice.

In reference to the motion by the defendant to strike from the record the alleged letter from Ryan to Guinn, general agent of the defendant, dated June 30, 1918, the motion was properly refused. Mrs. Ryan testified that she personally mailed the original letter, of which that offered in evidence purported to be a copy, in the post office at Greenville, postage paid, containing check for $81.50. The presumption would arise that it was delivered in due course, and, coupled with the fact that the check was received and cashed, the burden of disproving receipt was upon the defendant. This raised an issue of fact which was properly submitted to the jury.

It was also a question of fact for their determination whether or not the purported copy truly represented the contents of the original letter. For the purpose of this appeal from the order refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, I will assume that the letter of June 30th was received by the defendant, and that the copy in evidence is a correct one.

The question for determination is whether or not the conduct of the general agent in reference to this letter constituted such evidence of waiver or estoppel as required the submission of that issue to the jury.

To restate the facts bearing immediately upon this issue: The policy was issued July 26, 1917, and the initial premium of $81.50 was paid at that time. On May 15, 1918, the insured entered an officers' training school, I assume not having enlisted at that time, but in fact entering the military service. On June 23, 1918, he wrote the general agent, notifying him of that fact and submitting to him this question, the answer to which he desired before paying the second premium:

—to which letter the general agent replied, June 25, 1918:

"In the event of your policy becoming a claim while you are in service, at home or abroad, the same is payable to your wife. But you will please be advised that when you receive your commission you will have to pay the extra war premium, which is $37.50 per thousand per year."

Then comes the questioned letter, dated June 30, 1918, from the insured to the general agent, acknowledging his letter of the 25th and inclosing check for $81.50, and closing with this statement:

"I understand from yours of 25th that until I go abroad there is no extra war premium due on my policy."

This letter, if received, does not appear to have been answered. The defendant cashed the check, applying it to the second ordinary premium due July 26, 1918. The insured was commissioned as second lieutenant in August, was transferred to Camp Gordon, and thence to Camp Wadsworth, where he died in the service on October 4th. No payment of the war premium was made by him, and no notice given to the defendant of his having been commissioned; the only notice given being June 23, 1918, of his having entered the Officers' Training School at Camp Sevier on May 15, 1918.

The condition quoted in the leading opinion from the application, providing for an annulment of the policy, is broader than the conditions set forth in the rider to the policy, which contains the war clause. The latter must control the former, and the former goes out of the case, particularly as it was shown that the letter of June 25th amounts to a waiver of the written permission required by the former.

The leading opinion declares that the contents of the letter of June 30, 1918, tended to show a waiver by the defendant of the requirement in question. It is an inadvertence, of course, to say that the contents of the letter could possibly have this effect; that letter simply contained a statement by the insured of his understanding of the conditions of the policy; what he thought could not bind the company. What was intended, I assume, is that the acceptance of the premium, accompanied as the remittance was with a statement of the insured's apprehension of the contract, unanswered and uncorrected, was evidence of such waiver. That is practically the sole issue in this appeal.

It will be noted that the insured was informed of the condition in the policy, and on June 23d, after he had entered the training school, but before he was enlisted or commissioned, anticipating that he would be commissioned, he made inquiry of the company as to the effect his entering the training school would have on his policy, and, further as to the effect of his dying in the service, in this country or abroad, information which he stated he needed "before paying the premium due on July 26, 1918." The general agent of the company promptly, two days later, on June 25th, replied in as plain language as could possibly be employed:

"When you receive your commission you will have to pay the extra war premium, which is $37.50 per thousand per year."

Following this letter, and specifically in reply to it, the insured, on June 30th, still prior to the date of his commission August 26th, and notwithstanding the plain terms of the policy and the plainer terms of the general agent's letter of June 25th, expresses his construction of the policy and the letter to be that no extra war premium was due upon his policy until he went abroad. This misconstruction does not appear to have been corrected by the general agent, and the contention of the plaintiff is that this conduct on his part was sufficient evidence of waiver to carry the case to the jury.

I adhere to the opinion expressed by me in the case of Watson v. W. O. W., 108 S. E. 145, recently filed, that the facts here do not present a case of forfeiture, and that therefore waiver has no application. My views stated therein need not be repeated here. Particular attention however is called to the quotation from the Arkansas Case of Miller v. Ass'n, 138 Ark. 442, 212 S. W. 310, 7 A. L. R. 378. See, also, Reid v. Assur. Co., 204 Mo. App. 643, 218 S. W. 957.

The real question is whether or not the failure of the general agent to correct the misapprehension of the wife of the insured expressed in the letter of June 30, purporting to have been signed by the insured, was such evidence of estoppel (not waiver) as justified or required the submission of that issue to the jury. In other words, it involved the application of the principle of estoppel by silence.

In the first place, it is by no means certain that, if the general agent had replied to that letter, stating to the insured that he was mistaken, that the policy in his possession plainly showed that the war assessment had to be paid within 31 days after his enlistment, that his letter of but 5 days before also plainly called his attention to this requirement, the insured would have paid the war assessment. It is entirely problematical; there is absolutely no evidence that he would. It is just as reasonable to suppose that he would, in order to have the war assessment, have kept the policy alive as to all contingencies except that not assumed by the company, suspended for the time being, to resume its normal state, as a bough when the restraining force is released.

But assume that he would have paid the assessment if his error had been corrected: The well-established principles of estoppel by silence demonstrate conclusively to my mind that they cannot avail the plaintiff under the admitted facts here. "To make the silence of a party operate as an estoppel, the circumstances must have been such as to render it his duty to speak." 16 Cyc. 759. What made it the duty of the general agent to correct so inexcusable an error? There was the policy; there was the letter of June 30th; nothing could have been plainer. "They would not hear Moses and the prophets"; a third impressment offered no hope that he would be convinced. "It is essential that he should have had knowledge of the facts, and that the adverse party should have been ignorant of the truth." Id. "It must appear that it was his duty to speak, and that his silence or passive conduct actually misled the other to his prejudice." Id. 761. There is nothing to show that if the error had been corrected the insured would have complied, and that he was therefore "actually misled." McCormac v. Evans, 107 S. C. 43, 92 S. E. 19.

"One is not estopped by silence when both parties know or have equal means of knowing the truth." 21 C. J. 1152, citing Wingert v. Snouffer & Ford, 134 Iowa, 97, 108 N. W. 1035, 111 N. W. 432; Spahr v. Cape, 143 Mo. App. 114, 122 S. W. 379; Garvey v. Harbison-Walker Refractories Co., 213 Pa. 177, 62 Atl. 778. The insured had not only the policy, but the letter of June 25th, and his first letter of the 23d, shows that his attention had been called to the subject. "The party relying thereon must not have had the means of knowing the true state of facts." 10 R. C. L. 684. The party claiming an estoppel has no right to shut his eyes to a condition that he not only has full opportunity of learning, but which is actually and pointedly called to his notice. Estoppel by silence is classed as a species of implied misrepresentation, a species of fraud. How can this implication stand in the light of the express provisions of the policy and the letter of June 25th? "Estoppel by silence can only arise when the silence would amount to a fraud, actual or constructive." 21 C. J. 1152. Is there the faintest suggestion of such a thing in the conduct of the general agent? As is held in Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 368:

"There is not the slightest evidence warranting the belief that their silence or nonaction was induced by an intention to deceive."

From these conclusions, it is my opinion it follows that the circuit judge was in error in not directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the premiums paid, as requested by the defendant.

I think that he was in error also in excluding the testimony of Miss Hanft, the stenographer, to the effect that if the letter of June 30th had been received she would have corrected the apparent misapprehension of the insured. Ordinarily testimony of what a witness would have done under certain assumed circumstances is too speculative and uncertain to have any great probative force, although such testimony in the matter of the delivery of a telegram has frequently been received. Wallingford v. Tel. Co., 53 S. C. 410, 31 S. E. 275. But is a case of this nature, where the plaintiff relies upon estoppel by silence, so much a matter of intention, good faith, the absence of fraud, or a purpose to deceive, the testimony should have been received as throwing light upon the essential feature.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; Frank B. Gary, Judge.

Suit by W. S. Gordon and another against J. R. Bell and others, trustees, etc. Decree for defendants, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Nickles, of Abbeville, for appellants.
William P. Greene, of Abbeville, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an action for injunction, and is an appeal from an order of his honor Judge Gary. The only question raised by the appeal is whether children can be legally transferred from one school district within the same county without the consent of the trustees of the district to which the transfer is sought to be made. The solution of this question depends on whether the act of 1912 (Act Feb. 23, 1912 [27 St. at Large, p. 619]), with reference to the transfer of children from one school district to another was repealed by the passage of the act of 1919 (Act Feb. 21, 1919 [31 St. at Large, p. 63]) on the same subject. The question since the act of 1919 is purely academic, except for the costs of this case, and that is practically the only substance now in the case.

[1, 2] His honor Judge Gary held that the amendatory act of 1912 was a valid enactment and should be given force, unless it was subsequently repealed by the act of 1919, and that the act of 1919 did not repeal the act of 1912; that there was no expression in the act of 1919 indicating an intention to repeal the act of 1912, and there was no inconsistency or repugnancy between the two acts. The two acts must be read together and effect given to each unless they are totally inconsistent. The statutes in question relate to the same subject-matter. No intention is expressed in the latter act to repeal the former act. They must be construed together and effect given to each.

The passage of the act of 1919 was an amendment to section 1756, which had been heretofore amended by the act of 1912, and was in effect simply another amendment, and was in no manner inconsistent with or in conflict with the same. The acts relate to different things. The amendments are the law of the subject. One is not dependent on the other. Both stand, and the objects and provisions sought in one amendment are not affected by the other amendment.

All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by E. G. King, as guardian ad litem, against Casper Holliday and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Martin & Blythe, of Greenville, for appellants.

Bonham & Price, of Greenville, for respondent.

WATTS, J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment entered on a verdict for $2,000; $1,500 actual and $500 punitive damages. The case was for personal injuries sustained by James Hoyt King, a minor four years of age at the time of the injury July 12, 1917. The injury was caused by an automobile owned by Casper Holliday and driven by W. C. Walker. The case was first tried before Judge Peurifoy and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $500. Judge Peurifoy granted a new trial, and the cause was then tried before Judge De Vore and a jury at the September term of court, 1920, for Greenville county. After verdict rendered defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The defendants then appealed, and by 11 exceptions impute error and ask for reversal. At the hearing the ninth exception was withdrawn. Exceptions 1 and 2 question the language of the charge of his honor in charging as follows:

"I charge you as matter of law that if a person is traveling upon the public highway and sees an object in the highway, especially if he is driving a dangerous machine, it does not make any difference what the object is, he must use caution and care and prudence, as a person of ordinary reason and prudence would use, so as to avoid injury either to himself or to the person who is driving the car or to the object upon the highway, if it be capable of being injured."

We see no error in this, it was a plain statement by his honor as to the duty of a person driving a car on the public highway to use ordinary reason and prudence to avoid injury to himself and others, and is good, sound law, well charged. He charged the law applicable to the issues and evidence, did not intimate any opinion, but left the facts entirely to the jury for their determination.

[2] Complaint is also made that the court imposed a liability upon the defendants for negligence in not keeping a proper lookout, and in not stopping the car if they could have seen the child, although the jury may have found that the child was not using the road as a traveler and not making a reasonable use of same, in which case the defendants would be liable only for willfulness. These exceptions are overruled. The injured, a child under seven years of age, is incapable of committing a trespass, or being negligent, and it makes no difference what use he was making of the highway.

[3] It is the duty of drivers of automobiles on the public streets and highways to observe due care and caution, as a person of ordinary care and caution is required, so as to avoid injury to themselves and their property and injury to the persons and property of others. Exceptions 5 and 6, 7, and 8 are overruled. His honor did not allude to any person; he told the jury in clear, plain language the care that an ordinary, prudent person must exercise under certain circumstances while traveling on the public highways. He gave a fair and clear declaration of the law of the case, and we were impressed at the argument before us that appellants did not seriously rely on exceptions 7 and 8.

Exception 10 is overruled. The court did all it could under the circumstances developed. Appellants cannot complain; they got all they were entitled to as the result of the medical examination. His honor's ruling was clearly right. Exception 11 is overruled under authorities. Ex parte Hilton, 64 S. C. 206, 41 S. E. 978, 92 Am. St. Rep. 800; State v. Ballew, 83 S. C. 86, 63 S. E. 688, 64 S. E. 1019, 18 Ann. Cas. 569; and State v. Browning, filed June, 1921, 108 S. E. 105.

All exceptions are overruled.

MULLINAX v. HAMBRIGHT et al.
(No. 10706.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

Highways §96(1)—Complaint alleging negligence by highway commission held sufficient.

A complaint alleging that deceased was killed on account of the willful and careless conduct of defendants, their agents and servants, and that the defendants constitute a highway commission, is good against demurrer, since defendants are liable for their wrongful or careless misconduct as such commissioners, even though they may not be liable for the acts of their employes.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, Cherokee County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by John Mullinax, administrator, against J. B. Hambright and others for death by wrongful act. From a judgment sustaining demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 115 S. C. 76, 104 S. E. 309.

N. W. Hardin, of Blacksburg, for appellant.

Dobson & Vassy, and Butler & Hall, all of Gaffney, for respondents.

FRASER, J. This is an action for death by wrongful act. The complaint alleges that the deceased was killed on account of the willful, reckless, and careless conduct of the defendants, their agents and servants, and that the defendants compose and constitute the Cherokee highway commission.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the defendants are not liable for the negligence of subordinates engaged in the work. The demurrer was sustained.

The statute gives a right of action where death is caused by the wrongful act of another. It may be that on the trial it will appear that the death was caused, not by the negligence of the defendants, but by others for whose conduct the defendants are not responsible. But the complaint alleges that the death was caused by the wrongful act of the defendants, and in so alleging stated a good cause of action.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). The circuit judge in my opinion was entirely justified in sustaining the demurrer, and the order appealed from should be affirmed, for the very clear and convincing reasons assigned by him.

It is conceded that a public servant or agent is responsible for his personal tort while engaged in the public service, or for the torts of his subordinates employed by or under him, when he has specifically directed, or personally co-operated in the negligent act which caused the injury; and this regardless of the immunity of the governmental agency which he represents. The converse of this proposition is thus expressed by the authorities:

"It is a well-settled rule that a public officer is not responsible for the acts or omissions of subordinates properly employed by or under him, if such subordinates are not in his private service, but are themselves servants of the government, unless he has directed such acts to be done, or has personally co-operated in the negligence." 23 A. & E. 382.

In Robertson v. Sichel, 127 U. S. 507, 8 Sup. Ct. 1286, 32 L. Ed. 203, the court declares:

"A public officer or agent is not responsible for the misfeasances or positive wrongs, or for the nonfeasances, or negligences, or omissions of duty, of the subagents or servants or other persons properly employed by or under him, in the discharge of his official duties."

In 29 Cyc. 1445, it is said:

"Public officers are not, as a general rule, liable for the acts of subordinates, even where such subordinates are employees rather than officers, except where the negligence of such subordinates is attributable to the superior."

In 22 R. C. L. 487:

"Public officers and agents of the government are not liable for the acts or defaults, negligence, or omissions of subordinate officials in the public service, whether appointed by them or not, unless they direct the act complained of to be done, or personally co-operate in the negligence from which the injury results. Where the subordinates have been appointed by them it is sufficient if they have employed trustworthy persons of suitable skill and ability, and have not been negligent in selecting such subordinates."

The liability of the highway commissioners, public officers and servants, is therefore exceptional; and if the plaintiff should desire to fix liability upon them it is essential that he bring himself within the exceptions, which he has utterly failed to do.

The allegation in the complaint that the tort was committed by the "defendants, their agents, and servants," is not a charge of direct negligence on the part of the defendants, but is plainly an effort to hold them liable for the tort of "their agents and servants"; this is necessarily the effect taken in connection with the act creating the commission, as will appear.

The office of a county highway commissioner, created by an act establishing such a commission, for the purpose of financing and directing in a general way the work of highway improvement, usually under a bond issue, is a patriotic and gratuitous service, undertaken at a personal sacrifice. Few men would be found willing to accept it with a burden such as the plaintiff proposes to place upon it; the personal responsibility of the officer for any act of negligence committed by a subordinate.

Judicial cognizance is taken of the act creating the Cherokee county commission; the duties of the commission are entirely supervisory; the actual work is directed to be done "by and through its engineers and other officers employed by it." It would be anomalous to hold, as this court held upon the former appeal (115 S. C. 76, 104 S. E. 309) that the commission cannot be held liable for the alleged tort, and now to hold that the individual members of that commission may be, in the absence of an allegation that they directed or co-operated in the act which resulted in the injury, and in the face of the statute which requires that the work be done by others.

In the case of Vermillion v. College, 111 S. C. 156, 97 S. E. 619, the court held that a charitable corporation, from motives of public policy, could or would not be held liable for its corporate negligence; a greater reason, it appears to me, exists for extending immunity to these faithful servants, men usually selected for their high business ability and patriotic disposition engaged in a gratuitous and thankless service.

The plaintiff is not left without remedy; those who caused the injury are legally responsible. If they are not financially responsible, it is but the common misfortune of having a penniless debtor; it is no justification for making him pay who can, regardless of his culpability.

Action by Ferdinand Sullivan against Peter Calhoun and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

J. J. McSwain and Oscar Hodges, both of Greenville, for appellants.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, of Greenville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The question raised by the exceptions is whether the plaintiff, under the allegations of the complaint, was entitled to punitive damages.

The complaint is as follows:

"(1) That in February, 1918, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendants, for the occupation and cultivation of about five acres of land on the Augusta road, near the city of Greenville, which belongs to the defendant Sarah Calhoun, for the year 1919, the defendants furnishing the stock and the plaintiff the labor upon an equal division of the crop when made; that plaintiff pitched the crop and laid it by, and on or about the 18th of July, without just cause or excuse, the defendants ran the plaintiff off said premises, gathered the crop, and refused to make an account to the plaintiff of his part thereof.

"(2) That the net proceeds of the crop amounted to about $600, one-half of which the plaintiff was entitled to.

"(3) That the conduct of the defendants was in willful violation of the plaintiff's right in the premises, and that he has been damaged by their said conduct in the sum of $500.00."

There was testimony tending to sustain the allegations of the complaint. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $375 actual damages, and for $100 punitive damages, whereupon the defendants appealed.

[1] The appellants contend that the complaint does not allege fraud. It is not necessary to allege fraud in direct terms; it being sufficient if the facts are stated from which it is necessarily implied.

[2] Not only does the complaint allege that the defendants willfully violated the contract, but also that they took exclusive possession of the plaintiff's one-half interest in the crop. This allegation is sufficient to constitute fraud.

In 12 R. C. L. 229, the rule is thus stated:

"Fraud assumes so many hues and forms, that courts are compelled to content themselves with comparatively few general rules for its discovery and defeat, and allow the facts and circumstances peculiar to each case to bear heavily upon the conscience and judgment of the court or jury in determining its presence or absence. While it has often been said that fraud cannot be precisely defined, the books contain many definitions, such as unfair dealing; the unlawful appropriation of another's property by design."

The foregoing is in harmony with the decisions rendered by this court. In Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 8 Ann. Cas. 407 (in which the doctrine was announced that punitive damages are recoverable when there has been a fraudulent breach of the contract), the court used this language:

"In the case of Lee v. Lee, 11 Rich. Eq. 574, the court quotes with approval the following language from Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 139: 'To insist on what was really a mortgage as a sale is, in equity, a fraud, which cannot be successfully practised under the shelter of any written papers, however precise and complete they may appear to be.' Under the allegations of the complaint it was a fraudulent act on the part of the defendant, when he intentionally disposed of the land as the owner thereof, knowing that it was conveyed to him by way of mortgage, and that it belonged to the plaintiff (but, of course, subject to the mortgage)."

Appeal dismissed.

LEOPARD v. BEAVER DUCK MILLS.
(No. 10697.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Master and servant §=101, 102(1)—Duty to provide reasonably safe place.

It is the duty of the master to provide the servant a reasonably safe place to work.

2. Master and servant §=287(7)—Negligence of employee in charge for master held question for jury.

Where a card grinder when employed was directed to another card grinder for assignment to work, and by him told to put a screen in a machine, and while doing so was injured when the other card grinder put the machinery in motion, a verdict was erroneously directed for defendant, as the testimony tended to show that the place of work was rendered dangerous by one in charge for the master, without notice to plaintiff.

Cotheran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by T. L. Leopard against Beaver Duck Mills. From a judgment on a directed verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Martin & Henry, of Greenville, for appellant.

Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The plaintiff's testimony tends to show: The plaintiff was employed as a card grinder in the defendant mill. While he was employed as an expert card grinder, he was new in the mill, and was directed to another card grinder, Atkins, for assignment to work. Atkins gave the plaintiff a screen, and told him to set it into the machine. The setting in of the screen ordinarily took about an hour. The screen was very near a very heavy cylinder, covered with teeth to catch the cotton. If the cylinder was still, the work was safe, but if the machinery should be set in motion, it became exceedingly dangerous. When the plaintiff had been working about 15 or 20 minutes, the other card grinder started the cylinder in motion. It caught the plaintiff's hand, and produced the injury complained of. The trial judge directed a verdict for the defendant. From the judgment entered on a directed verdict this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] There are several exceptions, but one question only need be considered. It is the duty of the master to provide the servant a reasonable safe place to work. There is testimony tending to show that the place at which the plaintiff was put to work was safe enough when he started to work, but rendered very dangerous by one in charge for the master, and this change was made without notice to the plaintiff and caused the injury. Hunter v. Alderman, 89 S. C. 506, 71 S. E. 1084:

"The following rule, stated in Brabham v. Tel. Co., 71 S. C. 53, 50 S. E. 716, has been followed in many cases: 'In determining who are fellow servants, the test or rule in this state is not whether the servants are of different grade, rank, or authority, one of them having power to control and direct the services of another, but the test is in the character of the act being performed by the offending servant, whether it was the performance of some duty which the master owed to the injured servant, the performance of which duty the master intrusted to the offending servant.'"

It is true that Atkins said he asked the plaintiff to listen for defects, and the plaintiff, instead of doing so, put his hand in the dangerous place. The jury should have been allowed to settle that matter. The exception that raises this question is sustained.

The other questions refer to errors peculiar to the first trial, and need not be considered.

The judgment is reversed.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHERAN, J. (dissenting). I think the facts and the law of this case thoroughly justify the action of Judge Prince in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant upon the grounds stated by him.

The facts are these: The defendant owns and operates a cotton mill at Greenville. Its principal officers were Moody, superintendent, Meredith, boss carder, and two section hands, E. H. Atkins and his brother, Bowen Atkins. The duty of E. H. Atkins as a section hand was to direct the hands in his section in the operation of the cards. Along with this duty was that of card grinder, a manual service. On the occasion of the injury it became necessary to overhaul certain of the card machines, the process being to take them apart, grind the cards, and set the machines up again. Atkins had authority to call to his assistance any of the hands in his section. On Saturday before the accident on Monday, the plaintiff applied to Meredith, the boss carder for work, representing himself as an experienced card grinder. He was employed, and on Monday reported for work. Meredith took him to Atkins, and instructed him to work under the direction of Atkins. A certain card had been dismantled and ground and was to be set back up again. Atkins and Leopard then proceeded to do this work, and worked upon it for about two hours. They set the "licker-in" in its socket, and then Atkins told Leopard to set the screen at the other end of the machine. To do this Leopard had to put his hand very close to the cylinder upon which the card teeth were fixed. While he was so engaged, Atkins, without notice to Leopard, turned the cylinder, and the plaintiff's hand was caught between the cylinder and the screen, causing the injury for which he asked damages.

It is clear from the foregoing statement, taken most favorably to the plaintiff: (1) That Atkins was a superior servant to Leopard, with the right to direct his movements; (2) that Atkins and Leopard were engaged in the common undertaking of dismantling, grinding, and setting up the card machines; (3) that Atkins directed Leopard to set the screen; (4) that while Leopard was so engaged Atkins turned the cylinder which caught and injured Leopard's hand; (5) that the injury resulted from the negligence of Atkins in not giving Leopard notice of his intention to turn the cylinder.

After the close of all the testimony, in fact after the motion had been refused and the jury had wrestled with the case for some hours, the circuit judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, upon the ground that Atkins and Leopard were fellow servants, and the defendant could not be held responsible for the negligence of Atkins.

The pivotal question in the case, therefore, is whether or not under these circumstances Atkins and Leopard were fellow servants; an affirmative solution of the question absolving the defendant from the legal consequences of the negligent act of Atkins, and justifying the direction of a verdict for the defendant by the circuit judge.

Among the many theories in reference to the relation of fellow servants, this court has adopted with emphasis and reiteration this: The question whether a delinquent servant was or was not a vice principal, as regards the injured person, is ultimately determinable by the character of the act which by his negligence caused the injury, regardless of the fact that the delinquent servant was of a higher rank, grade, or authority, and had the power to control and direct the services of the other; that the superior servant rule, so far as that relation may compel the conclusion of vice principalship, does not obtain. This is the rule in the federal courts, Supreme and subordinate, Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin. 4 Labatt (2d Ed.) p. 4413.

The principle is thus expressed in Brabham v. Postal Co., 71 S. C. 53, 50 S. E. 716:

"In determining who are fellow servants, the test or rule in this state is not whether the servants are of different grade, rank or authority, one of them having power to control and direct the services of another, but the test is the character of the act being performed by the offending servant, whether it was the performance of some duty the master owed to the injured servant, the performance of which duty the master had intrusted to the offending servant."

Similarly in B. & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 13 Sup. Ct. 914, 37 L. Ed. 772:

"The question turns rather on the character of the act than on the relations of the employees to each other. If the act is one done in the discharge of some positive duty of the master to the servant, then negligence in the act is the negligence of the master; but if it be not one in the discharge of such positive duty, then there should be some personal wrong on the part of the employer before he is held liable therefor."

And in Justice v. Pennsylvania Co., 130 Ind. 321, 30 N. E. 303:

"On the other hand, if, at the time of the alleged negligence, the servant was not engaged in the performance of a duty which the master owed to his servants, but was in the discharge of a duty which the servant acting owed to the master, he will be held to be a fellow servant with others engaged in the same common business, and the master will not be liable for any injury inflicted upon such fellow servant by reason of his negligence."

To the same effect are Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co., 64 N. J. Law, 605, 46 Atl. 711, 50 L. R. A. 417; McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, 22 Atl. 1094, 29 Am. St. Rep. 181; Curley v. Hoff, 62 N. J. Law, 758, 42 Atl. 731; Filke v. Railroad Co., 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545; Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 46, 36 Am. Rep. 575; Schroeder v. Railroad Co., 103 Mich. 213, 61 N. W. 663, 29 L. R. A. 321, 50 Am. St. Rep. 354; Gilmore v. American Tube & Stamping Co., 79 Conn. 498, 66 Atl. 4; Railroad Co. v. Barker, 169 Ind. 670, 83 N. E. 369, 17 L. R. A. (N. Co.*, 67 N. J. Law, 646, 52 Atl. 565, 58 L. R. A. 808; Railroad Co. v. Peterson, 162 U. S. 346, 16 Sup. Ct. 843, 40 L. Ed. 994.

The rule laid down in Brabham v. Postal Co. has been reaffirmed in the following cases: Martin v. Royster Guano Co., 72 S. C. 237, 51 S. E. 680; Pagan v. So. Ry. Co., 78 S. C. 413, 59 S. E. 32, 13 Ann. Cas. 1105; James v. Mfg. Co., 80 S. C. 232, 61 S. E. 391; Goodman v. Tel. Co., 87 S. C. 449, 69 S. E. 1089; Hunter v. Alderman, 89 S. C. 502, 71 S. E. 1082; Gibbes v. Phosph. Co., 93 S. C. 193, 76 S. E. 464; Tucker v. Mills, 76 S. C. 539, 57 S. E. 626, 121 Am. St. R.

In Wilson v. Railroad Co., 51 S. C. 79, 28 S. E. 91, the present Chief Justice thus, for the court, declares the rule:

"When persons are employed in a common undertaking, all sustain toward each other the relation of fellow servants when exercising only the ordinary duties of their employment, even when they cannot see each other, or are working apart and not in conjunction. But if an employee sustains an injury through the negligence of a coemployee, while such coemployee is performing the duties of the master, the master cannot defeat his recovery on the ground that they are fellow servants."

In Gunter v. Graniteville Mfg. Co., 18 S. C. 262, 44 Am. Rep. 573, the court declares:

"The true test is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master; if so, then he cannot be regarded as a fellow servant or collaborer with the operatives, but is the representative of the master, and any negligence on his part in the performance of the duty of the master thus delegated to him must be regarded as the negligence of the master."

"The question is as to the nature of the duty, not as to the rank or grade of the person employed to perform it. Is it a duty which the master owes to his servants?" Calvo v. Railroad Co., 23 S. C. 529, 55 Am. Rep. 28.

"Whether the employee whose negligence caused the injury was or was not a vice principal is determined by the nature of the functions which he was, as a matter of fact, discharging at the time when the injury was received, and not by the appellation by which he was designated." 4 Labatt (2d Ed.) § 1434.

"In other words the function of giving directions as to the proper manner of performing the work is not one of those absolute personal functions for the careful discharge of which a master is responsible, whatever agents he may employ." 4 Labatt (2d Ed.) § 1442.

"Servants employed at the same kind of work, except that one has authority to give directions to the other as to the manner of doing the work, are fellow servants." 4 Labatt (2d Ed.) § 1445, note, page 4175, citing Postal Co. v. Hulsey, 115 Ala. 193, 22 South. 854.

"The practical effect of this theory is that the defense of common employment is excluded or allowed to prevail, according as the delinquency in question was or was not a breach of what the law regards as a direct, personal, and absolute obligation, from which nothing but performance can relieve the master." 4 Labatt (2d Ed.) § 1479.

"If the act causing the injury is committed while the employee, however high his grade may be in other matters, is merely carrying out the details of the work, he is in respect to that act only a fellow servant, for whose negligence the master is not liable to other servants." 18 R. C. L. 747.

"If the delinquency of the foreman or boss consists in one of the nondelegable duties of the employer, the latter will be deemed liable, whereas if the fault is merely in respect of an act of service, as it is termed, no liability attached by reason thereof." 18 R. C. L. 753.

"It is the duty to be performed, and not the name of the officer, that determines this question." Mr. Justice Fraser, in Halsall v. Railroad Co., 96 S. C. 308, 80 S. E. 467.

"It is the nature of the duty, and not the right to control, that governs this case" Mr. Justice Fraser, in Williams v. Railroad Co., 105 S. C. 468, 90 S. E. 27.

"The fact that the pit boss was for some purposes a vice principal did not necessarily make him a vice principal in everything that he did. If he acted as an operative only, the liability of his master for his acts was not other or different from that which would result with reference to the acts of any other operative." Cavanaugh v. Centerville Co., 131 Iowa, 700, 109 N. W. 398, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 907.

"One servant, however, may be, in relation to a coservant, a vice principal in one relation and a fellow servant in another, depending on the particular duties he is discharging at the time." Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Phillips, 100 Va. 362, 41 S. E. 726.

In Marks v. Railroad Co., 146 N. Y. 181, 40 N. E. 782, it is held in substance that the moment that an employee, not vice principal for general purposes, but who has authority to hire an emergency assistant, has completed such a hiring, and after having resumed his place as servant, enters upon the performance of his work as such, he ceases to represent the master, and becomes a fellow servant of the assistant for all purposes.

The responsibility of a master for the performance by a servant of the master's non-delegable duties is based upon the principle of "Qui facit per alium, facit per se," whether those duties be owing to a servant or a stranger; his responsibility to a stranger for the servant's delict in delegable duties is based upon the principle of respondeat superior, which in turn finds its support, not in substantive law, but in public policy. Public policy does not demand or justify that the master should be so responsible to an injured servant for a breach of the delegable duties by a fellow servant. He may sue the offending servant, but to make the master liable, unless that servant is taking the place of the master, is contrary to reason and justice, and has therefore no support in public policy.

Fortunately, for the sake of this great desideratum in the law, the principle has been definitely and certainly fixed in this state; the only difficulty remaining being the application of it to the facts of this particular case. If Atkins in the tortious act was performing, or attempting to perform, one of the absolute, nondelegable duties which the defendant as master owed to the plaintiff as servant, he was a vice principal, the representative of the master, and his negligence was the negligence of the defendant, for the consequences of which it must respond; if, on the other hand, the defendant as master had fully complied with the several obligations due by it to the plaintiff as servant, and the tortious act of Atkins was a personal act of negligence on his part, a breach of his obligations to the common master, a delinquency in his service, a default in the details of the work, a misuse of the safe places or instrumentalities supplied by the defendant, while engaged with the injured servant in the common undertaking immediately in hand, Atkins and Leopard were, pro hac vice, fellow servants, and the defendant would not be responsible for the consequences of Atkins' carelessness.

The question may be determined upon the principle of exclusion, by defining in the first place the absolute, nondelegable duties of the master, and then by demonstrating that the act of Atkins was not committed in the furtherance of any of them. The terms "nondelegable" and "nonassignable," applied to the absolute duties of the master, do not happily convey the idea intended, for in a sense every duty of the master is assignable or delegable, and in the case of a corporation necessarily so; the simple term "absolute" more accurately defines a duty that is continuous upon the master, one which he cannot relieve himself of by delegating or assigning its performance to a servant.

The absolute duties of a master in the sense indicated are: To provide a reasonably safe place for the servant to work, and exercise reasonable care in maintaining it in that condition; to provide reasonably sound, safe, and suitable instrumentalities for the servant to work with, and to exercise reasonable care in maintaining them in that condition; to exercise reasonable care in the selection of competent servants and a sufficient number for the work in hand; to exercise reasonable care in the supervision of the servants and in the inspection of the place and instrumentalities provided; to promulgate rules reasonably adequate for the proper conduct of the work in hand; to warn the servant of concealed and unknown dangers; to warn inexperienced servants of the dangers of the work; and others which may have escaped attention.

The facts show, not only that not a single one of these duties, or any other that may be recalled, was neglected by the defendant as master, but, what is the nerve of the controversy, not a single one of them was delegated to Atkins, and, conclusively, that the act which he committed was not in the furtherance of any one of them.

The only contention that could possibly arise is that the act of Atkins made the plaintiff's place of work unsafe, and that that, therefore, constituted a breach of the master's duty in this regard. If that position were tenable, the immunity of a master from liability on account of the negligence of a fellow servant of the injured servant is a myth; for every act of a fellow servant causing injury to another renders the place of work for the time being unsafe. This contention is answered by the following authorities:

"The duty devolving upon the master to provide the servants a safe place to work, in the first instance, is one which cannot be delegated so as to relieve the master from liability on the ground that the negligence was the act of a fellow servant. So the master cannot escape liability by relying on the fellow-servant rule when the place of work afterwards becomes unsafe, and he knew, or ought to have known, of its unsafe condition and failed to remedy it within a reasonable time when a servant is injured by reason thereof. This rule does not extend, however, to negligent acts of a servant making a place unsafe, nor when the negligence relates to the details of arrangement and execution in keeping a safe place." 26 Cyc. 1322.

This court in Jenkins v. Railroad Co., 39 S. C. 507, 18 S. E. 182, 39 Am. St. Rep. 750, quotes the following with approval, as the "statement of a learned judge" (Howard v. Denver & R. G. Ry. Co. [C. C.] 26 Fed. 837):

"So far as the place and machinery, both were safe. There is no pretense that the track was not in good order, or that the engines and other implements for the movement or control of the train were not sufficient. It will not do to say that because Ryan's engine was in the way and collided with decedent's train the track was not clear, and therefore the master had failed in his duty of providing a 'safe place' for the employees to work in and upon. The negligent use by one employee of perfectly safe machinery will seldom be adjudged a breach of the master's duty of providing a safe place for the employees. Such a construction would make any negligent misplacement of a switch, any collision of trains, even any negligent dropping of tools about a factory, a breach of the duty of providing a 'safe place.' The true idea is that the place and the instruments must in themselves be safe, for this is what the master's duty fairly compels, and not that the master must see that negligent handling by an employee of the machinery shall not create danger," etc.

The place was safe, the appliances were safe; the negligence consisted in the act of Atkins turning the cylinder without giving notice of his purpose to Leopard.

"The failure of an employee, in performing the work which he is directed to do, to give a fellow employee warning when doing an act which may endanger him, is not a fault attributable to the employer." 18 R. C. L. 714, citing Desautels v. Cloutier, 189 Mass. 349, 75 N. E. 703, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 669, 109 Am. St. Rep. 641.

Illustrations of the application of the principle demonstrate the correctness of the circuit judge's ruling.

In Wilson v. Chemical Co., 78 S. C. 381, 58 S. C. 1019, the deceased was one of a gang of laborers under a foreman named Sanders, engaged in shoveling rock loaded from the space in front of a door, through which rock loaded in cars was being unloaded into a building. Robinson was foreman of a gang pushing cars up to the door. The injury occurred from the failure to give notice of the approach of the car. The court held:

"Sam Robinson was foreman of the gang pushing the car. He and Sanders were nothing more than gang foremen, both working under the orders of Happolt, who was the boss in charge of all the laborers, referred to in the testimony. These foremen had no power to hire laborers, provide machinery, or the place of labor, or to do any duty imposed by law on the master. They were therefore fellow servants of the deceased, and the master is not responsible for their negligence."

In Goodman v. Telegraph Co., 87 S. C. 449, 69 S. E. 1089, the injured servant was one of a telegraph line force engaged in stringing wires and working under a foreman named Melon, who had the authority of not only directing the squad, but of employing and discharging hands. The plaintiff was required to climb the pole and fasten the wire to the bracket; the line was then to be pulled tight by the men on the ground, but not until the plaintiff had notified them that it had been tied. Without notice from or warning to the plaintiff the wire was tightened prematurely, and he was jerked to the ground. The record is not entirely clear whether the foreman pulled the wire or gave the order therefor; but as the case went off upon the ground that the plaintiff and foreman were fellow servants, it is assumed that his negligent act was the cause of the injury. The court after quoting from 26 Cyc. 1364, declares:

"At the time of the injury the duties of Melon were in no way connected with the employment and discharging of servants, but he was merely discharging the duties of a fellow servant, as foreman of the gang."

In Gibbes v. Phosphate Co., 93 S. C. 193, 76 S. E. 464, the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a pile of fertilizer sacks, which he alleged were negligently stacked up, not "tied," as they should have been, and that he was negligently ordered to work in this unsafe place by the foreman. It appeared that the offending servant was not only a foreman, but a common laborer along with the plaintiff. The court held that the foreman was not a vice principal, and that the case was ruled by the Brabham and Martin Cases, which established the relation of fellow servants between the plaintiff and the foreman. The distinction is clearly illustrated by the case of Leopard v. Laurens Cotton Mills, 81 S. C. 15, 61 S. E. 1029. There the plaintiff, a youth of tender years, was put to work in a cotton mill under a specific agreement with his father that he would not be put to work in a dangerous place. Independently of that agreement, it was the duty of the master to warn the inexperienced youth of the dangers of the work assigned him; and, when the master delegated that duty to a subordinate, it was the delegation of a duty which the master owed the servant, nondelegable, and the subordinate was the immediate representative of the master, for whose negligence the master was responsible.

In Koon v. Railroad Co., 69 S. C. 101, 48 S. E. 86, the distinction is also clearly illustrated. There the negligence alleged was a defective appliance which was selected by one otherwise a fellow servant of the injured servant. The court held that it was a non-delegable duty on the part of the master to exercise care in the selection of reasonably safe appliances, and that the servant who was charged with this duty was pro hac vice the representative of the master.

The case of Hunter v. Alderman, 89 S. C. 502, 71 S. E. 1082, is readily distinguishable from the case at bar. There the plaintiff was assured by the manager of the sawmill that the mill would not run that day. He was down in the saw pit, engaged in sharpening and adjusting the saw. The foreman of a gang of laborers, who had authority to employ and discharge and to direct the fireman when to blow the whistle, ordered him to do so. The valve was opened, and the machinery operating the saw set in motion, causing the injury. The foreman was not engaged with the plaintiff in his work. The court held that:

"If it be true that the master assumed this special obligation to keep the place of labor safe by not starting the machinery, and it was started by the direction of a person who was intrusted by the master with the authority to require an act to be done which would start the machinery, such act would be the act of the master, and such person the representative of the master in that particular act."

In the case of Alaska Mining Co. v. Whelan, 168 U. S. 86, 18 Sup. Ct. 40, 42 L. Ed. 390, the injured servant was one of a squad engaged in breaking rock and preparing them to go in a chute, under the direction and control of a foreman. He was directed to break rock over one of the chutes, and while so engaged the foreman drew the gate at the mouth of the chute, causing the rock at the head of the chute to be suddenly drawn in, carrying the plaintiff with it, a distance of 30 feet, covering him with rock and debris, thereby greatly injuring him. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, holding:

"Finley [the foreman] was not a vice principal or representative of the corporation. He was not the general manager of its business, or the superintendent of any department of that business. But he was merely the foreman or boss of the particular gang of men to which the plaintiff belonged. Whether he had or had not authority to engage and discharge the men under him is immaterial. Even if he had such authority, he was none the less a fellow servant with them, employed in the same department or business, and under a common head. There was no evidence that he was an unsuitable person for his place, or that the machinery was imperfect or defective for its purpose. The negligence, if any, was his own negligence in using the machinery or in giving orders to the men."

GRICE v. HANN et al. (No. 10701.)

Master and servant §287(7)—Negligence of employee in charge of dredge held for jury.

In an action for the death of an employee working on a dredge, where there was testimony that some of the machinery was old and defective, and that the place where the deceased was directed to work by one who was in charge of the dredge as the representative of the owner was unsafe, it was error to grant a nonsuit.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Edward McIver, Judge.

Action by Maggie Grice, administratrix, etc., against Harry F. Hann and others. From an order granting a nonsuit in favor of the defendant named, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

The complaint was as follows:

The plaintiff alleges:

(1) That on the 28th day of September, A. D. 1918, James A. Grice, late of the county of Richland, state aforesaid, departed this life, intestate, and that by an order of the probate court in and for the county and state aforesaid, on or about the 14th day of April, 1919, the said Maggie Grice was duly appointed administratrix of the estate of James A. Grice, deceased, and as such is authorized and directed to bring this action for the benefit of herself and her children, who are Edwin Grice, Katie Grice, Inez Grice, Thomas Grice, James Grice, Jeanette Grice, and Maggie Grice, and that plaintiff, Maggie Grice, the wife, and the children, as aforesaid are the only heirs at law of the said James A. Grice; that this action is brought for their benefit; that the said wife, Maggie Grice, and the said children were dependent upon the said James A. Grice for a livelihood.

(2) That the defendant Harry F. Hann was and now is a contractor, doing business and maintaining an office therefor at Camp Jackson, in the county of Richland, state of South Carolina, and at the times hereinafter mentioned, was engaged in operating a certain dredge by the name of Mary Mahone, used in dredging a certain creek, known as Gill creek, on or near the Child's place in the county and state aforesaid; that the defendant Grant Collins was in the employ of the defendant Harry F. Hann, and as such was engaged as a watcher, or lookout, upon said dredge, whose duty it was to give signals to warn plaintiff's intestate and other employees of any danger in the operation of said derrick in said dredging.

(3) That on or about the 28th day of September, 1918, the plaintiff's intestate James A. Grice, was in the employ of the defendant Harry F. Hann, and as such was engaged as a mechanic; that while not engaged as a mechanic plaintiff's intestate was engaged as a laborer; that while engaged in the duties as a laborer for the defendant Harry F. Hann, on said dredge known as the Mary Mahone, on or about the 28th day of September, 1918, the plaintiff's intestate was instructed by the defendant to go into the said creek for the purpose of placing a chain around a slippery log that had for some time slipped off the dredge bucket, each time it was brought out of the water, and in order that said log might be removed from said creek; and to reach said log plaintiff's intestate had to leave the dredge-boat and go upon the bank of said stream, and while going along the narrow ledge on the edge of the water and between the creek and the bank which rose up abruptly for about six or eight feet from the level of the water to the level of the ground above, and before plaintiff's intestate had arrived at said log, the defendant, without notice or warning to plaintiff's intestate, caused and permitted the said derrick to move said log to the bank of the creek where plaintiff was, striking plaintiff's intestate with said log, and thereby injuring and killing him; that the aforesaid injury to and death of plaintiff's intestate was directly due to and approximately caused by the joint and concurrent negligence, wantonness, and, willfulness of the defendants under the foregoing circumstances, conditions, and relations of the parties in the following respects:

(A) In failing to use and furnish plaintiff's intestate safe and suitable machinery and appliances: (1) In that the said machinery used for removal of logs from said creek, did not have clamps or picks with which to hold the log so as to prevent it from falling on and killing plaintiff's intestate. (2) In not using chains to hold said log on the dredge bucket so as to prevent it from slipping and falling upon and killing plaintiff's intestate. (3) In failing to use grabhooks or similar appliances for the removal of slippery logs from the water and putting same out upon the bank.

(B) In failing to furnish plaintiff's intestate a safe place to work: (1) In that, after he was ordered by the defendant to the place where he received said injuries, the said derrick bucket and log was rapidly thrown over and upon plaintiff's intestate without warning and without giving him opportunity to escape. (2) In failing to use proper grabhooks, or similar appliances, and to chain and secure said slippery log to said derrick bucket before moving or throwing the same over to the place where said defendants had directed plaintiff's intestate to go, without warning to him, and without giving him opportunity to escape. (3) In that there was not a plain and open view between the leverman or foreman in charge of the dredging operation and plaintiff's intestate, by reason of which said leverman could not see plaintiff's intestate, whom he had sent to chain said log, and as a result of which plaintiff's intestate was struck and killed by the log as it was thrown over on the bank.

(C) In failing to make reasonable inspection of said place, machinery, and appliances, as a reasonable inspection would have revealed the defects in said place, machinery, and appliances.

(D) In failing to notify plaintiff's intestate of the dangers, as aforesaid, of which he was unconscious.

(4) That by reason of the joint and concurrent negligence, willfulness, and wantonness of the defendant, as aforesaid, the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of James A. Grice, deceased, has been damaged in the sum of $50,000, for which amount she asks judgment and costs.

The reasons assigned by the presiding judge in granting the nonsuit were as follows:

The Court: Gentlemen, this is a motion for a nonsuit. I have given this matter considerable and careful consideration, and have reviewed it in my mind and had the stenographer to look up certain of the evidence. I cannot see that there is anything to go to this jury. The parties litigant are held to the allegations of the pleadings. That makes the issue between the parties.

Now the allegations of the pleadings are that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant Grant Collins, combining and concurring with the negligence of the master himself, who was Mr. Hann. And Grant Collins admits in his answer his negligence, his liability, and joins in the prayer of the complaint for relief. Of course I cannot grant a nonsuit against him.

The testimony all goes to show that Mr. Chitwood, the man in charge, the representative of the master, Hann, was not there, and that, if there was any negligence on the part of the master that resulted in this accident, it was negligence of Ward. Mr. Chitwood, who was in charge of the whole work, and Ward himself, in answer to my questions, said that Grice was in charge of the work generally in the absence of Mr. Chitwood, but that he was not to interfere with Mr. Ward in the management of the machinery part of the work. And Mr. Chitwood, the man in charge, who assigned these various duties, said, in answer to my question, that, under the employment of Grice he was not subject to order of Ward, and he did not have to obey his instructions, or his directions, or his orders, but that he was merely expected, while he was not engaged in work he was actually employed to do, to render such assistance as he might. I cannot see that he could be anything more than a fellow servant with Ward. He was in charge generally, under the testimony, of the whole work when Chitwood was not there. Of course if the injury was the result of negligence on part of a fellow servant, under the law he would not be entitled to recover, and do not see how Ward could be more than a fellow servant, if he was not even under Grice.

Then, too, all the testimony on the part of the operators of this machine was that Mr. Grice was an experienced man, perhaps the most experienced of the whole crowd there; that he undertook to do these things because he understood it better; that he had engaged in this kind of work; that he knew what it was; and I cannot see why, under the law, there is not an assumption of risk naturally incident to the doing of the work he was employed to do.

Under those circumstances, I cannot see how the plaintiff has made out his case. It seems to me that he has one theory in the complaint and another theory in the testimony. The theory in the complaint was that Grant Collins was negligent, but certainly that is not the theory of the testimony.

I am obliged to grant a nonsuit to Harry Hann. Of course, if the plaintiff wishes to proceed against Collins under his admission in his answer, I think that they would be entitled to do so.

The exceptions for appeal were as follows:

That the presiding judge erred in ruling that there was no testimony to go to the jury and granting the defendant Hann's motion for a nonsuit, and in holding:

(1) That under the testimony in the absence of Chitwood, who was in charge of the whole work, Grice (plaintiff's intestate) was in charge of the work generally, but was not to interfere with Ward in the management of the machinery part of the work, and was a fellow servant of Ward, if not his superior. While he should have held from the undisputed testimony: (1) That Grice, the plaintiff's intestate, was employed as machinist, but when not engaged as machinist it was his duty to help under Ward's (the dredgor's) direction, in tying logs to the dredge bucket, and so to aid in the dredging operation. (2) That Ward, the dredgor, was in complete charge and control of the operation of the dredge, and as such was the representative of the master, Hann, in such operation, and was not subject to the orders or direction of Grice, and was not a fellow servant with Grice in such operation of the dredge. (3) That as such representative of the master, Ward had the right to call on Grice to tie the log in question on the dredge bucket, and that Ward and Grice were not fellow servants. (4) That there was no evidence of contributory negligence on the part of Grice. (5) That Ward as a representative of the master, Hann, was negligent in failing to keep the way safe for Grice, by operating the dredge and throwing the log in question swiftly upon the bank along the edge of the ditch and striking Grice therewith knowing that Grice had set out to chain the log, and was on the bank in a position where he would likely be struck and injured if the dredge were operated and the log thrown to the bank while he was there in response to Ward's direction and request, and without giving him warning and opportunity for escape. (6) That Ward, the representative of the master, having directed Grice to chain the said log, and having brought the log to the surface of the water, was negligent in failing to keep the dredge bucket and log stationary until Grice could chain it to the bucket, and in throwing the same over to the place where he had directed Grice to go, without warning to him or giving him opportunity for escape.

(2) That his honor erred in not holding that there was evidence to go to the jury upon the question of negligence of the master in failing to furnish safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the removal of logs from the ditch in the dredging operation, and which, if furnished, would have prevented the accident, and in not refusing the motion for nonsuit.

(3) In not holding that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and in not submitting same to the jury upon the following questions: (1) That Grice was employed as machinist, and when not employed as machinist was employed to help generally about the work, and that it was his duty to help under Ward's direction in the tying of logs to the dredge bucket, and that Ward and Grice were not fellow servants in the operation of the dredge. (2) That Ward was in complete control and charge of the dredging operation, and was the representative of the master, Hann, therein, and was not under Grice, nor subject to his orders, and that Ward and Grice were not fellow servants in the operation of the dredge. (3) That Ward, as a representative of the master, had the right to call on Grice to tie the log in question to the dredge bucket, and in so doing the relation of Grice and Ward was not that of a fellow servant. (4) That the injury to Grice was caused by the negligence of Ward, the representative of the master, in throwing said log towards and upon Grice without warning or opportunity of escape, while Grice was in a position where he had gone under the direction of Ward, and also by the negligence of the defendant, Collins, in not warning Grice of the approach of the bucket, and in not warning Ward not to throw the log over upon Grice. (5) If there was any evidence from which the contributory negligence of Grice might be inferred, that question should have been submitted to the jury. (6) That it was the duty of Collins to give warning to both Grice and Ward, he being in a position to see the danger to Grice when Ward could not, and that he was negligent in not so doing.

(4) That his honor erred in holding that Grice, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, assumed the risk of Ward's throwing the log over upon him as an incident of his work, whereas he should have held that, Ward having directed Grice to go to the place where he was hurt, Grice had the right to assume, and act upon the assumption that Ward would not render the place whither he had sent him unsafe for the operation of the dredge and bucket, without ample notice or warning to him and opportunity for him to get out of the way.

(5) That his honor erred in not holding that the question of assumption of risk, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the testimony, was for the jury, and in not submitting such question to them, and overruling the motion for nonsuit.

(6) That his honor erred in holding that there was one theory of the case in the pleadings and another in the testimony, and that there was no evidence of negligence of the defendant Grant Collins in failing to give warning to both Ward and Grice, whereas he should have held that the negligence of Grant Collins in failing to give warning, combined with the negligence of Ward, the representative of the master, in operating the dredge and throwing the log over and upon the said Grice, under the circumstances disclosed by the testimony, was the direct and proximate cause of the injury and death of Grice, for which the master was liable, and in not overruling the motion for a nonsuit.

(7) That his honor erred in not holding that there was evidence of a joint and concurrent negligence of Ward and Collins, under the circumstances disclosed by the testimony, and in not submitting the question to the jury, and overruling the motion for a nonsuit.

(8) That his honor erred in not holding that the defendant Collins, having by his answer admitted his negligence, that there was sufficient evidence of the negligence of Ward, as a representative of the master, combining and concurring with the admitted negligence of Collins as a proximate cause of the injury, to carry the question of joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants to the jury, and in not submitting the same to the jury, and overruling the motion for a nonsuit.

(9) That his honor erred in not holding that, although under the general employment Grice did not have to obey the orders or directions of Ward to go out and tie the logs, having volunteered to do so when so called on by Ward, Grice placed himself in the position of acting under the direction of the representative of the master, Ward, and recognized the authority of Ward to so direct him, and was entitled to have the place to which he was directed to go by the master's representative kept safe while he carried out the directions of the representative, and was not guilty of contributory negligence in so doing, and is entitled to recover for the negligence of the master or his representative in failing to keep the same safe, and thereby causing his injury and death.

(10) That his honor erred in not holding that if the master put plaintiff's intestate to work where he got hurt, and failed to keep the place safe, by reason of which he received the injury causing his death, the issue of fellow servant does not enter into the case, and that there was evidence upon this point, and in not overruling the motion for a nonsuit.

(11) That his honor erred in not holding that there was evidence to go to the jury of the negligence of the master in failing to provide a safe place for Grice to work, and that under said evidence the master was responsible if injury resulted to the servant, notwithstanding the negligence of a fellow servant might have contributed to the injury as a proximate cause.

Halcott P. Green, of Columbia, and John K. Hamblin, of Union, for appellant.

F. G. Tompkins and H. N. Edmunds, both of Columbia, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an appeal from an order on nonsuit, in favor of the defendant Harry F. Hann, after which the case against the defendant Grant Collins was withdrawn from the jury, without prejudice.

In order to understand the questions involved, it will be necessary for the complaint (except the formal parts thereof), the reasons assigned by his honor the presiding judge in granting the nonsuit, and the exceptions, to be reported.

There was testimony to the effect that E. C. Ward was in charge of the dredge, as the representative of the owner, Harry F. Hann, at the time of the injury, that some of the machinery which was used was old and defective and that the place where E. C. Ward as the representative of the master directed the deceased to do the work assigned to him was unsafe. His honor the presiding judge was therefore in error in granting the nonsuit.

Reversed and remanded for new trial.

WATTS and FRASER, JJ., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). It appears to me that the plaintiff has alleged certain specific acts of negligence in the complaint, and now seeks to recover damages, or rather in this appeal to reverse the order of nonsuit, upon an entirely different theory. She brings her action against the intestate's employee, H. F. Hann, and a coemployee, Grant Collins, alleging that the injuries resulting in the death of the intestate, James A. Grice, were caused by the joint and concurrent negligence of the employee Collins. In a general statement (paragraph 4) the complaint alleges that all of the acts of negligence specified were the joint and concurrent act of those two defendants. Among these acts of negligence are breaches of duty which the defendant Hann as master owed to the intestate, and in which the codefendant Collins could not have participated and could not have been responsible for. Other acts of negligence are necessarily charged to the codefendant Collins as the representative of the master for whose negligence the master was sought to be held liable; the complaint alleging that Collins was in the employment of Hann, "and as such was engaged as a watcher or lookout upon said dredge, whose duty it was to give signals to warn plaintiff's intestate and other employees of any danger in the operation of said derrick in said dredging." The particular acts of negligence of a servant of Hann for which he was sought to be held liable are plainly alleged in the complaint to have been those of Collins.

The plaintiff is now endeavoring to reverse the order of nonsuit, not upon the ground that the evidence tended to establish these alleged acts of negligence on the part of Collins, but that it tended to establish acts of negligence on the part of Ward, another employee, whose conduct is not relied upon in the complaint, and whose name is not even mentioned.

The inquiry should therefore be: (1) Is there any evidence in the case tending to show any breach as alleged of the duty of the master? (2) Is there any evidence in the case tending to show any breach as alleged of the duty of the defendant Grant Collins?

It is apparent that under the allegations of the complaint the plaintiff has no right to rely upon any inferences of negligence which might be drawn from the conduct of Ward, for the simple reason that there is nothing in the complaint to connect Ward with the injury, and the defendant is entitled to a restriction of the plaintiff to the acts of negligence alleged in the complaint.

The facts which are not in dispute appear to be as follows: The defendant Hann was a contractor, engaged in dredging a creek; he was using what is called a "dipper dredge," which is a boatlike affair, operated by steam. From the front platform of the dredge a boom or crane extends at an angle, reaching out some distance ahead of the dredge proper. Upon this boom or crane is another appliance, a shaft, upon the end of which is attached a dipper or bucket. The boom or crane, the lower end of which is attached to the platform, has a lateral movement, and the shaft to which the bucket is attached a vertical movement; by means of pulleys, wire cables, and levers, the boom or crane is shifted from one side of the stream to the other, and the bucket is lowered from one side of the stream to the other, and the bucket is lowered into the mud, scoops up a load, is raised to the level of the bank, shifted by the lateral movement of the boom to the edge of the bank and by the release of the doors at the bottom deposits its load on the bank. In the progress of the work submerged logs were encountered, which were difficult to balance on the bucket and raise. Just before the accident a particular log had been encountered. Several efforts had been made to balance it on the bucket and raise it 'out of the stream and on to the bank without success. At this time there were three men engaged in the operation of dredging; Grant Collins, E. C. Ward, and the intestate, J. A. Grice. Their relative ranks will be discussed later. Ward was the leverman, in charge of the steam power and the lever and other appliances which shifted the boom or crane into position and lowered, raised, shifted, and unloaded the bucket. Collins was on the platform to give signals to Ward, the leverman. Grice was the machinist of the outfit. After the efforts to raise the sleek log with the bucket had failed, it was decided to raise it to the surface of the water and chain it to the bucket; Ward, the leverman, "requested" Grice, the machinist, to take a pair of tongs and a chain, and when he raised the log to the surface to chain it to the bucket. Collins was directing the movement and in a position to warn Grice of danger. Evidently when the log was raised to the surface it was balanced on the bucket, and the idea of chaining it was abandoned by Collins. In the meantime Grice was walking towards the point where the bucket would emerge, along a narrow ledge between the water and the comparatively steep side of the cut. The log balanced upon the bucket was raised to about the level of the bank of the cut, and as the attempt was made to shift the boom or crane around and deposit the log on the bank out of the way, one end of it struck either the bank or other obstruction, the other end slued around, striking Grice and fatally injuring him.

Much attention is given both in the testimony and in the printed arguments to the question whether Ward or Collins was the representative of the master upon the occasion in question. The respondent in his printed argument admits that Collins was working under Ward, and could not therefore have been the representative of the master, although his complaint is based upon the theory that Collins was such, so far as the negligence particularly charged to him was concerned. Accordingly, if the negligence was that of Collins, the plaintiff admits inability to recover, as under those circumstances Grice and Collins would clearly be fellow servants.

As to Ward: The conclusions of the circuit judge upon this subject are clearly sustained by the testimony. He says:

"The testimony all goes to show that Mr. Chitwood, the man in charge, the representative of the master, Hann, was not there, and that if there was any negligence on the part of the master that resulted in this accident, it was negligence of Ward. Mr. Chitwood, who was in charge of the whole work, and Ward himself, in answer to my questions, said that Grice was in charge of the work generally in the absence of Mr. Chitwood, but that he was not to interfere with Mr. Ward in the management of the machinery part of the work. And Mr. Chitwood, the man in charge, who assigned these various duties, said, in answer to my question, that, under the employment of Grice he was not subject to order of Ward, and he did not have to obey his instructions, or his directions, or his orders, but that he was merely expected, while he was not engaged in work he was actually employed to do, to render such assistance as he might. I cannot see that he could be anything more than a fellow servant with Ward. He was in charge generally, under the testimony, of the whole work when Chitwood was not there."

Chitwood, Collins, and Ward all testified that while Ward had the right to call on Grice to assist in chaining the log, Grice was not obliged to obey him. Ward testified that he "didn't claim to be over Grice in any way"; that "Grice was representing Mr. Chitwood (the captain foreman) when he was not there." Collins testified: "To a certain extent, Mr. Grice was acting foreman."

Under the law, however, it was immaterial whether the rank or grade of Ward was superior to that of Grice, whether or not Ward was vice principal; for they were both engaged at the time in the common enterprise of removing the log from the stream, and pro hac vice, they were fellow servants, regardless of their respective grades or ranks. See authorities upon this subject quoted in the opinion of the writer in the case of Leopard v. Beaver Duck Mills, 108 S. E. 190, recently filed.

The suggestion that any of the instrumentalities were defective and worn cannot be relied upon, for the reason that there is no allegation of such fact in the complaint.

The testimony does not show that the master failed in any duty which he owed to the servant in the furnishing of a reasonably safe place to work or reasonably safe instrumentalities with which to work; it clearly demonstrates that whatever lack of safety existed in either was due to the want of care on the part of the intestate or negligence on the part of his fellow servants, and that if there had been any lack of safety in either the intestate was thoroughly familiar with the entire situation and the dangers, if any, and would be held to have assumed the risk of injury from their operation, particularly as to alleged defects in the machinery, the repair of which was a part of his own duties.

The judgment below should therefore be affirmed.

TRAYLOR v. ATKINSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
June 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  790(3)—Question held not moot, though it was settled in other suit.

On appeal from a decree holding that purchaser at partition sale was not entitled to be released from the purchase by reason of a cloud raised by a suit attacking the title, the fact that pending an appeal the alleged defect or cloud upon the title disappeared by expiration of time for appeal in that suit did not render the question as to the lower court's action in refusing to release the purchaser moot, so as to require dismissal of appeal.

2. Partition  $\S$  109(4)—Purchaser at partition sale takes subject to clouds upon title.

One purchasing land at a partition sale, title to which was under a cloud, consisting of a suit attacking a deed, which latter suit was referred to in the bill in the cause, was charged with knowledge of the existence and purpose of such suit, and, upon confirmation of the sale, took the title subject thereto, and, judgment having been entered establishing the validity of the deed, purchaser was bound to raise the question concerning the right of appeal by the party attacking the title before confirmation of the sale; the court having allowed ten additional days for the express purpose of an examination of the title.

3. Judicial sales §52—Court never warrants title to land sold under decree.

The court never undertakes to warrant the title to land sold under its decree, and a purchaser at a judicial sale buys at his own risk, but is entitled to relief on the ground of fraud or after-discovered mistake of material facts.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Suit by Ethel Walker Atkinson, in her own right and as administratrix c. t. a. of the estate of her mother, Belle V. Atkinson, against the heirs, for a settlement of the estate and a partition sale of certain realty. From the decree of sale Annie G. Traylor, purchaser, appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Byrd, R. B. Gwathmey, and Fulton & Wicker, all of Richmond, for appellant.

Brockenbrough Lamb, C. V. Meredith, and R. H. Talley, all of Richmond, for appellees.

KELLY, P. The question in this case is whether the appellant, Mrs. Annie G. Traylor, is entitled to be released from the purchase of certain real estate, sold and confirmed to her under a judicial sale. The lower court held that she was not so entitled, and thereupon she obtained this appeal.

The material facts are these: Mrs. Belle V. Atkinson had a complete record title to the lot known as 811 East Grace street, in the city of Richmond, subject to certain uncontested incumbrances not material here, and disposed of the same by will. This suit was brought in the chancery court of the city of Richmond by Ethel Walker Atkinson, in her own right and as administratrix c. t. a. of the estate of her mother, Belle V. Atkinson, for a settlement of the estate and a partition sale of the lot. The bill was filed in October, 1919. On that date there was pending in the same court another suit wherein Lucy Claire Dudley, a daughter, and Henry Dudley, a grandson of the testatrix (the latter being under age and suing by next friend), were attacking the validity of the deed under which she claimed title to the lot. The bill in the present suit alleged that the suit of Dudley v. Atkinson had been "decided in favor of the defendants, and confirms the title and ownership of Belle V. Atkinson, but the final decree in the said suit has not yet been entered." A few days later, on October 23, 1919, a final decree was entered therein, dismissing the bill, and thus ending the attack on the title of the testatrix; no suspension being asked or provided for, and the decree therefore becoming effective at once. No appeal from that decree was sought, and it appears that none was ever contemplated.

On August 13, 1920, Henry Dudley, who had then attained his majority, and Lucy Claire Dudley expressly waived their right of appeal by written agreement under seal; and, furthermore, when this appeal was argued, the right of appeal in the Dudley suit was barred by the expiration of the statutory period of one year.

In the meantime, under a decree of sale in the instant case, the Grace street lot was, on February 25, 1920, sold at public auction, and the appellant, Mrs. Annie G. Traylor, offering the highest among a number of competitive bids, became the purchaser at the price of $42,500, payable all cash, or, at the option of the purchaser, one-third cash and the balance in 6, 12, and 18 months, with interest. The commissioners reported the sale to the court, and on March 1, 1920, a decree was entered confirming the sale, "subject to an examination of the title within 10 days."

It appears from the report of the special commissioners that on March 12, 1920, they met Mrs. Traylor, by appointment, at the office of Mr. Lee, the attorney who had been employed by her to examine the title, the object of this meeting on the part of the commissioners being to receive settlement from Mrs. Traylor in accordance with the decree of confirmation, and that they, on that occasion, were informed that Mrs. Traylor did not at that time have the necessary funds in cash to comply with her purchase, but would arrange to secure the same in a few days and make settlement. The special commissioners directed the attention of Mrs. Traylor and her attorney to the requirements of the decree, and an arrangement was then made pursuant to which she paid to the commissioners the sum of $4,000, and the parties fixed upon March 26, 1920, as the day upon which she would complete the settlement. No question at that time was raised as to the sufficiency of the title. On the last-named date, March 26, the commissioners were informed by Mr. Lee that he had determined to advise his client not to accept the property, for the reason that the final decree in the above-mentioned Dudley suit had been entered less than a year prior thereto.

The foregoing facts with reference to the failure of Mrs. Traylor to comply with the terms of the sale were reported to the court, and a rule was issued against her to show cause why she should not be required to complete the settlement in conformity with her contract of purchase. In her answer to the rule she pointed out certain apparent objections to the title, but the allegations of the answer itself show that as to all of such defects she was fully protected, with the exception of the alleged cloud on the title occasioned by the possibility of an appeal from the decree of October 23, 1919, in the Dudley suit. This answer to the rule expressed a willingness to take and settle for the property as soon as the title was "free of all valid objections."

Then followed a decree on the 29th of April, 1920, holding that the objections to the title (except as to two executed but unrecorded release deeds, which were thereby ordered to be recorded) were without merit, and ordering Mrs. Traylor forthwith to comply with her purchase. This decree, however, after reciting the fact that Mrs. Traylor had elected to take advantage of the credit terms allowed by the decree of sale, directed that "the purchaser's note for the last and final one-third of the purchase money, being the note to mature on February 25, 1921, be not disposed of or pledged by the court prior to the 23d day of October, 1920, and that no decree of distribution be entered in this cause making or directing any distribution of said last and final one-third of the purchase money, or any part thereof, prior to the 23d day of October, 1920." The manifest and admitted purpose of this latter provision in the decree was to protect Mrs. Traylor against any possible loss resulting from an appeal from and reversal of the final decree in the Dudley suit.

Mrs. Traylor continued in default, and on May 14, 1920, the commissioners notified her counsel that unless she should make settlement in a few days they would ask the court for an order directing a resale of the property at her risk. Following this notice, she filed her petition asking to be released entirely from her purchase, and on May 26, 1920, the court entered a decree holding that there was no merit in the petition, and ordering a resale at her risk, unless she complied with the terms of her purchase within 10 days from that date. This decree, however, before making these adjudications adverse to Mrs. Traylor, recited "that full justice cannot be done and the whole controversy ended in this cause without the presence of Henry A. Dudley as a party," and accordingly a guardian ad litem was appointed to defend his interests, reciting the appearance and answer of the said Dudley by his guardian ad litem, and the docketing and setting of the cause for hearing by consent as to him. It is admitted that the purpose of this provision, like that above referred to with reference to holding in abeyance a portion of the purchase money, was to protect Mrs. Traylor against a possible appeal from and reversal of the final decree in the Dudley suit.

Before coming to a consideration of the present appeal upon its merits, we must advert to the motion of the appellees to dismiss the same on the ground that the only point in controversy, as to the validity of the title, has now become a moot question. The argument upon this motion is that the possibility of an appeal from the decree of October 23, 1919, in the Dudley suit is the only objection urged against the title, and that this possibility has now been precluded by the lapse of time, and particularly by the above-recited written waiver of Lucy Dudley and Henry Dudley.

[1] It is perfectly clear that the question as to the right of appeal in the Dudley suit has now been ended, but it perhaps does not necessarily follow from that fact that the existence of the original defect, if defect it was, did not constitute a good defense to the rule against her, and a good ground for granting the relief asked for in her petition. It may be that substantial defects of title if timely objection thereto be made, entitle the purchaser to an absolute release as of the time of such objection, and do not lose their efficacy in this respect upon a subsequent removal effected by fortuitous causes. In this case it is contended on behalf of Mrs. Traylor that when she asked to be released there was a substantial defect in the title, which neither the court nor the parties could with reasonable certainty promise to remove; and that the provision which the court in its decrees of April 29 and May 26 made to this and were insufficient and of no avail. Without passing upon the soundness of this contention, we are nevertheless of opinion that, although the alleged defect or cloud upon the title has now disappeared, the question as to the lower court's action thereon before such disappearance is reviewable, and in that sense has not become moot. The motion to dismiss is therefore denied.

[2] Upon the merits of the case we have no difficulty whatever. We need not discuss the effect of the proceedings by which the court undertook to protect the purchaser against any loss resulting from possible future action by the Dudleys, or either of them, subsequent to the decree of October 23, 1919. The effort on the part of the court to afford Mrs. Traylor such protection (whether sufficient for the purpose or not, we need not decide), was entirely proper and just; but Mrs. Traylor could not, as a matter of right, demand any absolute protection against the alleged defect. The Dudley suit was referred to in the bill in this cause, and Mrs. Traylor, as the purchaser under a sale made herein, was charged with knowledge of the existence and purpose of that suit, and upon confirmation of the sale she took the title subject thereto. She does not claim to have suffered from any fraud or mistake in regard to it. It is true she says in her petition that she did not know about the right of appeal which the Dudleys might have, but if such right of appeal in fact constituted a defect, she was bound to raise the question, if at all, before confirmation of the sale. The court gave her an additional 10 days, for the express purpose of examination of the title. At the end of that time she made no objection on any ground, and the sale then stood unconditionally confirmed. From that date she occupied the same position she would have occupied if she had purchased from a private individual under a contract for the sale of real estate entitling her to a conveyance with special warranty.

[3] The court never undertakes to warrant the title to land sold under its decree, and a purchaser at a judicial sale buys at his own risk. The law is clearly stated, and with peculiarly appropriate application to the case at bar, by Judge Burks in Long v. Welser, 29 Gratt. (70 Va.) 347, 351, as follows:

"In Virginia, the maxim caveat emptor strictly applies to all judicial sales. The court undertakes to sell only the title, such as it is, of the parties to the suit, and it is the duty of the purchaser to ascertain for himself whether the title of these parties may not be impeached or superseded by some other and paramount title; and if he have just grounds of objection for want or defect of title he should present them to the court before the confirmation of the report of sale. Ordinarily, objection after confirmation comes too late. Young's Adm'r and Bowyer v. McClung et al., 9 Gratt. 336, 358; Threlkeld's v. Campbell, 2 Gratt. 198; Daniel et al. v. Leitch, 13 Gratt. 195, 212, 213; Watson v. Hoy et al. (not yet reported), Virginia Law Journal, August, 1877, p. 473 et seq., 28 Gratt. 698.

"These authorities would seem to be a sufficient answer to the pretension set up by the appellants in their answer to the rule for resale, to the effect that at the time they purchased the land and mill property, they believed that the right to the use of the entire road mentioned in the answer was annexed or appurtenant as an easement to the property purchased by them, and that since the purchase they have discovered that a claim has been asserted by a third party, which is probably right, and will deprive them of the use of the road, and thus seriously impair the value of the property purchased by them.

"This is nothing but an objection for defect of title. The title to the easement is necessarily connected with the title to the land to which it is appurtenant; and whatever the purchasers believed, they must be taken to know that they could acquire by their purchase only the title that the court sold, which was the title, whatever it might be, of the parties to the suit. They purchased at their own risk, and cannot be heard to object for want or defect of title, at least after confirmation of the sale."

In Berlin v. Melhorn, 75 Va. 639, 641, Judge Burks again says:

"We think it may be safely laid down, as a general rule, deducible from the authorities, that after a judicial sale has been absolutely confirmed by the court which ordered it, it will not be set aside except for fraud, mistake, surprise, or other cause for which equity would give like relief, if the sale had been made by the parties in interest, instead of by the court. But where the objection is to the confirmation, the rule is more liberal."

Citations of authority to the same effect as the above might be indefinitely multiplied. We will add only these: Hickson v. Rucker, 77 Va. 135, 138; Kirk v. Oakey, 110 Va. 67, 68, 65 S. E. 528, 135 Am. St. Rep. 915; Headley v. Hoopengartner, 60 W. Va. 626, 55 S. E. 744; 2 Barton's Chy. Pr. 1185; 1 Hogg's Eq. Proc. § 687; Lile's Eq. Pl. & Pr. § 264; Burks' Notes on Conveyancing (1906) § 99, p. 118.

Of course, this general rule is subject to the qualification that a purchaser, like a party to a private contract of sale, is entitled to relief on the ground of fraud or after-discovered mistake of material facts, but there is nothing in this case to bring it within that qualification.

1. Habeas corpus  $\S$  99(3)—Welfare of child is paramount consideration, and court has large discretion.

"In habeas corpus cases for the custody of a minor, the paramount consideration is the welfare and happiness of the minor, and in determining that the trial court is vested with a large discretion."

2. Habeas corpus  $\S$  99(2)—Court held not to have abused discretion in awarding child's custody to father though sister had procured appointment as guardian.

The evidence in this case examined, and held to show no abuse of discretion by the trial court in awarding the custody of the minor to the defendant, the father of the minor.

Error from City Court of Albany; Clayton Jones, Judge.

Habeas corpus by Mrs. W. A. Hammond against L. D. Murray. Judgment for defendant, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. W. A. Hammond filed a petition for habeas corpus against her father, L. D. Murray, to obtain the custody of Sarah Murray. Sarah Murray is the sister of the plaintiff and the daughter of the defendant. She is 13 years old. The defendant had been twice married. The plaintiff and Sarah Murray are daughters of the defendant by his first wife. About 10 years ago L. D. Murray was married a second time, and three children were born to him, the issue of this marriage. About 4 years ago the defendant, who was about to remove from this state, placed Sarah Murray in the care and custody of a female relative. After remaining with this relative for some time, the defendant, through his second wife and the stepmother of Sarah Murray, directed Mrs. Barbre, a daughter of the defendant by his first wife, to take possession of the child. At this time the defendant was a resident of another state. Subsequently Sarah Murray went to live with the plaintiff, Mrs. W. A. Hammond, who resided in Bibb county, this state. Mrs. Hammond was appointed guardian of the person of Sarah Murray by the ordinary of Bibb county, Ga. Some time thereafter Sarah returned to Dougherty county to visit her sister, Mrs. Barbre. From the home of Mrs. Barbre she went to her father's home in Dougherty county, who in the meantime had returned to the state. The judge of the city court of Albany, before whom the application for habeas corpus was brought, after hearing evidence, awarded the custody of the child to the defendant, L. D. Murray, and Mrs. Hammond excepted.

Claude Payton, of Albany, for plaintiff in error.

H. A. Peacock, of Albany, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above.) [1, 2] The chief insistence of the plaintiff in error is that the judgment of the ordinary of Bibb county, appointing the plaintiff in error guardian of the person of Sarah Murray, is not open to collateral attack. The defendant in error testified in effect that he was a nonresident of the state at the time of the appointment of the plaintiff in error as guardian of the person of Sarah Murray; that he had not abandoned Sarah Murray, and had not failed to provide for her support and maintenance; that he had no notice or knowledge whatever of the application for letters of guardianship. The plaintiff in error, in addition to other evidence, introduced the letters of guardianship issued to her; and the exception is that the court abused his discretion in awarding the custody of the minor to the defendant in error, since the legal right to the custody of the minor was in plaintiff in error, as the guardian of the person of the minor, and the order appointing plaintiff in error as such guardian could not be collaterally attacked. No objection was made to the introduction of the evidence of the defendant in error indicated above, so far as the record discloses. The right of the defendant in error to attack collaterally the judgment of the ordinary was not therefore directly questioned. No ruling of the court upon the precise question was invoked. The trial court may have considered the legal right to the custody of the minor to be in plaintiff in error, and may have given no consideration to the evidence of the defendant in error, recited above.

While the evidence in the record strongly indicates that plaintiff in error is a proper person to have the care and custody of her sister, and the evidence to the contrary is meagre, there is some evidence tending to show that she was not a proper person to have the care and custody of the minor. There was also evidence tending to show that the father was a proper person to have the care and custody of his child, and that he was able to provide for the child in a manner suitable to her station in life. Upon the well-recognized principle that in habeas corpus for the custody of a minor the chief consideration is the welfare and happiness of the minor (Lamar v. Harris, 117 Ga. 993, 994, 44 S. E. 866), the trial court, in the exercise of the large discretion vested in him, may have awarded the custody of the minor in this case to the father, though recognizing the legal right of the plaintiff in error to the custody of the child by virtue of her appointment as guardian of the person of the minor. Upon a careful consideration of the evidence in the record, this court will not reverse the judgment of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

McCLURE REALTY & INVESTMENT CO. v. EUBANKS et al. (No. 2350.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Ang. 10, 1921.)

Insane persons ¶73—When never adjudicated insane, lease cannot be avoided by person succeeding to interest in land.

"The contract of an insane person or one non compos mentis, who has never been adjudicated to be insane or of unsound mind as prescribed by the Code, is not absolutely void but only voidable." "Such a contract may be ratified [or avoided] by him upon afterward becoming sane or during a lucid interval, or, after his death, may be avoided or ratified by his heirs or personal representative." Other persons, such as the petitioners in this case, cannot avoid it.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Mary J. Eubanks and another against the McClure Realty & Investment Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This is an action brought by Mary J. Eubanks and Clara E. Zellars against the McClure Realty & Investment Company, for cancellation of a lease contract as to certain described realty, and for recovery of the premises and mesne profits. The allegations of the petition in outline are as follows: For years prior to August 21, 1918, Margaret R. Fuller had been the owner and holder of a life estate in the property, the remainder in fee belonging to the petitioners. On that date Mrs. Fuller executed a contract leasing the premises to defendant for five years, defendant going into possession and since retaining it. In November, 1919, in a suit brought by Mrs. Fuller against Mrs. Eubanks and Mrs. Zellars in Fulton superior court—

"by certain decrees of the court, hereinafter more fully referred to, the life estate of the said Mrs. Fuller was by decree passed and conveyed to your petitioners, and became merged with their remainder interest, and they by said decrees became the holders of the title to the said property in fee simple. * * * In said case a settlement of the controversies therein involved was made, including a controversy over the land in question; and the court, after first appointing a guardian ad litem for Mrs. Margaret R. Fuller, on account of her mental weakness and incapacity, entered a decreed effectuating said settlement and decreeing absolute ownership of said property in petitioners, as heretofore recited. Said decrees are in record in this court, and profert thereof is made. In so far as they relate to the present controversy the decrees are material, in that they transfer the title of said life estate as heretofore set out, and after appointing a guardian ad litem because of Mrs. Fuller's mental weakness, and in that also they contain the following provision: "The defendants take the property without regard to the lease said to be held by C. W. McClure, if there be such a lease, but reserve the right to cancel that lease if they can, by law or otherwise."

The lease contract is void, and should be canceled, because at the time of its execution Mrs. Fuller was of unsound mind and mentally incapable of making a valid and binding contract, and the defendant procured the lease from her at a grossly inadequate rental, namely, at $75 per month, whereas a reasonable rental was then at least $300 per month, and is now $500 per month. Petitioners have notified defendant that the lease is invalid, have refused to receive payment of rent at the rate of $75 per month, have demanded that the rental be paid at its reasonable value, or else that the premises be surrendered; and that the defendant has refused to comply with these demands.

The defendant demurred to the petition generally and specially, but insisted only on the general demurrer, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Weltner, Cheatham & Koplin, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The petition in this case does not disclose the exact character of the action brought by Mrs. Fuller against Mrs. Eubanks and Mrs. Zellars, nor the issues therein involved and decided, further than that case included a controversy over the land covered by the lease contract here sought to be canceled, that a guardian ad litem was therein appointed for Mrs. Fuller, "on account of her mental weakness and incapacity," that a settlement was made of the controversies in the case, and that a decree was rendered by which the life estate of Mrs. Fuller in the property, the subject-matter of the lease contract, was passed and conveyed to the petitioners in the present case, and that they were decreed to be the absolute owners in fee of the entire interest in the leased premises. The petition does not allege that Mrs. Fuller is not still in life, nor that she has not continued to be insane since the execution of the lease contract, nor that she has ever been adjudged to be insane, and a guardian appointed for her property. It will be presumed, therefore, that she is still alive and insane, and not under guardianship. The petition does allege that Mrs. Fuller was insane at the time she executed the lease contract to the McClure Realty & Investment Company, defendant in this case, and that when the decree was entered in her case against Mrs. Eubanks and Mrs. Zellars she was represented by a guardian ad litem, appointed by the court "on account of her mental weakness and incapacity."

It is well settled in this state that—

"The contract of an insane person or one non compos mentis, who has never been adjudicated to be insane or of unsound mind as prescribed by the Code, is not absolutely void, but only voidable." Bunn v. Postell, 107 Ga. 490, 33 S. E. 707, followed in Orr v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 107 Ga. 490, 33 S. E. 708, Woolley v. Gaines, 114 Ga. 122, 39 S. E. 892, 88 Am. St. Rep. 22, and Perry v. Reynolds, 137 Ga. 427, 73 S. E. 656.

This doctrine has been almost universally recognized by text-writers, and adjudicated cases on the subject.

"Such a contract may be ratified by [the insane person] upon afterward becoming sane or during a lucid interval, or, after his death, may be avoided or ratified by his heirs or personal representative." Bunn v. Postell, supra.

The right to disaffirm a voidable contract of an insane person is personal, and can be exercised only by himself, if restored to sanity; or if his infirmity continues till his death, then by his legal representative or his heirs; but neither the other party to the contract nor third persons can avoid it. In support of these legal propositions see the authorities cited in Bunn v. Postell, supra; and in 22 Cyc. 1174, notes 90, 92, 93, 94, 95, and page 1209, notes 24, 26, 27, 28; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 629, note 2; 9 Eng. Enc. Law, 119, notes 2, 3, 4; 14 R. C. L. 592, notes 10, 12, 13; Clark on Contracts (3d Ed.) 231, notes 40, 41, 42, 43, 44; 1 Devlin on Realty (3d Ed.) § 73, note 8, and section 75, note 7; 3 Tiffany on Real Property (2d Ed.) 2342, note 65, and page 2344, note 71a; 1 Jones on Real Property, § 64, note 6; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 253, note 28; 1 Elliott on Contracts, § 382, notes 84, 85, 87; 4 Elliott on Contracts, 3221, notes 95, 3, 4, 5, 6. Also Vogel v. Zuercher (Tex. Civ. App.) 135 S. W. 737 (4); Porter v. Brooks (Tex. Civ. App.) 159 S. W. 192.

The petitioners in this case, who are seeking to disaffirm the lease contract of Mrs. Fuller on the ground that she was insane when it was executed, do not in any way represent her, nor claim to be proceeding in her behalf, but are contending that they, as her successors in interest and title under the decree referred to in the petition, for themselves have the right to have the lease contract canceled. We cannot, in view of the authorities above cited, concede the soundness of this contention.

Counsel for defendants in error rely upon the two cases of Breckenridge's Heirs v. Ormsby, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 236, 19 Am. Dec. 71, and Clay v. Hammond, 199 Ill. 370, 65 N. E. 352, 93 Am. St. Rep. 146. In both of these cases it was decided, in effect, that one to whom the grantor, after recovering his sanity transfers the property, has the same right to avoid a conveyance made by his grantor while insane, in favor of another person, as has the grantor himself; seemingly for the reason, as in the case of a conveyance by an infant, that the mere execution of an inconsistent conveyance by the grantor after the removal of his disability involves in itself a repudiation of the voidable conveyance. 3 Tiffany on Real Property (2d Ed.) 2345. These rulings are not directly applicable here, nor are they necessarily in conflict with our holding. Whether a guardian of an insane person can, by his own act, and without an order of a court of competent jurisdiction, avoid the contract or deed of his ward, executed while he was insane, and prior to an adjudication of his insanity and the appointment of a guardian, is not necessary to be decided in this case, as there was never an adjudication that Mrs. Fuller, under whom the petitioners claim as successors in interest or title, was insane, nor was a guardian ever appointed for her property. It is true that "on account of her mental weakness and incapacity" a guardian ad litem was appointed for her by the judge of the superior court in the suit she brought against the present petitioners, in which suit the decree was rendered upon which the petitioners base the contention of their right to disaffirm and have canceled the lease contract made between Mrs. Fuller and defendant here; and while under the allegations of the petition a settlement of the controversies involved in that case was made, "including a controversy over the land in question," and the decree rendered effectuated the settlement and adjudicated that the life estate of Mrs. Fuller was passed and conveyed to the petitioners here, and that they are the absolute owners in fee of the entire interest in the leased property, yet the McClure Realty & Investment Company was not a party to that case, nor was the validity of the lease contract it had with Mrs. Fuller directly brought in question, nor expressly decided, even if in the circumstances that could have been legally done. Moreover, the language quoted in the petition from the decree indicates that it was not the intention of the court to pass on the validity of the lease contract, as such language, in effect, declares that the petitioners here took the property without regard to the lease contract, and that they reserved the right to cancel it if they could.

From what has been said we must conclude that the court erred in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

GEORGE, J., concurs specially, because not enough of the pleadings in the case of Fuller v. Eubanks et al., and of the consent decree entered therein [to which the insane person's guardian ad litem consented], is set out in the petition in this case to enable the court to determine whether the insane person, through her guardian, disaffirmed the lease contract.

Municipal corporations — 555—Affidavit of illegality to execution for sidewalk assessment held good as against general demurrer.

Under the ruling in Bacon v. Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah, 86 Ga. 301(1), 12 S. E.

580, the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer to the affidavit of illegality and dismissing it.

Error from Superior Court, Grady County; John R. Wilson, Judge.

Proceeding on an affidavit of illegality filed by W. A. Walker to an execution in favor of the City of Cairo. The affidavit of illegality was dismissed, and Walker brings error. Reversed.

R. C. Bell and S. P. Cain, both of Cairo, for plaintiff in error.

E. D. Rivers, of Milltown, and Jeff A. Pope, of Cairo, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. The clerk of the city council of Cairo is authorized under the charter of the city to issue executions to enforce the collection of assessments for street improvements. See Act Aug. 19, 1911 (Ga. L. 1911, p. 884, § 6). The section here cited provides also that—

"The defendant shall have the right to file an affidavit of illegality denying that he owes the same or some part of the sum for which the said execution was issued, and in case he admits owing any amount, stating what amount is due, which amount so admitted shall be paid or collected before the affidavit is received, and the affidavit for such balance, and all affidavits may be filed under this section shall be received, and returned to the superior court of Grady county and there to be tried and the issue determined as in cases of illegality, subject to all the pains and penalties provided in cases of illegality for delay."

An execution was issued against W. A. Walker for the amount assessed against him for certain "sidewalk paving." After this execution had been levied on his property Walker filed an affidavit of illegality, the fifth ground of which, after being amended, is as follows:

"Because the items for which said fi. fa. issued to collect constitute no valid charge as against this affiant, and he is not liable therefor. Defendant denies that he owes the sum for which said execution issued, and denies that he owes any part thereof."

To this affidavit of illegality the city filed a general demurrer and special demurrers. The trial judge overruled the special demurrers, but sustained the general demurrer and dismissed the affidavit of illegality. The defendant excepted. Under the ruling in Dixon v. Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah, 20 Ga. App. 511, 93 S. E. 274, ground 5 of the affidavit of illegality would have been subject to a timely and proper special demurrer, but that question is not now before us. The only question for our consideration is: Did the court err in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the affidavit of illegality? In Bacon v. Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah, 86 Ga. 301(1), 12 S. E. 580, it was held:

"Where the same statute which confers authority for issuing an execution to enforce the payment of an assessment made upon abutting property to defray the cost of improving the street on which such property abuts provides that the defendant shall have the right to file an affidavit denying that the whole or any part of the amount for which the execution issued is due, an affidavit which in one of its grounds sets forth such a denial in express terms as to the whole and every part, entitles the defendant to a trial upon all questions of law and all open questions of fact involved in the controversy."

Under this ruling the judge erred in the case now under consideration in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the affidavit of illegality. See Mayor and Council of Gainesville v. Dean, 124 Ga. 750(1), 53 S. E. 183.

2. Certiorari ⇨ 36—Question as to measure of damages not raised on trial could not be raised on review of judgment on certiorari.

The writ of certiorari lies for the correction of errors committed by the trial court. Accordingly, this court will not consider any question not passed upon by the trial court, but raised for the first time in the briefs of counsel for the plaintiff in error in this court.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by T. J. Cheshire against G. B. Payne, federal agent. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

T. J. Cheshire brought suit in the municipal court of Atlanta against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. When federal control was terminated, under the provisions of the Transportation Act of 1920, John Barton Payne, as federal agent, automatically became the defendant. The petition alleged that on May 7, 1918, there was delivered to the defendant's agents at Norfolk, Va., for the purpose of transportation to Atlanta, Ga., 30 cases of fresh cakes, which were consigned to the plaintiff, and that he was damaged by the negligence of the agents of defendant, in that the cakes "were not delivered to plaintiff in Atlanta until the 16th day of May, 1918, and, when they were delivered, such cakes of bakery goods were badly spoiled and deteriorated, and largely unmerchantable, to the damage and injury of petitioner in the sum of $281.12." This amount was arrived at by deducting the salvage from the invoice price of the goods. The defendant denied liability. On the trial of the case the plaintiff introduced a bill of lading, issued May 7, 1918 (on which was indorsed "too late for to-day's forwarding"), and a waybill "from Portsmouth, dated May 8, 1918, showing that the car was received at Howells (near Atlanta) at 2:50 a. m. Sunday, May 12th, and that it was placed at Spring Street (Atlanta) at 3 a. m., May 15th, and was delivered by Morrow Transfer Company on May 17th." The plaintiff showed also that the cakes when delivered at Norfolk were in good condition, but that when they were delivered to him in Atlanta they "were moldy and were not fit for human consumption," and were sold for hog feed. The defendant sought to show that the delay was caused "by an accident to another freight train," and "on account of all available power being used to handle troops," and the consequent congestion of freight resulting from these causes. After excluding certain evidence, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. To these rulings the defendant excepted.

Lovick G. Fortson and Randolph & Parker, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Chas. E. Cotterill and Jos. H. Ross, both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. In the condition in which we find the record in this case we cannot say that there is any merit in the exception that the court erred in excluding from the jury "the testimony of Mr. Walker and Mr. Woodall in so far as anything they may have said tended to bear on the question of unusual congestion of freight," the objection urged thereto being that "the defendant has failed to couple it up, or to show that it was accidental, or that they had no opportunity to foresee it, or that they gave notice."

[2] 2. In the bill of exceptions error is assigned on "the judgment of the court directing a verdict," because "the same is contrary to law and the evidence." In support of their contention, counsel for the plaintiff in error insist in their brief that "no proof

[was] made as to the market value of the cake at the time and place when it should have been delivered." In the trial of the case the plaintiff confined his claim and his proof of damages to the invoice value of the goods, plus the freight which he had prepaid, and it does not appear from the record that the defendant made in any way in the trial court the point that the plaintiff had chosen an incorrect measure for his damages. This point was raised for the first time by counsel for the plaintiff in error in their brief filed in this court. The writ of certiorari lies for the correction of errors committed by the trial court. Accordingly, this court will not consider any question not passed upon by the trial court, but raised for the first time in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error filed in this court. *Masters v. ### OWENS v. STATE. (No. 12583.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 26, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §942(1) — New trial not granted for newly discovered evidence to impeach only witness on vital point.

"Though the witness sought to be impeached by newly discovered evidence was the only witness against the prisoner upon a vital point in the case, if the sole effect of the evidence would be to impeach the witness, a new trial will not be granted." Arwood v. State, 59 Ga. 391 (1), Key v. State, 21 Ga. App. 795 (1), 95 S. E. 269, and citations. Under the above ruling there is no merit in the grounds of the motion for new trial based upon alleged newly discovered evidence.

2. Criminal law §913(4)—Sentence cannot be attacked by motion for new trial.

"Objection that a sentence imposed in a criminal case is excessive, or for any reason illegal or irregular, cannot be properly made the ground of a motion for a new trial." Burgamy v. State, 114 Ga. 852 (2), 40 S. E. 991. Campbell v. State, 24 Ga. App. 130 (3), 131 (3), 100 S. E. 18, and citations.

3. Criminal law §828, 1064(7)—Motion for new trial complaining of charge held too general and indefinite; fuller charge on particular issue should have been requested.

The last ground of the motion for a new trial alleges that the charge of the court "does not in its entirety submit all the issues fairly and impartially to the jury, and the said jury was left in a confused and bewildered condition, and not given a legal light leading and showing the jury trying the case all the issues in said case, as the law required him to do." The charge as given is not subject to the foregoing criticism. This ground of the motion is too general and indefinite to raise any issue for determination by this court. The charge as given covered the issues made by the pleadings and the evidence, and, if a fuller charge on any particular issue was desired, it should have been requested by a proper and timely written request, made before the jury retired to consider of their verdict.

4. Criminal law §1156(2)—Trial judge has wide discretion, when verdict apparently against weight of evidence, but Court of Appeals cannot interfere, when judge approves verdict.

"There was some slight evidence authorizing the verdict; and the verdict having been approved by the trial judge, under the repeated and uniform rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court a reviewing court is powerless to interfere. When the verdict is apparently decidedly against the weight of the evidence, the trial judge has a wide discretion as to granting or refusing a new trial; but whenever there is any evidence, however slight, to support a verdict which has been approved by the trial judge, this court is absolutely without authority to control the judgment of the trial court." Bradham v. State, 21 Ga. App. 510, 94 S. E. 618. See cases cited.

BUCKHANON v. STATE. (No. 2694.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 12, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Homicide  $\S$  135(1)—Indictment for murder by drowning held not demurrable.

The third count of the indictment alleged that the defendant did "kill and murder one Robert Willcox by forcibly placing the said Robert Willcox in a body of water, and by forcibly keeping the said Robert Willcox under the said water, with the intent to kill him, the said Robert Willcox, until the said Robert Willcox was then and there drowned as a result thereof." The defendant demurred to this portion of the indictment, on the ground that it was insufficient, "for the reason that it does not state what kind of force was used, nor in what way or manner the said force was used to place deceased in the water, nor what kind of force was used to keep the deceased, Robert Willcox, under the water until he was drowned," so that defendant could be put on notice what to defend against. Held, that the judgment overruling the demurrer was not erroneous.

2. Circumstantial evidence of venue held sufficient.

The evidence in regard to venue was circumstantial, but was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the jurisdiction of the case was in the county of Wheeler.

3. Criminal law  $\S$  762(3)—Instruction defining "express malice" held not to express opinion that it had been proved.

The court charged the jury as follows: "Express malice is that deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature, which is manifested by external circumstances capable of proof." Error is assigned on this charge, on the ground that there was no evidence to warrant a charge on express malice, and that the court, in so charging on express malice, intimated to the jury and expressed an opinion to them that there had been express malice proved in said case. Held, that the charge is in the exact language of the Penal Code, and is not subject to the criticism that it was an intimation or expression of opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Express Malice.]

4. Criminal law  $\S$  784(5)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held not erroneous, though evidence was circumstantial.

Error is assigned on the following charge to the jury: "If, after you have examined all the evidence in this case, your minds are unsatisfied, unsettled, wavering, and you cannot, viewing the transaction as you do any other ordinary transaction, come to a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, you ought to acquit him; but if the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, it is your duty to convict him." The criticism upon the charge is that "the law in this case is not dependent upon the doctrine alone of reasonable doubt, but is dependent upon the law of circumstantial evidence; and the charge places this case on the doctrine alone of reasonable doubt, when the court should have gone further and placed the case on the doctrine of circumstantial evidence, and charged the jury that, before they would be authorized to convict the defendant, the evidence should exclude all reasonable doubt and every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." Held, that the charge was not erroneous. "Whether dependent upon positive or circumstantial evidence, the true question in criminal cases is, not whether it be possible that the conclusion at which the testimony points may be false, but whether there is sufficient testimony to satisfy the mind and conscience beyond a reasonable doubt." Pen. Code 1910, § 1013; McNaughton v. State, 136 Ga. 600, 612 (2), 71 S. E. 1038. The court fully and correctly charged the law of circumstantial evidence.

5. Criminal law  $\S$  762(3), 781(2)—Evidence held to authorize charge on inculpatory statements or admissions; charge on admissions held not to intimate opinion that confession or admission had been proved.

Error is assigned on the following charge to the jury: "All admissions should be scanned with care and should be received with great caution. An admission uncorroborated by other evidence is not sufficient to justify a conviction. To make an admission admissible, it must have been made voluntarily, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or the remotest fear of injury." The criticism is that there was no evidence in the case to authorize a charge on that subject, and that an instruction by the court on that subject was an expression of "opinion to the jury, and intimated to them that there had been a confession proved, or an admission, criminal admission in the nature of and synonymous with a confession." Held:

(a) There was evidence authorizing a charge on the subject of inculpatory statements or admissions.

(b) The charge was not subject to the criticism that it amounted to an expression of opinion or an intimation that there had been a confession or admission.

(c) The court more than once clearly and fairly submitted to the jury the issue as to whether there had been any admissions. See the next succeeding headnote.

6. Criminal law  $\S$  762(3), 781(4), 1172(7)—Instruction applying law of confessions to admissions held not misleading; held not to intimate opinion; instruction applying rule as to confessions to admissions held favorable to defendant; "inculpatory statements"; "incriminatory admissions."

Error is assigned on the following charge: "If you find any admissions were made by the defendant, and that such admissions were made voluntarily without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or the remotest fear of injury, then you would be authorized to consider such admissions as you would any other testimony in the case; but if such admissions were not made voluntarily, or were induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or the remotest fear of injury, you would not be authorized to consider such admissions as testimony, but should reject the same. If you find any admissions were made by the defendant, and that same were made voluntarily, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury, and that the same is corroborated by other evidence in the case, then you may consider same along with the other evidence in determining his guilt or innocence, remembering that an admission is a circumstance which requires the aid of other testimony to authorize a conclusion of guilt, and that an admission alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, is insufficient to justify a conviction." The criticism is that the principles of law thus stated constitute the law with reference to confessions, and, there being no confession proved, the charge was unwarranted, inapplicable, and misleading to the jury; that it was argumentative, ambiguous, and intimated to the jury that a confession had been made, or that an admission had been made by the defendant in the nature of a confession, which was sufficiently corroborated in the same manner as the law requires confessions to be corroborated, and was sufficient to convict the defendant. Held: "Admissions usually refer to civil cases." Pen. Code 1910, § 1028. When applied to criminal cases such evidence is usually termed inculpatory statements or incriminatory admissions, and these expressions are frequently used as synonymous, and must have been so understood in the instructions of the court in this case. The fact that the judge, in connection with the incriminatory admissions, charged, not only that they should be received with care, but that it must appear that they were freely and voluntarily made, not induced by fear of punishment or hope of reward, was not a defect in the charge of which the defendant can complain, and was in fact favorable to the defendant, as it placed the same restriction upon criminal admissions that the statute requires be placed upon confessions; but it did not imply in any way that the incriminatory admissions were confessions. Consequently the inaccuracy in the charge does not call for the grant of a new trial.

7. Criminal law  $\S$  781(4)—Instruction applying law of confessions to admissions held not misleading.

Movant complains that the court charged the jury "in reference to what might be termed 'inculpatory admissions of fact,' and erroneously characterized and denominated them as admissions of guilt or a confession which, if corroborated, as provided in the cases of admissions and confessions of guilt would be sufficient to convict. In other words, the court charged the law fully with reference to confessions, but in said charge denominated confessions as an admission, and substituted the word 'admission' only in charging said law, instead of the word 'confession.'" Held, that the charge of the court in these respects, considered in the light of the ruling in the next preceding headnote, will not require the grant of a new trial.

8. Criminal law  $\S$  338(2), 406(1), 486, 494, 563, 828—Homicide  $\S$  228(1)—Elaboration of charge on corpus delicti should have been requested; corpus delicti may be proved by circumstantial evidence; evidence held to authorize finding of corpus delicti; proof essential; evidence to be considered in passing on proof stated; opinion of expert entitled to more weight when facts stated.

Complaint is made that: "The court failed to charge the jury in reference to the corpus delicti in said case, this being one of the main contentions of movant in the trial of the case, that the evidence did not show that there had been a homicide or that a person had in fact been killed; nor did he charge the jury the degree of proof necessary to establish the fact that a killing had taken place, or that any one had been murdered. In other words, movant contends that, under the evidence in the case and position taken by counsel for defendant, the court should have charged the jury fully with reference to the necessity of establishing by testimony on the part of the state that the dead man was actually killed, and did not die from other causes, before they would be authorized to go further in their deliberations as to who the party was doing the killing, or did the killing in the case." Held:

(a) The court charged the jury that if the evidence did not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant "did, by any one or more of the means and in the manner alleged in the indictment, unlawfully kill Robert Wilcox" with malice aforethought, they should return a verdict of not guilty. If the defendant desired an elaboration on the subject of corpus delicti, he should have duly requested the same in writing.

(b) The corpus delicti may be proved by circumstantial evidence, as well as by direct evidence. In this case the jury were authorized to find that a homicide had been committed.

9. Homicide  $\S$  250—Circumstantial evidence held to support conviction.

The evidence was circumstantial, but authorized the jury to find that it was consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, and excluded every reasonable hypothesis other than that of the guilt of the accused.

Error from Superior Court, Wheeler County; Eschol Graham, Judge.

J. E. Buckhanon was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Stephens & Stephens and W. A. Dampier, all of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

M. H. Boyer, Sol. Gen., of Hawkinsville, Geo. M. Napier, Atty. Gen., Seward M. Smith, Asst. Atty. Gen., and W. S. Mann, of McRae, for the State.

GILBERT, J. [1-7] 1-7. The first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh headnotes do not require elaboration.

[8] 8. In addition to the count charging murder by drowning, there were other counts in the indictment charging murder by shooting, cutting, stabbing, striking with clubs and other blunt instruments to the grand jurors unknown. The indictment alleges that the deceased was killed by J. El Buckhanon and J. C. Thompson. The former was tried and convicted, and upon the overruling of his motion for a new trial the case was brought to this court for review. Counsel for plaintiff in error insist that the grant of a new trial is required, because the court, without request, omitted to instruct the jury in regard to the degree of proof required to establish the corpus delicti. It is also insisted that the grant of a new trial is required, because the evidence was insufficient to authorize a finding that Robert Willcox was actually killed by any one, as alleged in the bill of indictment, and that he did not die from other cause. The court charged the jury that if the evidence did not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant "did, by any one or more of the means and in the manner alleged in the indictment, unlawfully kill Robert Willcox" with malice aforethought, they should return a verdict of not guilty.

The court also charged the jury:

"One cannot be convicted of the homicide of another when death was brought about by natural causes, or by misfortune or by accident, and should it appear that Robert Willcox is dead, and that he died from natural causes, or that he died by misfortune or accident, or if you have a reasonable doubt that he is dead, or if dead that his death was produced by natural causes, misfortune, or accident, then the defendant should be found not guilty."

If the accused had desired an elaboration on the charge on the subject of corpus delicti, he should have duly requested the same in writing.

In regard to the sufficiency of the evidence to prove the corpus delicti, it must be borne in mind that the jury of the vicinage deemed the evidence sufficient, and their finding has been approved by the trial court. The trial court and jury are in better position than this court to form a clear conception of what are the facts and what is the truth. The evidence in regard to corpus delicti before the trial court was uncontradicted, and to the effect that Robert Willcox, alleged in the indictment to have been killed, was found dead on "Steamboat Bite" Island in the Oconee river, in Wheeler county, everything indicating that he had been washed ashore by a freshet. He had been missing about seven weeks, and his body was partly decomposed. He was fully recognized by his clothing and other indicia. He was about 19 years of age, a splendid specimen of manhood, suffering from no impairment of health, and had experienced no business depression or other trouble so far as known. He had gone into the river swamp to make a record of cross-ties, and thereafter to hunt. The last persons with whom he had been seen were Buckhanon and Thompson, charged with his homicide. His hat, a gun, some shells, hunting sack, and the book in which he had recorded the number of cross-ties were found covered with straw, a short distance from the river on the outer edge of the swamp and about one mile downstream from where the body was found. It was impossible for him to have followed the bank of the river from this point to where the body was found, because the swamp was impenetrable. The only way of going from the point where his effects were buried to the point where searchers discovered his body was to go about two miles around the outside of the swamp or to go up the stream of the river in a bateau, canoe, or similar water craft. Subsequently to his disappearance, and before his body was found, there had been heavy rains, and the stream of the river had been greatly swollen. Blood was found on the inside of the bateau used by the defendant Buckhanon and kept at and about the landing on the river near where the hat, gun, etc., were found, and where Willcox had last been seen in life in company with the defendants. Dr. Leroy Napier, a practicing physician since the year 1898, who knew Robert Willcox and who saw him on the afternoon before his disappearance, swore that the deceased had "never been afflicted with paralysis or anything like that that impaired his limbs." He further testified that—

When the body was recovered he examined it, and found it in a very badly decomposed condition; "the left eye and left cheek and also the flesh on the neck, all the left side, was sloughing, falling away; the left eye was practically gone; there was a little loblolly mess in the socket; a portion of his cheek had disappeared, exposing the upper and lower jaw underneath. We could not find any evidence of any cuts or punctures on his body; the skin was thick and doughy, pretty well water-logged. In the condition the flesh was in it is possible there could have been a bullet wound and we overlooked it; we made a pretty thorough examination. So far as we could tell, the bony structure of the head was intact; in fact there was no fracture down to the base; of course the skin was mummified like heavy parchment paper. We did not find any blow on the head. The skull was in such condition we could not tell if there had been blow on the head, unless it had been sufficient to break the skull; he could have had a blow on the head sufficient to have killed him without fracturing the skull. In my opinion we found something about the body that indicated he had received a blow about the head, and that was the peculiar position of his right hand. His left hand was flexed partially, something in this position, while his right hand was very tightly clinched, and was back like that [indicating]. That indicated a blow on the side of his head prior to his death, or some injury to the skull that would produce a hemorrhage inside on the brain tissue; or at least that was the way I interpreted it. I don't know that that would indicate that he died in agony, but it indicated to me that he received an injury just before his death. His hand at that time was rigid; it had not been changed from the time he was found until I saw it. What we call rigor mortis had never been broken up in that hand or arm; the arm was stiff. I think it was in the same condition it was in when he died, the fingers pulled down tightly and the hand in that position. I do not think that is usual in an ordinary case of death. I think if he had died with both hands clinched in the same condition, they would not have been clinched back in that position; we find that in paralysis; even a living subject will carry his hand like that; does not seem to be able to get it out of that position. I don't know that a lick on the head usually causes paralytic condition; the usual cause of paralysis is a hemorrhage on the brain; a lick would have produced that condition."

On cross-examination there was considerable elaboration of the opinions expressed in the above quotation, but the substance of the entire evidence of Dr. Napier is included in the above quotation.

It is well established that without satisfactory proof of the corpus delicti a conviction for crime cannot stand. Langston v. State, 151 Ga. —, 106 S. E. 903. In passing on the question of whether the corpus delicti has been proved, all admissions of independent facts and all circumstantial evidence bearing on that question should be considered. Wilburn v. State, 141 Ga. 510, 513 (10), 81 S. E. 444. Whether the corpus delicti was established in this case depends largely on the weight and value of the evidence of Dr. Napier, considered in connection with the fact that the hat, etc., belonging to the deceased, were found a short distance from the river, that blood was found in the bateau, and that the body was found about a mile up stream. It would seem that the inference is justified that the deceased would not himself have buried his personal effects underneath a bed of straw had he planned self-destruction. The force of logic would also drive us to the conclusion that, had the deceased thrown himself into the river at or near the point where his effects were buried, his body would have drifted downstream, and could not have been found a mile further up the river. It must be remembered that the opinion evidence is that of an expert in respect to the stated facts about which the opinion was expressed. It is proper and desirable that expert testimony should be kept within proper bounds, especially in criminal cases, where the life or liberty of the accused is at stake. It is also true that opinions are entitled to more weight where facts are stated, and not mere opinions or conclusions. The statement of facts is made essential, under the laws of this state, in the case of nonexpert witnesses, and the latter cannot testify to opinions or conclusions without stating the facts upon which the same are based. Of an expert witness this is not required, but in the present case the expert witness does state with clearness and precision the facts upon which his opinions were founded. For this reason the opinion is entitled to more weight than would otherwise be the case had he failed to state the facts.

"Expert testimony is to be weighed and judged like any other, and the same tests are to be applied thereto. It is not necessarily conclusive or controlling, even when uncontradicted by the testimony of other experts; but its weight and value are to be determined by the jury, who should consider it in connection with all the other evidence in the case, the means of knowledge of the expert, the reasons which he assigns for his opinions, and the truth or falsity of the facts assumed in the hypothetical questions put to him. However, where witnesses, although experts, describe symptoms and conditions actually observed by them, and their testimony stands unimpeached, it cannot be ignored, any more than any other credible evidence in the case can be; and where the subject of discussion is not on the border line between the domains of general and expert knowledge, but concerns a highly specialized art of which a layman can have no knowledge at all, the court and jury necessarily must depend to a great extent on the opinions of qualified experts." 16 O. J. 756, § 1556; 11 Ruling Case Law, 586, § 16; page 611, § 84, and notes; Penal Code 1910, § 1048; Civil Code 1910, § 5876; Yates v. State, 127 Ga. 813 (4), 816, 56 S. E. 1017, 9 Ann. Cas. 620.

Applying the foregoing principles of law to the evidence, we conclude that the jury were authorized to find that the corpus delicti was established as required by law.

[§] 9. In addition to the facts stated in the foregoing division of the opinion, the evidence authorized the jury to find the facts hereinafter stated to be true in reference to the connection of the defendant Buckhanon. On Saturday, the 15th of January, 1921, Buckhanon, who seemed to be a roving fisherman, and also the younger man, Thompson, were fishing at Cheney's Ferry, in Wheeler county, and had been there a little more than two weeks. They were accustomed to spend Saturday night at the residence of J. H. Thompson, an uncle of the defendant Thompson, situated four or five miles away. They both kept clothes at this house. On that night they came to the uncle's house from the direction of the river, and their pants seemed to be a little wet. Buckhanon mentioned that Robert Willcox came into the swamp that day, and said that he left Willcox lying by a fire near an oak, and that Willcox was wet and drunk. The witness Vaughn testified that Buckhanon, Thompson, Willcox, and himself were all drinking, and that they consumed about a quart of whisky. On the commitment trial of Thompson Buckhanon swore that the whisky was his, and that he and Thompson ran it off the night before. The oak is near a gate leading into the swamp, and at this place the gun, hat, etc., were found covered with straw. This point is also near a shanty sometimes used by Buckhanon. At or near this point on this occasion young Robert Willcox was last seen alive with the two defendants by the witness Vaughn. On reaching the home of the uncle, J. H. Thompson, Buckhanon had a conversation with the 13 year old daughter of the former. She testified that he asked her to cut his throat with a razor; that he seemed like there was something the matter with him; he acted funny; did not talk like he always did; that Buckhanon had about 20 gun shells, the same color as those which he had given John Williams, and that Buckhanon said he bought some of the shells from Mr. Willcox, and Mr. Vaughn gave him some [witness Vaughn testified that he loaned Buckhanon the gun, but did not furnish him with any shells], and that he gave the shells to her brother, who in turn delivered them to the witness McKay, who exhibited them on the trial to the court and jury. The gun borrowed by Buckhanon from the witness Vaughn was also turned over to the witness McKay. On the next morning, Sunday, January 16th, Buckhanon left this house, taking with him all of his clothing and other effects, including some meat and vegetables, going to the river. This was the first time he had carried all of his effects with him upon leaving. On reaching the river he took his bateau and proceeded down stream. On Sunday night Buckhanon, traveling in his bateau, approached some raftsmen, who were also going down the river on drifting timber. One of these raftsmen, George Quinn, testified that Buckhanon offered him whisky; that Buckhanon's face was black, and "you could not tell whether he was a white man or a negro;" that he gave Buckhanon a cup of coffee, and when the latter reached his hand over, stretching his arm, "I saw where the black stopped;" that Buckhanon "said he was going on below us to Barker's Landing, that he had a fishery down there; he said his name was Cook." Witness saw Buckhanon again on the next day, Monday, further down the river, and spoke to him, but Buckhanon did not reply. Witness said to him:

"Last night you were a negro; now you have changed to a white man; you have on a collar and tie."

To this Buckhanon made no reply. Another witness on the raft swore that Buckhanon was "black, disguised; I could not tell he was a white man only by his sleeve and his forehead," and that Buckhanon said his name was Cook. J. M. Smith, a witness for the state, testified that on Tuesday, January 18th, he was on the Altamaha river near Galtor slide, near the bend of the old river, Ochoopee, White Bluff, in Appling county; that there he saw Buckhanon going down the river in a bateau; that he talked to him, and that Buckhanon gave his name as Vaughn;" that his face was not then blackened; and that Buckhanon sold his bateau for $2 and a plug of tobacco. Witness carried Buckhanon a mile below Surrency, where Buckhanon got out in the woods. L. W. Hall swore that on Wednesday or Thursday he examined Buckhanon's boat, and found blood stains on the left-hand wall of the boat, like it had been spattered up there; and just opposite the blood stain on the wall it looked like something had been dragged out of the boat. There was also a small amount of blood on the seat. Suspicion having been directed to Buckhanon after the disappearance of Robert Willcox, a search was made for him, and he was finally located about one mile from Offerman, in Pierce county, some 75 or 80 miles from Cheney's Ferry in Wheeler county, where Robert Willcox was last seen alive. He was captured at the home of a man named Hall. Three arresting officers, on arriving at this house, inquired for Buckhanon. The house and kitchen were searched, but Buckhanon was not found in either. Finally he was discovered underneath the house; and when he came out his first words were:

"God knows I don't know nothing about that poor boy. I don't know where that poor boy is at"

—nothing having been said to him about Willcox or as to the cause of the arrest. The prisoner was taken back to Cheney's Ferry; and the gun, hat, etc., belonging to Willcox, having already been found, Buckhanon was asked to point out the place where they had been hidden. He carried the party directly to the place where these things had been found, and showed them how the gun was lying. Another witness testified in substance that Buckhanon said Thompson shot Willcox, and that at another time he explained that he had heard a gunshot and saw something fall in the river, but that his eyesight was bad, and that he could not tell what it was. A. C. Curry, a witness for the state, testified: That he was a county policeman, and with another officer had taken Buckhanon and Thompson on the train to jail. That he heard Buckhanon, who was sitting on the seat with Thompson, tell the latter that if he would take on himself the killing of this young man, he would pay his lawyer's fee and also provide for him while he was in the chain gang. That Buckhanon also said:

"You are a young man; they will not hang you. I am an old man. If you will take it on yourself, I will look out for you."

Buckhanon said also that he could not live more than 10 years, and that before he died he would admit it and tell how he did it, and that they would be obliged to turn Thompson loose.

After careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence, we are satisfied that the jury were authorized to find that the proved facts were not only consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but were sufficient to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused. We have dealt with all of the assignments of error, deeming it only necessary, however, to elaborate upon the principles ruled in the eighth and ninth headnotes. The verdict was supported by evidence, and the judgment of the trial court, overruling the motion for a new trial, was not erroneous.

Judgment affirmed.

GIBBS et al. v. GIBBS et al. (No. 2137.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Executors and administrators  $\S$  473, 474 (1)—Grounds for interference with administration by injunction and receivership not shown.

Under the pleadings and the evidence in this case the court erred in granting an interlocutory injunction and appointing a receiver.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Execution  $\S$  228—Executrix who was also life tenant held authorized in her individual capacity to purchase remainder interest at execution sale.

Though a trustee cannot purchase an interest adverse to his trust, where an executrix, who was also life tenant, had no control over the remainders, and was charged with no trust in respect thereto, she had a right in her individual capacity to purchase a remainder interest sold under execution, whether or not she had money in hand as executrix with which she might have purchased it.

3. Execution  $\S$  245—Remaindermen not entitled to complain that executrix purchased interest of another remainderman under execution, and he could not do so where he accepted purchase price.

Even though an executrix, who was also life tenant, had no right in her individual capacity to purchase a remainder interest sold under execution, the owners of the other remainder interests could not complain and the owner of the interest sold could not do so where he ratified the purchase by accepting the purchase money after payment of the execution.

4. Trusts  $\S$  81 (2)—That wife persuaded husband to take title in her name to protect family did not create resulting trust.

Where deeds to a wife for land purchased by her husband were absolute deeds, the fact that she importuned and persuaded him to take title in her name for the benefit of herself and their heirs and children, so that in case he should become unfortunate or have judgments entered against him provision would be made for the family, did not create a resulting trust.

5. Courts  $\S$  475 (2, 3) — Court of ordinary permitted to retain jurisdiction acquired before institution of suit in equity to remove executor.

Under Civ. Code 1910,  $\S$  4540, providing that, where law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction, the court first taking will retain it unless a good reason can be given for the interference of equity where an application for the removal of an executor was pending in the ordinary's court when a suit was instituted by parties to such proceeding for the same purpose, the court of ordinary should retain jurisdiction, unless good reason can be given for the interference of equity.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; O. T. Gower, Judge.

Suit by C. A. Gibbs and another against J. B. D. Gibbs and others. Judgment granting an injunction and appointing a receiver, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Thomas S. Gibbs died testate in 1912. By his will he bequeathed all his personal property to his wife, Mary E. Gibbs, for life, with remainder to his children and a grandson (the son of a deceased daughter) jointly; he devised his real estate to his wife for life with remainder in specific devises to his children and grandson. Two of the testator's sons were named testamentary trustees for the grandson, who was a minor. Mary E. Gibbs, wife, and Early Gibbs, a son, were named executors of the will. They qualified as such. Mary E. Gibbs died intestate on February 13, 1920. T. W. Gibbs, a son of Thomas S. and Mary E. Gibbs, was in writing selected by all the heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs, except Early Gibbs, as administrator of Mary E. Gibbs. He was duly appointed and qualified as administrator on April 12, 1920, giving bond with an approved surety in the sum of more than $20,000.

On May 6, 1920, C. A. Gibbs and Mrs. Julia McSwain, children of Thomas S. and Mary E. Gibbs, legatees and devisees in remainder of Thomas Gibbs, and heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs, as aforesaid, filed an equitable petition in Ben Hill superior court, against the other legatees and devisees of Thomas S. Gibbs and heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs, T. W. Gibbs, administrator of Mary E. Gibbs, and two named banks alleged to be holders of certain funds belonging to the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs. The petition alleged substantially the following:

Early Gibbs, some time before the death of his mother, had ceased to take any part in the administration of the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs, and Mary E. Gibbs had for several years managed the estate. The lands devised in remainder to Early Gibbs by the will of Thomas S. Gibbs consisted of lots 14, 15, and 16 in square 5, block 16, of the city of Fitzgerald. On March 5, 1918, Early Gibbs being insolvent, his remainder interest in the said city lots was sold by the sheriff of Ben Hill county under execution, and was purchased by Mary E. Gibbs for the sum of $331. After paying the amount of the execution ($31), the balance of the money derived from the sale was paid over to and accepted by Early Gibbs. The purchase of the remainder interest in these city lots was not necessary for the protection of the life estate of Mary E. Gibbs; and, inasmuch as Mary E. Gibbs had sufficient funds in hand, as executrix of Thomas S. Gibbs, to pay for said remainder interest, she was estopped from acquiring any interest in the same adverse to the estate and devisees in remainder of Thomas S. Gibbs, and now holds the same in trust for said devisees, including Early Gibbs, who should be required to account for the sum of money paid over and accepted by him as aforesaid.

At the time Mary E. Gibbs intermarried with Thomas S. Gibbs she had no property in her own right, and was without capacity to earn money or acquire property, except by gift; and Thomas S. Gibbs did not acquire any property by or through Mary E. Gibbs, except a tract of land in the third district of Ben Hill county devised by Thomas S. Gibbs to his minor grandson. Thomas S. Gibbs in his lifetime purchased and paid the purchase money of all the property held by Mary E. Gibbs at the time of her death, particularly certain property in the third district of Ben Hill county. Mary E. Gibbs "importuned and finally persuaded Thomas S. Gibbs to take title" to the several tracts of land described in the petition in her name "for the benefit of herself and all of the heirs and children of the said Thomas S. Gibbs, so that in case the said Thomas Gibbs should at any time become unfortunate, or thereafter have judgments entered against him, he would have made some provision for his family; and the said Mary E. Gibbs accepted said title and allowed the same to be made to her with the purpose and understanding" that she would hold the said described lands "for the benefit of herself and the heirs collectively of the said Thomas Gibbs, and it was never contemplated by the said Thomas or the said Mary E. Gibbs that she should have the unlimited right of disposition of said land."

Mary E. Gibbs was a woman of no business ability, illiterate, and was for a long time prior to her death in feeble health. She was incapable of contracting. Two of the defendants, J. B. D. Gibbs and Rosa Belle Gibbs, unduly influenced Mary E. Gibbs to execute to J. B. D. Gibbs and Rosa Belle Gibbs a deed to the city lots in Fitzgerald purchased at the sheriff's sale as aforesaid, a deed to Rosa Belle Gibbs to a tract of land in the third district of Ben Hill county, and a deed to J. B. D. Gibbs to another tract of land in Ben Hill county. The deed from Mary E. Gibbs to J. B. D. Gibbs and Rosa Belle Gibbs to the city lots in Fitzgerald is void, as a cloud upon petitioners' title, because Mary E. Gibbs was estopped to acquire title to the remainder interest in said lots, and the deeds from Mary E. Gibbs to the named defendants, and each of them, are void for want of capacity in Mary E. Gibbs to execute the same, and for fraud and undue influence practiced and exercised by the named defendants upon Mary E. Gibbs. The administrator of Mary E. Gibbs is colluding with J. B. D. and Rosa Belle Gibbs, and fails to take any steps to have the said deeds canceled or to recover the lands described therein for the benefit of the heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs.

J. B. D. and Rosa Belle Gibbs, after the death of Mary E. Gibbs, took possession of $600 in money belonging to the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs. Mary E. Gibbs and Early Gibbs, as executors of Thomas S. Gibbs, sold at private sale certain live stock belonging to the estate. Under the will the life tenant was given merely the use and income of the property, both real and personal. Neither as life tenant nor as executrix did Mary E. Gibbs have authority to sell said personal property and to apply the proceeds of the sale to her use and benefit. The money arising from the sale of the personal property was used by Mary E. Gibbs to acquire title to the reversionary interest of Early Gibbs in the lots in the city of Fitzgerald, or was deposited by her in her name in designated banks, said deposits being evidenced by time certificates. Neither the lots nor the money on deposit constitute a part of the estate of Mary E. Gibbs, but should be administered as the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs. On April 20, 1920, petitioners brought suit against J. B. D. Gibbs, Rosa Belle Gibbs, T. W. Gibbs, individually and as administrator, and others, in Crisp superior court, to restrain T. W. Gibbs, as administrator of Mary E. Gibbs, from administering said certificates of deposit. T. W. Gibbs is not faithfully and impartially administering the estate, and has shown a disposition to favor defendants J. B. D. Gibbs and Rosa Belle Gibbs, by virtue of the facts already alleged, and by reason of the payment by him of a sum of money in discharge of an indebtedness contracted by the named defendants for a monument placed on the family burial lot. The sum of money paid was in fact paid out of the money on deposit as aforesaid. During the lifetime of Mary E. Gibbs a deed from Mary E. Gibbs to Early Gibbs to 400 acres of land in Ben Hill county was placed on record. Mary E. Gibbs instituted against Early Gibbs a suit to cancel the deed, and this suit is still pending. The administrator of Mary E. Gibbs intends to be made a party in her stead, and said suit is in order for trial.

On April 13, 1920, a petition to remove Early Gibbs as executor of the will of Thomas S. Gibbs was filed in the court of ordinary of Ben Hill county. The petition was filed in the name of all the devisees of Thomas S. Gibbs and heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs, including petitioners in this suit, but the latter were joined without their authority. A Mrs. Cooper has instituted proceedings against the administrator of Mary E. Gibbs, to foreclose a lien in the nature of a liveryman's lien for the feed of certain live stock alleged to belong to the estate. Early Gibbs, as executor of the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs, has given bond and replevied the stock. T. W. Gibbs administrator of Mary E. Gibbs' estate, has instituted a bill trover proceeding against Early Gibbs, to regain possession of the stock. Said administrator has instituted an equitable suit to restrain petitioners in this suit and Early Gibbs from taking wood off a certain lot of land. Petitioners have no desire to do the acts complained of in the petition, and the suit by Mrs. Cooper was encouraged by the administrator, and the suit of the administrator was brought for the purpose of involving the estate in needless litigation. In addition, a suit was brought by Mary E. Gibbs, as executrix, during her lifetime, to require Early Gibbs to account for certain moneys paid by Thomas S. Gibbs and by the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs for the use and benefit of Early Gibbs individually, which suit is still pending.

The prayers of the petition were that all the suits referred to, except the suit brought by Mary E. Gibbs against Early Gibbs to cancel the deed purporting to have been executed by her to Early Gibbs, be enjoined, and the parties be required to intervene and set up whatever claims they may have against the estates of Thomas S. Gibbs and Mary E. Gibbs in this proceeding; that defendants J. B. D. and Rosa Belle Gibbs be required to deliver up for cancellation the deeds referred to; that said last-named defendants be required to account for the $600 belonging to the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs; that there be an accounting between the administrator of Mary E. Gibbs and the surviving executor of Thomas S. Gibbs; that the assets of the two estates be marshaled and administered by a receiver; that defendants J. B. D. Gibbs and Rosa Belle Gibbs be enjoined from encumbering or in any manner changing the status of the title to the land they respectively claim; that T. W. Gibbs, individually and as administrator of Mary E. Gibbs, be enjoined from changing the status of the property in his hands as administrator; for general relief; and for process.

The defendants demurred, upon the grounds, that the petition set forth no cause of action for equitable relief; that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant; that Mary E. Gibbs acquired title under the sheriff's deed to the remainder interest of Early Gibbs in the city lots, under the allegations of the petition; that Mary E. Gibbs did not hold title to the lands described in the petition as trustee under the allegations of the petition; and that the plaintiffs, by reason of the acquiescence of Thomas S. Gibbs and the laches of the plaintiffs, as disclosed by the petition, cannot claim that Mary E. Gibbs held said lands as trustee for the benefit of Thomas S. Gibbs or of his devisees. The defendants demurred specially to several paragraphs of the petition. They also answered, denying all the material allegations. On the interlocutory hearing, had before the appearance term, the demurrers were urged as a reason why the relief prayed should not be granted. There is some conflict in the evidence on minor matters, but there is no substantial conflict on the real issues raised by the pleadings except as noted in the opinion. The court granted the injunction and appointed a receiver, as prayed. The defendants excepted.

Cutts & Nicholson, of Fitzgerald, for plaintiffs in error.

F. M. Powers, Wall & Grantham, A. J. & J. C. McDonald, and Clayton Jay, all of Fitzgerald, for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2, 3] The plaintiffs below (defendants in error here) insist that Mrs. Gibbs could not buy the remainder interest of her son, Early Gibbs, at the sheriff's sale, and that such purchase was necessarily for the benefit of the estate of which she was executrix. The general principle that a trustee cannot purchase an interest adverse to his trust is invoked. The principle is fully recognised, but it has no application here. Under the will of Thomas S. Gibbs, a copy of which was attached to the petition, vested remainders were created. The executrix of Thomas S. Gibbs had no control over the remainders. She was charged with no trust in respect thereto. It may or it may not have been necessary for Mrs. Gibbs, the life tenant, who was also executrix of the will of Thomas S. Gibbs, to purchase the remainder interest of Early Gibbs in the city lots for the protection of her life estate. She may or may not have had money in hand as executrix with which to purchase such remainder interest. She had no authority to purchase the remainder interest as executrix. As an individual she desired to purchase the remainder interest. Her right to do so in the circumstances of this case is clear and unquestioned. But if her right to do so were not clear, Early Gibbs alone can complain. He is not complaining. On the contrary he accepted the purchase money, after the payment of the execution against him, thereby ratifying the sale of his remainder interest to his mother individually. The remainderman is not questioning the validity of the sale, and by virtue of his ratification thereof cannot question the validity of the sale, if there were otherwise any question as to its validity. See Neal v. Field, 68 Ga. 534; Pike v. Stallings, 71 Ga. 860 (5); Treadaway v. Richards, 92 Ga. 264, 18 S. E. 25; Shepherd v. Todd, 95 Ga. 19, 22 S. E. 32.

[4] We are also of the opinion that, under the allegations of the petition as it now stands, and the proof offered in support thereof at the interlocutory hearing, no resulting trust arose in favor of the devisees of Thomas S. Gibbs or of the children and heirs at law of Mrs. Mary E. Gibbs. The deeds to Mrs. Mary E. Gibbs, so far as appears, were absolute deeds, and the allegation of the petition is that at the time these deeds were taken Mrs. Gibbs "importuned and finally persuaded Thomas S. Gibbs to take title" to the land in her name, "for the benefit of herself and of all the heirs and children of the said Thomas S. Gibbs, so that in case the said Thomas S. Gibbs should at any time become unfortunate, or thereafter have judgments entered against him, he would have made some provision for his family." The evidence goes no further than the allegations of fact. In principle the case is controlled by the ruling in Vickers v. Vickers, 133 Ga. 383, 65 S. E. 885, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1043, and Jackson v. Jackson, 146 Ga. 675, 92 S. E. 65.

[1] "Equity will not interfere with the regular administration of estates, except upon the application of the representative, either, first for construction and direction, second for marshaling the assets; or upon application of any person interested in the estate, where there is danger of loss or other injury to his interests." Civil Code 1910, § 4596. As a general rule, equity will not interfere with the regular administration of estates by the representative, and to authorize such interference the facts must clearly show there is good reason for so doing. Morrison v. McFarland, 147 Ga. 465, 94 S. E. 569. T. W. Gibbs was selected in writing by all the heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs, except Early Gibbs. Early Gibbs is not a complainant here. The parties complaining joined in the selection of T. W. Gibbs as administrator. They now assert that the estate is insolvent, but the administrator is under bond, with an approved surety. Within less than one month after his appointment a court of equity is asked to remove him and to appoint a receiver to take charge of the estate. It is said that he is favorable to certain of the heirs as defendants (plaintiffs in error). He has thus far failed to bring certain suits which, in the opinion of the plaintiffs, should be brought. It is said that he has paid an item of indebtedness which should have been charged to certain of the heirs as individuals. Upon this point the evidence can hardly be said to be in dispute. Before the erection of a monument on the family burial lot the heirs at law were consulted; and the facts strongly indicate, if they do not compel a finding, that all the heirs, including the plaintiffs in the court below, agreed to this expenditure. It would seem to be immaterial whether the money was paid out of the funds belonging to the estate of Thomas Gibbs or of Mary E. Gibbs, the children of Mary E. Gibbs in either event being entitled to the fund. But the payment of an improper item by the administrator will furnish no ground for the appointment of a receiver and for injunction, since this matter and similar matters set out in the petition are easily releveable in the court of ordinary.

[8] The petition does set forth grounds for the removal of Early Gibbs as executor of the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs. An application for his removal was pending in the ordinary's court of Ben Hill county at the time of the filing of the suit. The plaintiffs in the equity suit were parties to that proceeding. It is true that there is some evidence tending to show that they were not made parties by their consent, but nevertheless a proper proceeding is pending in a proper court for the removal of the executor, and a resort to equity in the premises is entirely unnecessary.

The courts of ordinary have jurisdiction in the administration of estates of deceased persons. While courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of ordinary in the administration of such estates, in all cases where equitable interference is necessary or proper to the full protection of the rights of the parties at interest, the court of ordinary of Ben Hill county having assumed jurisdiction in this case should retain it, unless good reason can be given for the interference of equity. Civil Code 1910, § 4540. Under the evidence in the record, a finding that the administrator of Mary E. Gibbs' estate was colluding with third persons, or encouraging them to institute suits against the estate for the purpose of involving the estate in needless litigation, was unauthorized. In one respect only is the petition meritorious. Where it appears that—

"an administrator is seeking to administer property, the title to which clearly appears to be in another, then a receiver should be appointed, if the circumstances indicate that the rights of all the parties would thereby be more effectually and expeditiously protected and enforced." Hill v. Arnold, 79 Ga. 367, 4 S. E. 751.

Giving full effect to the evidence offered by the plaintiffs, it appears that the administrator is seeking to administer a small amount of property belonging to another estate, to wit, the estate of Thomas S. Gibbs. It is conceded that the property in dispute will go ultimately to the children and representatives of children of Thomas S. and Mary E. Gibbs. It will go to the legatees of Thomas S. Gibbs and to the heirs at law of Mary E. Gibbs in exactly the same proportion. While this fact will not authorize the administrator of Mary E. Gibbs' estate to administer the property, it is a fact which should be taken in consideration by the court of equity. The amount of property in dispute is trifling as compared to the whole estate of Mary E. Gibbs. Indeed, the unadministered estate of Thomas S. Gibbs is itself trifling, and the bare circumstance that a dispute has arisen as to the title to a small amount of property which the administrator of Mary E. Gibbs is seeking to administer as a part of her estate is not of itself sufficient to authorize an injunction and the appointment of a receiver. The legal remedies provided afford to the plaintiffs ample and adequate protection. Conceding that some of their alleged rights can be asserted only in a court of equity, there is nothing in this record to authorize the issuance of an injunction and the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the two estates. The plaintiffs themselves may maintain equitable suits against all necessary and proper parties, to enforce such rights as they here seek to assert, without interfering with the duly appointed representative of the estate.

Judgment reversed.

CITY OF LA FAYETTE et al. v. WALKER COUNTY et al.

WALKER COUNTY et al. v. CITY OF LA FAYETTE et al.

(Nos. 2287, 2289.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 11, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Dedication §17, 20(1)—Dedication and acceptance may be implied; when intention to dedicate may be inferred stated.

The dedication of land to public use and the acceptance of such dedication may be implied. Intention to dedicate may be inferred from acquiescence by the owner in the use of his land by the public, if the use be of such character as to clearly indicate that the public accepted the dedication to the public use.

2. Dedication §14—Not essential that right should be vested in corporate body; use of land dedicated prior to organization of municipal corporation vests in it.

It is not essential to constitute a valid dedication to the public that the right of use should be vested in a corporate body. If there be a dedication of land to public use prior to the existence of a municipal corporation, then, upon such corporation being organized, including such land within its limits, the use of the land in trust for the public at once vests in it.

3. Dedication §11, 39, 47, 48—Land held impliedly dedicated as public square, and county permitted to use it not entitled to deny dedication; where county permitted to use public square had abandoned it, municipality entitled to enjoin use of square; privies of one dedicating land cannot afterwards appropriate it to private purposes; public square subject to dedication; dedication inures to benefit of all citizens then or thereafter.

Applying the foregoing legal principles to the allegations of the petition, it was not subject to general demurrer.

4. Appeal and error §1078(3)—Point considered as abandoned when not referred to in brief.

The demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff was abandoned.

5. Counties §218—In action to enjoin sale or lease of public square, etc., joinder of commissioners held proper.

In view of the allegations of the petition the county commissioners of the county could, in their representative capacity, be joined as codefendants with the county in the action against it.

6. Other ground of demurrer without merit.

The other ground of special demurrer set forth in the statement of facts preceding the opinion was not meritorious.

7. Dedication §53—City entitled to have title to square established and to enjoin sale or lease without showing that it was traversed by highways; unnecessary to prove allegation that county used square by agreement with city.

The evidence submitted on the trial by the plaintiffs tended to support the case laid in the petition, and the grant of a nonsuit was error.

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Suit by the City of La Fayette and others against the County of Walker and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiffs bring error, and defendants file a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

This case was brought by the city of La Fayette, N. E. Foster, C. L. McCall, and M. S. Jackson, against the county of Walker and its board of commissioners of roads and revenues, and J. N. Tate and S. F. Evans. The substance of the material parts of the petition are to the following effect: About the year 1835 a village existed in the territory now within the corporate limits of the city of La Fayette, Walker county. This village was laid out by the residents of the community into lots or blocks, and a common or public square was left vacant near its center, which was entered on the north by a street or highway approximately 60 feet wide, and extending south through such square, and two highways entered the square from the east and two from the west. "Said public square was a part and parcel of the highways of said village. That a number of stores, residences, and hotels were constructed, abutting said square and said highway, and that said public square was a reserve for public uses and a common place for the inhabitants of said village and the public generally to use for all public purposes." In 1835 the village was incorporated by the Legislature as the town of Chattooga, and made the county site of Walker county. In 1836 the name of the town was changed by the Legislature to La Fayette, and in 1903 the Legislature made the town of La Fayette a city. About 1839, in accordance with an agreement between the municipal authorities of the then town of La Fayette and the properly constituted authorities of Walker county, the county, by the permission of the municipality, erected a courthouse on the public square, to be used solely as a courthouse for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town, the county and the general public. "There never were any writings between said city and said county, and between said county and any persons, as to the title or the right of possession of Walker county to the land or rights of occupancy thereof by said county." The building was so used until February, 1883, when it was burned, together with all the public records and books. During the same year the county erected a new courthouse on the site of the old one, except that the new building included about 20 feet more on the east, and 20 feet more on the west side than the old building, which new building was used exclusively as a courthouse until 1917, when the building became dilapidated, unsanitary, and inadequate for the growth of the public business. The county then constructed a new courthouse on a site outside the public square, and some 300 or 400 feet east of it, all of the books, records, furniture and property of every description of the county therein being removed from the old building into the new one. Since that time the county has not used the old building or the grounds upon which it is situated for any public purpose. The square, since the settlement of the community, has ever been used by the general public for the purposes to which public squares and parks are ordinarily devoted.

In 1916 the county through its legally constituted authority undertook to contract with the city of La Fayette for the sale to the city of whatever rights the county had as to the building and the public square, and executed a bond to convey the same to the city upon payment of the purchase money. But as the purchase was to be on credit and a debt of the city to be incurred without an election for the purpose of obtaining the necessary vote of the citizens of the municipality to incur the debt, the proposed sale was abandoned.

"In June, 1917 [the named county commissioners], took a deed of whatever rights, title, and interest that the makers therein had, from J. P. Shattuck, W. O. Davenport, J. E. Patton, and W. E. Withers, for said old courthouse building and for a certain part of said public square [describing it], which included the old courthouse building, and a strip of land on the east and west sides of same, 12 feet outside of the building, and also some 75 feet on the south end of said old building, all of which was then and is now a public common or square, and used by the public in traveling and for public gatherings and for other public purposes. Said deed being only a quitclaim title, petitioners charge and allege that the act of said defendants was void as an act ultra vires. That said commissioners at said time of taking said deed in the name of Walker county knew that said courthouse building was ready to be abandoned, and that the same was inadequate for county purposes, and that the said county had no public uses therefor; and they exceeded their authority in making said transaction, although they took the deed in the name of Walker county."

After the abandonment by the county of the public use of the old courthouse and grounds described in this deed, the five defendant county commissioners began the conversion of the old courthouse and grounds into private use by letting the same to various tenants for the following uses: A cabinet shop, "jitney-bus" station, an express office, shoe shop, a vulcanizing establishment, and one part as living quarters for a family. They have encroached on the north side of the public square by building a platform some 8 feet wide by 20 feet long, and on the south side a platform of the same width by 50 feet long, "thereby impeding the free use to the citizens of said city and to the public in general of the public square as used for public purposes." It is alleged that the old dilapidated and unsanitary courthouse and the private uses for which it has been let by the commissioners, and encroachments made on the public square by them which obstruct the public highways or streets of the city, constitute a public nuisance. On the north, east, and west sides of the square, and facing it, are substantial business houses, used for many named important businesses, and the square is used by the citizens conducting such businesses, and by their patrons, and the general public; and, should the public square and old courthouse be converted to private uses, or sold for private uses, petitioners would be irreparably damaged thereby.

The commissioners advertised the property for sale, sealed bids to be received on April 15, 1920. On April 14, the city filed with its recorder and the mayor and council an application to remove the old courthouse building, and cited the county and the other defendants "to a trial thereon, which has not yet been held." On April 15, the city, before any bids were received and opened, notified prospective bidders and the commissioners of the proceeding the city had instituted for the removal of the old courthouse. Notwithstanding such notice, the defendants J. M. Tate and S. F. Evans bid for the property, submitting the highest bid, and deposited a certified check in accordance with the requirement of the commissioners. The purpose of such bidders is to obtain the property and convert it to private uses, thus denying its free and public use to the citizens of the city, the county, and the general public, which use would result to the great and irreparable injury and damage to the city, its inhabitants, and the general public. And, moreover, such private use of the premises would be "contrary to the grant of the authority to erect said building and the purposes for which the same was to be used." "Petitioners N. E. Foster, C. L. McCall, and M. S. Jackson" are residents and taxpayers of the city of La Fayette, "owning property adjoining and abutting said public square, that has been acquired for a valuable consideration prior to the abandonment of said courthouse for public uses, and that they acquired their rights in the purchasing of said property with the understanding and belief that said public square would at all times be put to nothing else except public use, and that the old courthouse building should be used for no other purpose than for public use; and, should a sale be made by the county to individuals to be used for private purposes, denying the free use of said public square to the public for public uses, that it would injure and damage each of said petitioners in the diminishing of the value of their property, and in the destruction of the business in which they are engaged, and that the damages would be irreparable."

The prayers were to the effect that the defendants be enjoined from effectuating the proposed trade to convey the premises in question to Tate and Evans; that it be decreed that Walker County has no title to the property in question, and that title to the same be adjudged to be in the city of La Fayette in trust for public uses; that should it be decided that the materials in the old courthouse building belong to Walker county, then the county and its commissioners be required to move such material "from said public square and from the highways of said city within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court"; that the county and its named five commissioners be enjoined from using any of the old building or the ground around the same for the private uses above referred to, or from renting or leasing any of the premises to others to be devoted to such private uses; and for general relief, etc.

All of the defendants demurred generally and specially to the petition, the grounds of special demurrer being: (1) Misjoinder of parties plaintiff; (2) misjoinder of parties defendant; and (3) "that it is not alleged in the petition that the city of La Fayette or any municipal corporation of which it is the successor ever owned or was in possession of or had the right of possession of the property alleged to have been dedicated for the use specified in said petition; that it is not alleged anywhere in the petition how, or in what way, or at what time said alleged dedication was made, or that there was ever to be a reversion of said property, or, if there was to be such reversion, how or under what circumstances, or to what person or corporation the same was to revert." The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants excepted pendente lite. They also answered. The trial resulted in a nonsuit, to which plaintiffs excepted; and the defendants filed a cross-bill, assigning error upon their exceptions pendente lite.

Glenn & Napier and Henry & Jackson, all of La Fayette, for plaintiffs in error.

Maddox & Doyal, of Rome, and Shattuck & Shattuck and Rosser & Shaw, all of La Fayette, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 3] The court properly overruled the general demurrer to the petition. Both the dedication of land to public use and the acceptance of such dedication may be implied. Intention to dedicate may be inferred from acquiescence by the owner in the use of his land by the public, if the use be of such character as to clearly indicate that the public accepted the dedication to the public use. Healey v. Atlanta, 125 Ga. 736, 54 S. E. 749; Chapman v. Floyd, 68 Ga. 455; Brown v. Gunn, 75 Ga. 443. Under section 4171 of the Civil Code, if the owner of land by his acts dedicates it to public use, and it is so used for such length of time that the public accommodation might be materially affected by the interruption of the enjoyment, he cannot afterwards appropriate it to private purposes. And if he cannot, it of course follows that his privies cannot.

A public square or a common in a town or city is the subject of dedication, and a dedication of land to a municipality to public use inures to the benefit of all who at the time are or may afterwards become citizens of the corporation. Mayor, etc., of Macon, v. Franklin, 12 Ga. 239. The petition alleges, in effect, that the area of land in question was laid off prior to the year 1835, as a public square in a village, or settlement, which in that year was incorporated as the town of Chattooga, and which subsequently became the town of La Fayette, and afterwards the city of La Fayette; that the square was used by the people of the community prior to the formation of the municipal corporation, and by the people of the latter, and by the public generally for such public uses to which public squares and parks are usually devoted. This state of affairs continued until 1839, when, in accordance with a parol agreement between the proper officials of the town of La Fayette and those of the county of Walker, the county was permitted to build a courthouse on the public square. The portion of the square not covered by the courthouse has continuously since then been used by the general public as a public square, and the courthouse was used for the public business until it was burned in 1883; and a new courthouse erected in that year was so used until 1917, when the county built a new one on another lot in the city, and abandoned the old building for public use, and let the same for private uses. The petition alleges, in effect, that the county never acquired any rights in and to the public park by any writing from the city, or from any person. These allegations are sufficient to authorize an implied dedication by the owner of the area of land in question to the village, town, and city to use as a public square, and an acceptance by them of such dedication; and as the county, according to the petition, obtained all of its rights to the public square by reason of the permission of the town of La Fayette, the county is not in a position to gainsay such implied dedication and acceptance. Taking the allegations of the petition to be true, they are sufficient to authorize an injunction against the county, its commissioners, and the other defendants, restraining them from using the public square, including that portion of it upon which the old courthouse is situated, and the courthouse itself, for any purpose, as the county has abandoned the right it had to the property for public uses.

[4] 2. The special demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff is not referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and must be considered as abandoned.

[5] 3. There is no merit in the demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendant. The contention for the county is that the suit is not only against the county of Walker, but against the named county commissioners as individuals. The action is not against them as individuals, but as commissioners representing the county. It is true that a suit against a county must be in the name of the county, and service may be perfected upon a majority of its commissioners. Here it is proper for the commissioners, who, in their capacity as representatives of the county, are doing, or threatening to do, the acts sought to be enjoined. It is not a suit against the commissioners alone, but really designed as one against the county, as was the case in Arnett v. Commissioners, 75 Ga. 782, and Glaze v. Bogle, 105 Ga. 235, 81 S. E. 169, cited by counsel for the county.

[6] 4. In view of what we have said in the first division of this opinion, the petition was not subject to the other special ground of demurrer fully set forth in the statement of facts.

[7] There was evidence submitted by the plaintiffs, tending to establish their case substantially as laid; and the trial court erred in granting a nonsuit. It is true, as stated in the brief of counsel for the county and its codefendants, that the city failed to show "that the principal highway or street 'entered said square on its northern boundary and continued through the center of said square, leaving said square at its southern boundary near its center,' and that the property designated as the public square was a part and parcel of the highways of the village"; and that the city also failed to prove that "by and with the consent of the municipal authorities of the city of La Fayette, then the town of La Fayette, the municipal authorities agreed with the properly constituted authorities of Walker county to permit Walker county to erect a courthouse building to be used for public purposes only on the public square of said corporation." The lack of proof to sustain the allegations of the petition in respect to these matters, in view of the other averments therein, did not authorize the grant of a nonsuit. The main contention of the plaintiffs, as set forth in the petition is that the area of land in the city designated as the "public square" is really a public square, and that the city is entitled to possess and control it for public use, and that the county by building a new courthouse not on the square, which it now occupies, and thus ceasing to use the public square for public use, has abandoned and forfeited any right it ever had in the premises for such use. It is not essential to the maintenance of the city's contention for it to prove that the "public square" is traversed by highways, and that it is therefore a part of the city's highways or streets. The main thing to be shown, in view of the petition as a whole, is that the city has a right, as against the county, to the use of the "public square" for public use, whether or not it be traversed by highways.

There was evidence to the effect that in 1837, before a courthouse was erected on the square in question, it was, in size and shape, the same as it now exists, bounded on its four sides with public streets some 30 or 40 feet wide; that these were then business streets of the town, which had some 700 or 800 white inhabitants; that on these streets facing the square were many buildings, most of them used for businesses of various kinds; that these buildings then appeared to be some 15 or 20 years old; that there were then locust trees seven or eight inches in diameter growing in the square; and that it was used as a public square by the general public just as it has been continually used since that time, with the exception of that part of it upon which the courthouses have been built. This evidence tended to show that, years prior to incorporation of the village, there had been an implied dedication of the square by its owner to the village and town for public uses, and an acceptance of such dedication by the village, indicated by the laying out of its streets along the sides of the square, the erection of business houses on such streets fronting the square, and by user on the part of the public. 13 Cyc. 485, notes 55, 56, 57.

[2] It is not essential to constitute a valid dedication to the public that the right of use should be vested in a corporate body. The public, it has been said, is an ever-existing grantee, capable of taking dedications for public uses, and its interests are a sufficient consideration to support them. And it has been held, if there is a common-law dedication of land to public use prior to the existence of a municipal corporation, then, upon such corporation being organized and including such land within its limits, the use of the land in trust for the public at once vests in it. 13 Cyc. 439, notes 13, 14, and 15. There was evidence tending to show that the square had been continuously used by the inhabitants of the village and town and by the general public for such a length of time, prior to the erection of the first courthouse by the county, that the public accommodation would have been materially and adversely affected had the enjoyment of such use been interrupted by the owner of the land appropriating it to other and inconsistent purposes. If the owner could not interfere with the right of the city and the general public to use the square for public purposes, then the owner could not convey the land to any one else, if the grantee had notice, who could deprive the city or the public of its rights under the dedication. As the county, when it erected the first courthouse on the square, was in the circumstances bound to know of the rights of the city and the public in general to use the square for public purposes, the county then necessarily had to take from the city whatever rights the county had to use the square, since there was no other source from which it could procure the right to erect a courthouse on the square. Thus it is apparent that it was not essential to the plaintiffs' case to prove the allegation of the petition that the county by agreement with the city was permitted to use the square for a courthouse site.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

TUCKER et al. v. ROBERTS et al.
(No. 2255.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Boundaries §52(1)—Persons holding office of processioners are officers de facto, and return not set aside because not legally appointed.

Where persons holding office as processioners in a militia district in a particular county in this state entertain an application by a landowner to survey and mark a land line as authorized by statute, and after surveying and marking the line file their report with the ordinary, as required by statute, even if such persons do not hold office under lawful appointment, they are officers de facto, and the report filed by them should not be set aside on the ground that the appointment of the officers was unauthorized by law.

2. Boundaries §52(1)—Processioners constitute "commission" in statute as to disqualification by relationship; processioners' return set aside when processioner related to applicant or to both parties; related within fourth degree when great-grandfathers were brothers.

The prescribed powers and duties imposed on processioners appointed under provisions of the Civil Code of 1910, § 3817 et seq., are quasi judicial, and the body of processioners in a given district is a "commission" within the meaning of the section 4642, which declares that "No judge or justice of any court, no ordinary, justice of the peace, nor presiding officer of any inferior judicature or commission, can sit in any cause or proceeding in which he is pecuniarily interested, or related to either party within the fourth degree of consanguinity, or affinity. * * *"

(a) Where a processioner in a proceeding to procession land lines is related within the fourth degree by consanguinity or affinity to the applicant alone, or to both the applicant and protestant, he is disqualified, and such disqualification is sufficient ground for setting aside a return of the processioners in which he participated.

(b) Where the respective great-grandfathers of the processioner and parties at interest are brothers, the processioner is related by consanguinity within the fourth degree to each parties.

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; R. Eve, Judge.

Proceeding by Walton Tucker and another against Ella Roberts and others, to establish boundary line. Judgment sustaining a plea in abatement to the return of processioners, and the applicants bring error. Affirmed.

In May, 1919, the ordinary of Irwin county appointed Moses Daniels, George Grantham, and John Lisenby as land processioners.

the 1529th Georgia militia district of that county. On July 23, 1919, Walton Tucker and Nellie Tucker applied to the processioneers in conformity with the statute (Civil Code, § 3818) to have a certain land line "run and marked anew." Notice was duly served on persons to be adversely affected; and subsequently, on August 15, 1919, the processioneers, in conjunction with the county surveyor of an adjoining county (the county surveyor of Irwin county being disqualified), proceeded to "run and mark anew" the line; and on August 19, 1919, after completing the work, they filed their return with a certified plat made by the surveyor in the office of the ordinary.

On September 15, 1919, Ella Roberts, as administratrix of the estate of William Roberts, deceased, and Isaac Roberts, as guardian ad litem for the minor children of William Roberts, deceased, filed in the office of the ordinary a motion (called a plea in abatement) to dismiss the entire processioning proceedings, on the grounds: (a) That the processioneers were not legally appointed, because they were appointed by the ordinary, whereas under the act approved August 5, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 403), creating the office of commissioner of Irwin county, the commissioner alone had authority to appoint processioneers in Irwin county; (b) that two of the processioneers were disqualified on account of relationship to the applicant. On September 18, 1919, the ordinary transmitted all papers in the processioning proceeding to the superior court.

When the case came on for a hearing (August 17, 1920) at an adjourned term of the superior court, Walton Tucker and Nellie Tucker filed a motion to dismiss the "plea in abatement," on the grounds: (a) That under proper construction the language of the act of 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 403), referred to above, does not confer on the commissioner of roads and revenue of Irwin county exclusive jurisdiction to appoint land processioneers in that county; (b) if the act purports to confer such jurisdiction, the act is unconstitutional, as violative of article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code, § 6391), which provides that "no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law," there being an existing general statute, as embodied in the Civil Code, § 3817, for appointment of land processioneers. It was prayed that the allegations as to the relationship of the processioneers to the applicants for procession be inquired into by the court.

The judge overruled the motion to dismiss the "plea in abatement," and proceeded to hear evidence on the question of relationship as set up in the plea. The undisputed evidence was to the effect that the great-grandfathers of Walton Tucker, one of the objectors, and George Grantham, one of the processioneers, were brothers, and that the same relation existed between the processioner George Grantham and William Roberts, deceased, whose administratrix was a party on the opposite side of the case from Walton Tucker. Upon the evidence the judge sustained the "plea in abatement." The applicants for procession came by direct bill of exceptions, and assigned error upon both rulings of the court.

Philip Newbern and Warren Mixon, both of Ocilla, for plaintiffs in error.

Rogers & Rogers, of Ocilla, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. It is urged by the motion to dismiss the processioning proceedings that the appointment of the processioneers by the ordinary was illegal, because the act of 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 403), creating the office of county commissioner for Irwin county, withdrew jurisdiction from the ordinary and conferred exclusive jurisdiction over that matter upon the commissioner. On the other hand, it was urged, by the motion to dismiss the above-mentioned motion, that the act of 1913, supra, does not purport to withdraw from the ordinary jurisdiction over the matter, or to confer jurisdiction upon the county commissioner to appoint processioneers, but, even if it did, that the act was violative of certain provisions of the Constitution, and void.

These contentions go to the right of the ordinary to appoint processioneers, and are collateral to the matter of validity of the official actions of the processioneers, which is the controlling question in the case. Under these circumstances no decision will be made as to the merits of any such contentions. In Brown v. Flake, 102 Ga. 528, 29 S. E. 267, it was held:

"Where an act of the General Assembly created a board of county commissioners for a given county, and provided for the selection of such commissioners by the grand jury of the county, and subsequently the act creating such board was amended by providing that such commissioners should be elected by the qualified voters of the county, and subsequently to the passage of the amending act such commissioners were continuously elected by the grand jury, and no election by the qualified voters was called or held, and the commissioners so selected continued for several years to perform the duties imposed by law on the commissioners of such county, and their acts as commissioners were recognized and acquiesced in by the people of the county for a long period of time, the persons so selected by the grand jury and discharging the duties of county commissioners were de facto officers, and their acts as such, within the scope of the powers conferred on the board of county commissioners were legal; and a tax authorized by law, levied by such commissioners for county purposes, was a valid and binding tax."

In Hawkins v. Jonseboro, 63 Ga. 527, it was held:

"Though a statute require all voters to be registered, and none are registered, yet, if an election be held, and certain town officers provided for by law be elected by the votes cast, and the persons thus elected enter upon and exercise their functions under color of such election, their predecessors yielding to their supposed right, they are officers de facto, and, until displaced, may exercise all the powers of officers de jure."

In Smith v. Meador, 74 Ga. 416, 58 Am. Rep. 438, it was said:

"If, after the expiration of the term for which a commercial notary was appointed, and before that fact was discovered, he attested an affidavit, both parties acting in good faith, if not an officer de jure, he would, in such transaction, be an officer de facto, and his attestation would not be void. The doctrine of the recognition of the acts of de facto officers is founded on considerations of public policy."

Under the principle of the foregoing decisions, the processioners, if not de jure officers, were de facto officers, and their official action done under color of office should not have been set aside on the ground of want of power in the ordinary to appoint them. See, also, Slate v. Blue Ridge, 113 Ga. 646 (3), 38 S. E. 977 and citations; State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409; 22 R. C. L. 588, § 306; Hildreth v. McIntire, J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 206, 19 Am. Dec. 63, and cases cited in note. But while it was error to set aside the action of the processioners on this ground, the judgment of the court will not be reversed on account of such error, because, as will appear in the next division of this opinion, the action of the processioners was properly set aside on another ground.

[2] 2. Does the proved relationship of the processioner to the applicants for procession render void the return of the processioners? The office of processioner is statutory. Civil Code, § 3817 et seq. The statute providing for the appointment of processioners does not in terms disqualify a processioner on account of relationship to a party at interest in a processioning proceeding. The only language in the statute that might bear on the subject of qualifications of such officers is "three suitable persons in every militia district." The only statutory provision for disqualification on such ground is to be found in the Civil Code, § 4642, which declares:

"No judge or justice of any court, no ordinary, justice of the peace, nor presiding officer of any inferior judicature or commission, can sit in any cause or proceeding in which he is pecuniarily interested, or related to either party within the fourth degree of consanguinity or affinity, nor of which he has been of counsel, nor in which he has presided in any inferior judicature when his ruling or decision is the subject of review, without the consent of all the parties in interest."

Under this statute, relationship to a party within the prohibited degree will disqualify a judge of a court, and similarly any "presiding officer of any inferior judicature or commission." If processioners as a body are to be classed as a commission within the meaning of this statute, then, under the terms of the statute, relation of a processioner within the prohibited degree to a party at interest will disqualify such processioner from presiding in any particular case. To render processioners such a "commission," their prescribed duties and powers must be judicial in character. The following sections of the Civil Code state the powers and duties of processioners:

"Sec. 3818. * * * Every owner of land, any portion of which lies in any district, though the remainder lies in an adjoining district of an adjoining county, who desires the lines around his entire tract to be surveyed and marked anew, shall apply to the processioners of said district to appoint a day when a majority of them, with the county surveyor, will trace and mark the said lines. Ten days' written notice of the time of such running and marking shall be given to all the owners of adjoining lands, if resident within this state; and the processioners shall not proceed to run and mark such lines until satisfactory evidence of the service of such notice shall be produced to them.

"Sec. 3819. * * * It shall be the duty of the county surveyor, with the processioners, taking all due precaution to arrive at the true lines, to trace out and plainly mark the same. The surveyor shall make out and certify a plat of the same, and deliver a copy thereof to the applicant; and in all future disputes arising in reference to the boundary lines of such tract, with any owner of adjoining lands, having due notice of such processioning, such plat, and the lines so marked, shall be prima facie correct, and such plat, certified as aforesaid, shall be admissible in evidence, without further proof."

"Sec. 3825. * * * The processioners shall make a return of their acts within thirty days, together with the plat of the surveyor, to the ordinary of the county, to be kept on file in his office."

"Sec. 3820. * * * In all cases of disputed lines the following rules shall be respected and followed: Natural landmarks, being less liable to change, and not capable of counterfeit, shall be the most conclusive evidence; ancient or genuine landmarks, such as corner station or marked trees, shall control the course and distances called for by the survey. If the corners are established, and the lines not marked, a straight line, as required by the plat, shall be run, but an established marked line, though crooked, shall not be overruled; courses and distances shall be resorted to in the absence of higher evidence.

"Sec. 3821. * * * General reputation in the neighborhood shall be evidence as to ancient landmarks of more than thirty years' standing; and acquiescence for seven years, by acts of declarations of adjoining landowners, shall establish a dividing line.

"Sec. 3822. * * * Where actual possession has been had, under a claim of right, for more than seven years, such claim shall be respected, and the lines so marked as not to interfere with such possession.

"Sec. 3823. * * * Any owner of adjoining lands, who may be dissatisfied with the lines as run and marked by the processioners and surveyor, may file his protest thereto with the ordinary within thirty days after the processioners have filed their returns, specifying therein the lines objected to, and true lines as claimed by him; and it shall be the duty of the ordinary to return all the papers, including the plat made by the surveyor, with said protest, to the clerk of the superior court of the county or counties where the disputed land lies (copies being sent to the adjoining counties); and it shall be the duty of the clerk to enter the same on the issue docket, as other causes, to be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as other cases. The verdict of the jury, and the judgment of the court, shall be framed to meet the issue tried and decided: Provided, it shall not be necessary to run any lines between adjoining landowners except the lines in dispute.

"Sec. 3824. * * * The applicant shall pay to each of the processioners [two dollars] per day for his services, and to the county surveyor [five] dollars per day for his services. If a protest is filed, the costs of the court shall abide the issue."

"Sec. 3826. * * * When any water course is one of the boundary lines of a tract of land, and its course shall have been changed by nature or art, so that its present channel shall cut off a part of said land, the processioners and surveyor shall certify the fact, and the plat of the surveyor shall plainly mark the original and present channels, designating the exact quantity of land so cut off."

Referring to these statutes it has been held that—

"Processioners have no power to ascertain and fix new lines, but only to run and mark those which were formerly located and established." Amos v. Parker, 88 Ga. 754, 16 S. E. 200; Wheeler v. Thomas, 139 Ga. 598, 77 S. E. 817.

The power to "run and mark" lines that were formerly located or established is thus recognized. The conclusiveness of the action of processioners in running and marking pre-existing lines was not decided, but the statute on that subject clearly makes their action prima facie binding. For instance, a definite time must be fixed for surveying and marking the line, of which 10 days' written notice shall be given all the owners of adjoining lands, "if residents within this state." Civil Code, § 3818. After the line is surveyed and marked by at least a majority of the processioners in conjunction with the county surveyor, the surveyor shall make out and certify a plat of the same and deliver a copy thereof to the applicant; and in all future disputes arising in reference to the boundary lines of such tract, with any owner of adjoining lands, "having due notice of such processioning," such plat, and the lines so marked, "shall be prima facie correct, and such plat, certified as aforesaid, shall be admissible in evidence without further proof." Civil Code, § 3819. While the action of the processioners is only prima facie binding, it establishes to that extent a status between the applicant and the parties notified. In tracing the lines the processioners are required to observe prescribed rules, and among other things give effect to extraneous evidence tending to show the true location of the old line. Civil Code, §§ 3820, 3821, 3822. After action by the processioners and the filing of their report in the office of the ordinary of the county, as provided in the Civil Code, § 3825, any adjoining landowner, dissatisfied with the line, may file a protest; whereupon all the papers, including the plat made by the surveyor, shall be transmitted to the superior court, to be entered on the docket as other causes, "to be tried in the same manner and under the same rules as other cases," and the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court shall be framed to meet the issue tried and decided. Civil Code, § 3823. The judgment so rendered is final and conclusive as to location of the line. Stovall v. Caverly, 139 Ga. 243, 77 S. E. 29.

The requirements as to notice to adjoining landowners to be adversely affected, and the provision for prescribed rules under which extraneous evidence shall be considered by the processioners, and the declaration that the plat made by the surveyor and reported by the processioners to the ordinary shall on any future issue be prima facie correct as against adjoining landowners who were duly notified, all tend to characterize the duties of processioners as judicial. Further indications of the judicial character of such duties are the provisions that after the report is filed in the office of the ordinary a protest may be filed, and that the ordinary shall transmit the application for procession and return of the processioners, including the plat of the surveyor, to the superior court, to be docketed and tried as other cases; and in such case all the prescribed "costs" shall abide the decision of the court. The action of the processioners in surveying and marking the line involves decision as to the true location of the old line. This and the act of reporting the findings of the processioners to the ordinary are but steps in a legal controversy, which may end at the filing of the report, or at final judgment in the superior court in the event a protest is filed. In this connection the provision that all costs shall abide the final judgment is significant. Why tax the pay provided for processioners as cost to abide the final judgment, if the processioning was not judicial and connected with the superior court case? In Wilkowski v. Halle, 37 Ga. 678, 95 Am. Dec. 374, the question was whether an attorney at law of a party who was a notary public was competent to qualify his client to an affidavit to be used as a basis for an attachment. It was held that the attorney was not competent. In the course of the opinion it was said:

"Shall the attorney of the plaintiff take this bond, which the law provides for the defendant's security, against a wrongful issuing of the attachment? Shall the plaintiff's attorney be the judge as to the sufficiency of the bond, to protect the opposite party and as to the solvency of the surety? Is not this, at least, a quasi judicial proceeding? The officer, taking the affidavit, is in duty bound to take the bond, to decide upon its sufficiency, its legality, and its solvency. Does not this duty come within the prohibitions of section 193, Rev. Code [Civil Code, § 4642], which says: 'No judge or justice of any court, no ordinary, justice of the peace, nor presiding officer of any inferior judicature, or commission, can sit in any cause or proceeding, in which he is pecuniarily interested, or related to either party, within the fourth degree of consanguinity, or affinity, nor in which he has been counsel, without the consent of all the parties in interest'? Is not the taking of the affidavit of the plaintiff, and bond to indemnify the defendant against damages and costs, 'a proceeding,' in which the attorney for the plaintiff, in this case, 'sits'? He decides upon these things."

The decision was not based entirely on the reasons above set forth, but it was evidently the view of the court that one reason for the attorney's disqualification was that his duties were judicial in character. In Spearman v. Wilson, 44 Ga. 473, it was held that an arbitrator was disqualified on account of relationship, because his son purchased the property involved pending the arbitration, the basis of the decision being the duty of the arbitrator was judicial in character. Under a proper construction the powers and duties of processioneers, as declared in the statutes above quoted, involved such investigation and such decision upon the part of the processioneers, and their decision has such effect as to render the functions of the processioneers judicial in character and classify the official body of processioneers as a commission, within the meaning of the Civil Code, § 4642. This being so, relationship of a processioneer to a party within the prohibited degree will disqualify the processioneer. Applying this rule, the processioneer whose qualification was attacked in the present case was disqualified on account of his relationship to the applicant, because the respective great-grandfathers of the processioneer and the applicant were brothers. Short v. Mathis, 101 Ga. 287, 28 S. E. 918. The statute disqualifies a judicial officer where his relation to a party at interest is within the fourth degree by consanguinity or affinity, and makes no exception on account of being related equally or otherwise to a party on the opposite side of the controversy. The fact that the processioneer is related within the prohibited degree to the parties on both sides of the controversy does not, as contended, relieve the disqualification. Under Civil Code, § 3818, it would have been competent for two of the processioneers to have acted in the matter and made the return, but that would not, as contended, save the return which was participated in by all of the processioneers, including the one disqualified. It is similar to a case where a disqualified juror serves upon a jury. In Georgia Railroad v. Cole, 73 Ga. 713, it was said:

"A jury composed of men who are not lawful men—men whose relationship to the parties renders them incompetent as jurors—cannot render a lawful verdict. If the parties consent to the jurors, or have knowledge of their incompetency, then they will be held to waive the same. It cannot be said that the defendants in error have had their case tried; certainly not legally, and, although the verdict may be in accordance with the facts, and such as a lawful jury should have rendered, yet it is no verdict, and the court did right to set it aside."

As the processioneer was disqualified and participated in the processioning proceedings, the judge did not err in dismissing the proceeding. There was no contention that the protestants waived the disqualification or evidence as to such waiver, and no ruling will be made on that subject.

Judgment affirmed.

SAME v. WEBB & VARY, Inc.

(Nos. 2372, 2373.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 10, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Injunction § 101(3) — Granted against strangers and striking employees, endeavoring to induce employees to violate contract and force unionizing of business; not granted against persuasion by proper argument.

Where employers, whose businesses require the employment of a number of workmen skilled in a particular trade, determine to operate their businesses on nonunion bases, and to that end adopt a policy not to employ members of the union, and to employ nonunion workmen under a contract, terminable at will, providing that such employment shall immediately cease if said employees become members of the union, equity will protect by injunction such contractual status as against strangers and striking former employees, who, knowing such status, conspire to coerce the employers to abandon the policy of employing only nonunion labor and to cause a breach of the aforesaid contractual relation, and who endeavor by threats, intimidation, and improper persuasion to deprive such nonunion employees of the exercise of their own freedom of will, and thus induce them to violate their contracts of employment by joining the union, and thus force the unionizing of the plants or render it impossible to continue the operation of the business.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$ 273(10) — Injunction  $\S$ 128, 157—Evidence in strike case held to authorize injunction; injunction held not to enjoin any lawful act; judgment, excepted to as a whole, not reversed when justified as to some parties.

Under the pleadings and the evidence the court did not abuse its discretion in granting the interlocutory injunction.

The interlocutory injunction, properly construed in connection with the evidence, enjoins only those acts which we have held in the opinion to be unlawful.

3. Exceptions, bill of  $\S$ 8—Exceptions to admission of evidence should show grounds of objection and set forth the evidence.

Exceptions to the admission of evidence, to avail the plaintiff in error here, should show the objections made to the admission of the evidence or the grounds upon which a motion to rule out the same, if admitted, was based, and should also set forth, in connection with the exception itself, the evidence alleged to have been illegally admitted, so that this court would not be compelled to examine the brief of evidence, in order to ascertain the evidence alleged to have been illegally admitted.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Injunction  $\S$ 101(3) — Strikers will not be enjoined from using "persuasion" not amounting to "duress" or "intimidation."

Striking employees will not be enjoined from attempting by proper argument to persuade others from taking their places, when they do not resort to force and intimidation; but the persuasion that the law permits is such as appeals to the judgment, reason, or sentiment, and leaves the mind free to act of its own volition, and when there is no such freedom of action, more than mere persuasion has been exercised, amounting to duress, intimidation, or other improper influence.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Two suits, by the Atlanta Envelope Company and others and by Webb & Vary, Inc., against O. L. McMichael and others, suits heard together. Interlocutory injunction granted, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. A. Miller and Bond Almand, both of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Winfield Payne Jones, Wm. J. Davis, Jr.; and W. S. Dillon, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. These two cases were heard together in the trial court, upon the same evidence. One judgment was passed, applicable to both cases. Two bills of exceptions were sued out, and they were argued as one in this court. The bills of exception and the records in the two cases in this court are identical, with the exception of the difference in names. As the same judgment must necessarily be rendered in both cases in this court, they will be decided as one case.

The petitions filed by the plaintiffs in the court below, Atlanta Envelope Company et al. and Webb & Vary, Inc., against McMichael et al., prayed that the defendants, individually and as agents and representatives of Atlanta Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, No. 8, be enjoined from interfering with or attempting to interfere with the plaintiffs' employees, present or prospective, for the purpose of inducing those employees to join said union or to leave the employment of plaintiffs without the consent of the latter, by representing to such employees that they would suffer loss or be otherwise injured by remaining in petitioner's employment, and from interfering with or attempting to interfere with the pressmen and feeders employed by the plaintiffs, for the purpose of unionizing, without the consent of plaintiffs, the employees in that branch of their plants, and from seeking to bring about, in aid of such purpose, the breach by present or future employees of the plaintiffs of contracts of employment made between the plaintiffs and their employees, the terms of which contracts were known to defendants, and from inducing or seeking to induce any of plaintiffs' employees to leave their employment, by intimidation, misrepresentation, abusive language, promises of better conditions and shorter hours and better pay, or persuasion, and for general relief and process.

It was alleged that the defendants, acting as representatives of said union, made a demand upon the plaintiffs that they contract with all of the pressmen and feedmen employed by them at that time to give to such employees a large increase in wages; to make a substantial reduction in their working hours, and also to "close" their shops—that is, that the plaintiffs should agree to employ as pressmen and feedmen only persons who were members of said union; that upon the refusal of the plaintiffs to yield to these demands all of the pressmen and feedmen then employed by plaintiffs walked out, rendering it necessary for plaintiffs to secure nonunion pressmen and feedmen, or to yield to the demands of the defendants and thus be forced into bankruptcy; that they thereupon determined to run nonunion shops so far as their pressmen and feedmen were concerned; that petitioners had at great expense made contracts of employment with certain persons, and expected to be able to contract with others, upon the distinct understanding that such new employees could not work for and be in the employment of plaintiffs and be a member of said union, and that if any one of such new employees should become a member of said union at any time while in the employment of plaintiffs, such employment should immediately cease; that defendants had approached the nonunion men employed by petitioners, and had sought by threats, menaces, intimidation, coercion, and persuasion to induce them to breach their contracts of employment with petitioners, and to leave their employment, and that defendants had openly threatened that they would cause the persons already so employed to leave their employment and would prevent petitioners from contracting with other nonunion employees, or that in cases where contracts of employment were made on the terms above stated they would cause such new employees to become members of the union and leave the service of petitioners, or would prevent them from working for petitioners by making conditions so onerous and unpleasant that petitioners could not run their presses on a nonunion basis; that because of the activities of defendants they were daily losing large sums of money on account of their inability to procure sufficient help to enable them to fill outstanding contracts for printing; and that, unless the defendants are restrained by injunction from committing the acts complained of, petitioners will have to yield to the demands of the union or go out of business, either of which courses will result in irreparable loss and damage to them. The court, after hearing the evidence, granted the following interlocutory injunction:

"It is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the defendants O. L. McMichael, J. A. Allyn, R. L. Brown, and J. R. Penny [in the judgment in the Webb & Vary case the name Will Walton appears as one of the persons enjoined, and the name of J. R. Penny does not], and their agents and confederates, are enjoined from interfering with or attempting to interfere with the plaintiff's employees for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff's employees to join said labor union without the consent of the plaintiff, by representing that they would suffer no loss by leaving the plaintiff's employment and joining the said union, or because the plaintiff was running a nonunion plant in so far as their pressmen and feeders are concerned. And said defendants, their agents, and confederates are further enjoined from interfering with or attempting to interfere with the plaintiff's employees for the purpose of unionizing the plant of plaintiff in so far as their pressmen and feeders are concerned without the plaintiff's consent, and in aid of such purpose knowingly and willfully bringing about a breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service known at the time to exist with plaintiff's present or future employees. And the said defendants, their agents and confederates, are further enjoined from inducing or seeking to induce the employees of plaintiff, present or future, to leave the service of the plaintiff, by intimidation, misrepresentation, abusive language, promises of better conditions and shorter hours and better pay, or persuasion."

The question to be determined by this court is whether or not, under the pleadings and the evidence, there was an abuse of discretion by the trial judge. It is well settled and recognized that this court cannot undertake to decide questions of fact on conflicting evidence. We can only say whether there was evidence sufficient to authorize the finding of the trial court. Plaintiffs in error contend that the judgment was unauthorized by the evidence, because their acts, as shown by the evidence, were strictly within their lawful rights. Their brief contains the following statement:

"This case involves the question of just what can striking employees do to win a trade dispute; and, second, just how far the employer can go towards fighting the demands of his employees without injuring the property rights of the employees or the rights of the public. It is a case of employee organization against employer organization. The rights and relations are so intermingled that the one can hardly act without trespassing upon the other."

In reference to what took place after the strike or walkout the brief for the plaintiffs in error says:

"The usual course of operations took place by the union employees doing all within their lawful power to keep others from taking their places and the employers getting in new employees in order to win the fight. On October 12, 1920, the employers started injunction proceedings against the union employees, and alleged, among other things, that since the walkout the various employers had adopted a policy in their shops to employ only pressmen and feeders who did not belong to any union and agreed not to join the union, and if they did so they would be discharged; that after employing a number of new men under such contract the various union employees were inducing and attempting to induce these new employees to break their contracts by joining a union, alleging therein that these union employees were using both unlawful and persuasive means."

[1] 1. We think there are no new principles involved in the present issues. The judgment in these cases, with the exception of the names, is identical with the judgment which was affirmed in the case of Callan v. Exposition Cotton Mills, 149 Ga. 119, 99 S. E. 300. The facts in that case were very similar to the facts in these cases. Callan was an agent or officer of the union undertaking to unionize the cottonmill, and was denominated a stranger, since he had not been an employee of the Exposition Cotton Mills. In these cases striking former employees, assisted by one or more officers of the union, were sought to be enjoined. The principles of law involved, however, are the same, since former employees, engaged in what they denominate as an industrial warfare with their former employers, would no more be authorized to unlawfully interfere with the business of the latter than would a stranger. In Iron Molders' Union v. Allis-Chalmers Co., 166 Fed. at page 52, 91 C. C. A. 638, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315, in a concurring opinion, Grosscup, Circuit Judge, said:

"Manifestly, then, pending a strike or a lock-out, and as to those who have not finally and in good faith abandoned it, a relationship exists between employer and employee that is neither that of the general relation of employer and employee, nor again that of employer looking among strangers for employees, or employees seeking from strangers employment."

On the other hand, in Barnes v. Typographical Union, 232 Ill. at page 431, 83 N. E. 943, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, 13 Ann. Cas. 54, Mr. Justice Cartwright said:

"It is true that competition in business justifies action for the benefit of one of the competing parties which results in injury to the other, and a reason frequently given is that the general public benefits outweigh occasional individual losses. One who is seeking employment for himself may offer to work on any terms that he may choose, and the exercise of his legal right may result in the discharge of another laborer. But that rule does not apply to this case. It is not very clear what is meant by competition for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the union and its members, but it is clear that the union and its members were not in competition with the complainants in respect to labor or anything else. The members of the union had left the service of the complainants, and their only purpose was to prevent the complainants from carrying on their business. They were endeavoring to compel the complainants to submit to their dictation by depriving the complainants of their legal right to employ such laborers as they might choose. If there is a combination to injure a person because he refuses to comply with some demand where he has a legal right to refuse, there is no way of classifying acts in furtherance of such purpose as competition. The acts alleged in the bill were directed primarily against the complainants for the purpose of doing them harm, and that sort of action is not lawful competition."

It is not necessary for us to decide in this case whether a strike entirely severs all relations between the parties. The question to be determined is whether the plaintiffs in error in this case exceeded their lawful rights. Plaintiffs in error rely upon the case of Jones v. Van Winkle Gin & Machine Works, 131

Ga. 336, 62 S. E. 236, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 843, 127 Am. St. Rep. 235, where this court held that—

"Equity will not enjoin employees who have quit the service of their employer from attempting by proper argument to persuade others from taking their places, so long as they do not resort to force or intimidation, or obstruct the public thoroughfares."

We find no fault with that decision, and think that it is sound in principle; and, if striking employees do no more than to attempt, by "proper argument," to persuade others from taking their places, and do not resort to force and intimidation, that a court of equity would not be authorized to interfere. We are equally sure that where such former employees attempt by improper argument to dissuade others from taking their places, and do resort to force, coercion, or intimidation, it would equally be the duty of a court of equity, in a proper case, to interfere by injunction.

"It must be conceded that argument and persuasion are lawful if not directed to the accomplishment of an illegal and unlawful purpose. * * * An act which is naturally innocent, when done with actual malice for the purpose of injuring another, and followed by such injury, is not excused because the act might be innocent under other conditions." Barnes v. Typographical Union, supra, 232 Ill. at page 436, 83 N. E. 945, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, 13 Ann. Cas. 54.

The persuasion that the law permits in these circumstances is such as appeals to the judgment, reason, or sentiment, and leaves the mind free to act of its own volition. Where there is no such freedom of action, more than mere persuasion has been exercised, and it amounts to duress, intimidation, coercion, or other like influence. Indeed, the case of Jones v. Van Winkle, supra, also laid down the following rule:

"An injunction may issue, in a proper case, to restrain persons from attempting, by threats, violence or intimidation, or other unlawful means, to prevent any person from engaging in, remaining in, or performing the business, labor, or duties of any lawful enterprise or occupation, although the acts sought to be restrained, if committed, constitute a crime."

That case also cites the following sections of the Penal Code:

"Sec. 126. If any person or persons, by threats, violence, intimidation, or other unlawful means, shall prevent or attempt to prevent any person or persons in this state from engaging in, remaining in, or performing the business, labor, or duties of any lawful employment or occupation, such offender or offenders shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"Sec. 127. If any person or persons, singly or together, or in combination, shall conspire to prevent * * * any person or persons, by threats, violence, or intimidation, from engaging in, remaining in, or performing the business, labor, or duties of any lawful employment or occupation, such offender or offenders shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"Sec. 128. If any person or persons, singly or by conspiring together, shall hinder any person or persons who desire to labor from so doing, or hinder any person, by threats, violence, or intimidation, from being employed as laborer or employee, such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

"Sec. 129. If any person or persons, by threats, violence, intimidation, or other unlawful means, shall hinder the owner, manager, or proprietor for the time being from controlling, using, operating, or working any property in any lawful occupation, or shall by such means hinder such person from hiring or employing laborers or employees, such offender or offenders shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The trial court was authorized to find that the defendants, acting together under a common understanding, which made each of them responsible for the acts of all of their fellows, were guilty of intimidation, threats, and coercion, thus authorizing the grant of the interlocutory injunction. There can be no question that under former decisions of this court, which are controlling in this case, the court was authorized to enjoin the defendants from endeavoring, by the means stated above, to induce the employees to violate their contracts of employment by joining a labor union in such large numbers as would force the employer to consent to the unionizing of their plants or would render it impossible to continue the operation of their businesses. Callan v. Exposition Cotton Mills, supra. And this rule is supported by the decision in Hitchman Coal Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229, 38 Sup. Ct. 65, 62 L. Ed. 260, L. R. A. 1918C, 497, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 461. The case of Tunstall v. Stearns Coal Co., 192 Fed. 808, 118 C. C. A. 132, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 453, involved some of the features of the present case. It appears that some of those sought to be restrained were paying sums of money to workmen as inducement for them to quit their work. It was conceded by counsel representing the strikers that such acts were for the purpose of compelling the company to yield its position or close its mine. After elaborate discussion and citation of authorities, the court, in that case, decided that there was "no logical theory" by which the conduct described could be considered "lawful persuasion." It was further said:

"In every case where this right of persuasion is sustained, it is because, in the end, the employee exercises his own free will. If he is persuaded that it is for his best interests to work elsewhere or not to work, he has a right to follow out his conclusion; but, if his conclusion is not reached as the result of his free choice, but that choice is controlled either by a threat or by the promise of an outside, foreign, independent reward, there is a lack of that foundation upon which the theory of 'lawful persuasion' must stand."

The distinction between the use of proper argument to dissuade others from taking the places of striking former employees where no contract exists and where a contractual relation did exist was made clear by this court in Burgess v. G., F. & A. R. Co., 148 Ga. 415, 96 S. E. 864. What would constitute improper argument to persuade employees to leave their employment obviously must depend upon the facts of each individual case, and no court could possibly lay down a general rule in advance that would be satisfactory in all cases. Any statement of general rules would be binding only in so far as pertinent to the issues made. Any further expression would be obiter dicta. It is proper to say that the right of laboring people to organize and to strike for the purpose of protecting and promoting their common welfare by fair and lawful means is fully recognized by this court, and that right is not challenged anywhere in this case. It is universally recognized by the courts, at least, that labor has as much right as capital to organize for their own protection. It is essential, however, for the protection of the public that neither should be permitted to exceed their lawful rights, nor to exercise other than fair, lawful and peaceable means. The principle is well and fairly stated in Iron Molders' Union v. Allis-Chalmers Co., 166 Fed. at page 52, 91 C. C. A. 638, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315, a case cited by plaintiffs in error:

"To whatever extent employers may lawfully combine and co-operate to control the supply and the conditions of work to be done, to the same extent should be recognized the right of workmen to combine and co-operate to control the supply and the conditions of the labor that is necessary to the doing of the work. In the fullest recognition of the equality and mutuality of their rights and their restrictions lies the peace of capital and labor."

In the case of Kemp v. Division No. 241, 255 Ill. at page 237, 99 N. E. 398, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 347, it was well said:

"Every person has the right, under the law, to dispose of his own labor or manage his capital according to his own will, but he must exercise this right so as to make it compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Erie on Trade Unions, 12. The legal right of every person is conditioned on the welfare of society, and the latter is more important than the welfare of any individual or class."

[2] 2. The evidence in regard to interference with some of the establishments fully authorized a finding by the court that the defendants were guilty of threats, intimidation, and coercion, and that they offered outside an independent reward to induce the new employees to break their contracts and to leave Atlanta. There was evidence tending to show that union men had been "planted" in some of the printing shops to gather information; that union men congregated in large numbers around some of the shops at such hours as the employees went to and returned from their work. There was evidence tending to show that defendants informed employers that they would send away employees as fast as they were employed. There was evidence that one employee was forcibly taken hold of by union men who insisted upon arguing with him and a companion about leaving their employment. These employees insisted that they be left alone, and undertook to leave the strikers, who informed them that they—"would not be on the job in the morning, and that they had better listen to them, and if they wanted to get rough about it, that they [the strikers] would kick hell out of them."

Another employee swore that he was told by strikers that they would "get him." Some were annoyed by strikers until police protection was sought. The evidence showed that the new employees were accepted by the printing establishments under a form of contract adopted by all of the plaintiffs, which said contract provided that the employees should not be members of the union, and, should they become such, the contract would be terminated. One nonunion employee was told by the strikers that he was not going to stay here three months. This employee stated to the strikers that he was under contract for three months, and was going to stay here and fill it out. He was offered his transportation to leave.

S. R. Marks, a vice president of the Pressmen's Union (but not a former employee of the plaintiffs), testified for the defendant strikers, in substance, that he had assisted some of the nonunion men under employment by the employing printers with transportation to leave town; that he did not know whether some of the men assisted were working under contract not to join the union and that he was not concerned about that; that none of them said, when they came to see him, that they were under contract not to join the union. He testified that he had money in his hands and was paying the same to men, who had been working for the employing printers, to leave. He further testified that he intended to win the fight on money he was getting from all sources; that the employers were running nonunion shops; that he considered the strike fight legitimate, legal, honest, and straightforward.

In other instances arguments and appeals were made to new employees not to retain the places of former employees and thus deprive the latter of the means of supporting themselves and families. In each instance the object sought by the defendants unde-nably was to bring about a severance of the relation of employer and employee between the printing establishments and their new employees. Whether the object was stated in plain terms or not, if successful the effect was to cause a breach of the contract. Whether the evidence in regard to interference with some of the printing shops and as to some of the defendants, considered alone as if in a separate case, would not authorize the grant of an interlocutory injunction, the judgment will not be reversed where the evidence authorized the judgment in behalf of some of the plaintiffs against some of the defendants. The exception is to the judgment as a whole. The plaintiffs brought the actions together against the defendants, the Pressmen's Union acting through their members and officials, charging that the latter were conspiring and acting together against the plaintiffs as a whole.

POWELL et al. v. MCKINNEY et al.
(No. 2360.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 11, 1921.)

1. Wills  $\S$ 524(2), 634(7)—Members of class ascertained on testator's death; remainder held vested, so that children of deceased remainderman took share.

"As a general rule, when there is a devise to a class, the members of the class are to be ascertained upon the death of the testator, as the will takes effect on that date." The devise in the present instance was to a class of children of the life tenant. The father of the plaintiffs was in life at the death of the testatrix, when the will became operative, but died prior to the period of distribution. At his death his interest passed to his heirs. Applying these principles, it follows that the petition was not subject to the ground of demurrer that the plaintiffs had no interest in the estate because, their father having died before the period of distribution, his interest was divested.

2. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 20(9) — Heirs may institute proceeding to set aside appointment without their knowledge.

The heirs of the decedent, who had no knowledge that the application for letters of administration was pending, were proper parties to institute and maintain an equitable proceeding to set aside and vacate the judgment appointing the administrator.

3. Limitation of actions  $\S$ 180(2) — Petition not showing bar on its face not subject to demurrer.

The petition was not subject to demurrer on the ground that it was barred by the statute of limitations. It does not affirmatively appear on the face of the petition that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore the petition is not subject to demurrer on that ground, but such defense is a matter for plea.

4. Action  $\S$ 50(8)—In suit to vacate appointment and for other relief, parties or causes held not misjoined.

The petition is not subject to demurrer on the ground that there is a misjoinder of parties, nor is it subject to demurrer on the ground that there is a misjoinder of causes of action.

5. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 20(9) — Suit to vacate appointment and establish plaintiffs' rights in another estate held not prematurely brought.

The petition was not subject to demurrer on the ground that the action is prematurely brought, because it affirmatively appears from the petition that there are no tangible assets of any kind in existence calling for the functions of an administrator de bonis non on the estate of Chapman Powell, deceased.

6. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 20(9) — Petition to vacate appointment and establish plaintiffs' rights in another estate not demurrable.

The petition is not subject to demurrer on the ground that, the petition showing that there was an administrator on the estate of H. Chapman Powell, the right to the custody and possession of any property, interests, or assets of such estate was in such legal representative, and petitioners were not entitled to proceed against the executor of the estate of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell.

7. Executors and administrators  $\S$ 20(9) — Suit to vacate judgments and orders and establish rights in estate held not barred by adequate remedy at law.

The petition set out a cause of action entitling the plaintiffs to equitable relief, for which they had no adequate remedy at law. The court erred in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by H. C. Powell and others against C. D. McKinney, administrator, and others. Judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Mrs. Mary J. Rucker bequeathed to her sister, Martha A. J. Powell, \$20,000 "during her natural life, she to enjoy the income from the same," with the further direction that "at her death said amount, with accumulations, if any, to be equally divided between her children." Mrs. Powell, the life tenant, died in June, 1917, subsequently to the death of Mrs. Rucker. She had had four children. Three of them survived her. The fourth child, H. Chapman Powell, survived the testatrix, but predeceased his mother, leaving two children, the plaintiffs in error. H. Chapman Powell had been divorced from his wife; the latter having married again and removed with their two children to the state of Virginia. At a time when the two children of H. Chapman Powell were still minors, without notice to them, and without their knowledge or consent, Frank A. Powell procured from the court of ordinary of Hall county letters of administration on the estate of H. Chapman Powell, and later an order authorizing the sale of a  $\frac{2}{12}$  interest in certain described property in Fulton county, Ga., under an application reciting:

"Mrs. Mary J. Rucker left a will devising $20,000 lifetime estate to Mrs. Martha A. J. Powell; Mrs. Martha A. J. Powell to receive the income from said property during her life, and, at her death, each of her children to receive $5,000 interest in said investment, with the increments thereof. H. Chapman Powell was a son of Mrs. Martha A. J. Powell, and said interest is invested in the property herein described."

The interest of the estate of H. Chapman Powell in the property was appraised to be of the value of $3,500, and on the sale was bought by Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, the mother of the deceased, H. Chapman Powell, and of his administrator, for the sum of $500, which amount was credited on an indebtedness which she claimed was due to her.

H. Chapman Powell and Travis Leigh Powell (the latter being a minor and suing through his mother as next friend), the two children of H. Chapman Powell, the deceased son of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, filed a petition against McKinney, administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Rucker, Frank A. Powell, individually and as administrator de bonis non of the estate of H. Chapman Powell, deceased, and John M. Hulse, as executor of the estate of Mrs. Powell. In addition to the facts above set forth the petition alleges that a one-fourth remainder interest in the bequest above mentioned became vested in the father of petitioners, H. Chapman Powell, and that the same passed and descended to them as his sole heirs at law; also that they are entitled to share as residuary legatees in the distribution of the estate of Mrs. Rucker, and that the value of their interest in said estate amounts to $8,000; that the application for letters of administration on the estate of their father, made by Frank A. Powell above referred to, was fraudulently made for the purpose of divesting petitioners of their interest in the bequest under the will of Mrs. Rucker; that the same was void, because it recited that the applicant was the next of kin (brother) of the deceased, when the applicant knew that petitioners, the children of the deceased, were the next of kin and were in life, because said application did not show the consent of the other brothers and sisters of the deceased, and because petitioners were at the time minors, and no notice was given to them of said application; that the sale of said property was fraudulent and void, because it was in effect a sale of a one-third interest in the property by the administrator to himself, and nothing was paid by Mrs. M. A. J. Powell for the interest of H. Chapman Powell in said property; that she was at the time a very old and infirm person, dominated by her son, Frank A. Powell, and later executed her will devising all her property to her three children, including Frank A. Powell; that said sale was void, because the land was misdescribed, in that it was not located in a block bounded by Broad street; that said sale was void, because there was no title in the said H. Chapman Powell to the real estate mentioned, the same being in the representative of the estate of Mrs. Mary J. Rucker; that the said legacy was not invested in said property, had never been assented to by the administrator of her estate, and had never been set apart; that petitioners did not know of the above-mentioned sale until about the time of the filing of a certain petition by the administrator upon Mrs. Rucker's estate, seeking construction and direction; that petitioners filed pleadings in said matter, setting up their relationship to H. Chapman Powell; that their addresses were known to or could have been ascertained by Frank A. Powell; that in spite of these facts Frank A. Powell filed in the court of ordinary of Hall county an application for letters of administration de bonis non upon the estate of H. Chapman Powell, making in said application the following averment:

"H. Chapman Powell, resident of said county, departed this life on the 20th day of January, 1915, leaving your petitioner as one of his next of kin, and also leaving possibly an estate of real and personal property, worth the sum of not known at this time; and petitioner has administered on said estate, but there is a possible part thereof not administered, and there is an indebtedness against said estate, and at the time of his death the said H. Chapman Powell was entirely intestate, as your petitioner believes and herein alleges."

Petitioners allege that this application was likewise fraudulent and void, because Frank A. Powell knew at the time it was made that he was not one of the next of kin of H. Chapman Powell; because it did not set forth the existence of any estate to be administered upon, but only a possibility of such, and that a possibility cannot be administered upon; because it undertakes to set up an indebtedness against said estate, without showing to whom the indebtedness was due, and without showing that Frank A. Powell was a creditor. The petition recites that Frank A. Powell and others have filed against McKinney, administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Rucker, a petition for settlement, and that the same would shortly thereafter be heard. It also alleges that Hulsey, as administrator of the estate of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, is claiming for that estate the interest in the estate of Mrs. Rucker to which petitioners, as the sole heirs of H. Chapman Powell, are entitled.

The prayers are that the petition for settlement of the estate of Mrs. Rucker, above referred to, and distribution of the estate, particularly the portion vested in H. Chapman Powell, be stayed by injunction; that McKinney, as administrator of Mrs. Rucker, be enjoined from paying over to Hulsey, as executor of Mrs. Powell, or to Frank A. Powell, individually or as administrator de bonis non of H. Chapman Powell, any portion of the Rucker estate to which petitioners lay claim; that the appointments of Frank A. Powell as administrator and as administrator de bonis non on the estate of H. Chapman Powell, issued by the court of ordinary of Hall county, Ga., be declared void; that the application made by Frank A. Powell, as administrator, for leave to sell the interest of H. Chapman Powell in the land above referred to, and the deed made by him to Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, be declared null and void; that the executor of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, and Frank A. Powell, as administrator of the estate of H. Chapman Powell, be declared to have no right, title, or interest in the portion of Mrs. Rucker's estate claimed by petitioners; that the interest of H. Chapman Powell in the estate of Mrs. Rucker be declared to be the property of petitioners; and that they have judgment against McKinney, as administrator of that estate.

Frank A. Powell, individually and as administrator de bonis non upon the estate of H. Chapman Powell, and Hulsey, as administrator upon Mrs. Powell's estate, demurred generally: (a) For want of equity and failure to set forth a cause of action, the petition showing that petitioners have an adequate remedy at law; (b) for misjoinder of parties, it appearing from the facts alleged that petitioners cannot recover from the defendants named, jointly; (c) for misjoinder of action, in that a petition for the removal of an administrator under an allegation of fraud cannot be united with a claim for extraordinary relief outside of the mere removal, and cannot be united with an action praying for the setting aside of the alleged sale; (d) because the petitioners are not entitled as a matter of law to proceed in their individual capacity for the relief prayed as against McKinney, administrator of the estate of Mrs. Rucker, in conjunction with John M. Hulsey as executor of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, or as against John M. Hulsey, executor of the estate of Mrs. Powell, or as against Frank A. Powell individually or as administrator of the estate of H. Chapman Powell, deceased. Frank A. Powell also demurred upon the additional grounds: (e) That the action is premature, it affirmatively appearing from the petition that there are no tangible assets of any kind in existence calling for the functions of an administrator de bonis non of the estate of Chapman Powell, deceased; (f) because it affirmatively appears from the petition that the judgments and orders of the court of ordinary of Hall county sought to be set aside were rendered more than three years prior to the filing of the petition, and the action is therefore barred by the statute of limitations; (g) because, it affirmatively appearing from the petition that H. Chapman Powell died prior to the death of Mrs. Powell, the life tenant, and the bequest in the will of Mrs. Rucker being to Mrs. Powell, with remainder to her children as a class, the legacy, as to such child, was divested, and no interest passed to his children, the plaintiffs in this case. Hulsey also demurred upon the ground: (h) That, the petition showing there was an administrator upon the estate of H. Chapman Powell, the right to the custody and possession of any property, interests, or assets of such estate was in such legal representatives, and petitioners were not entitled to proceed against him as executor of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell. The demurrers were sustained, and the petition dismissed. The plaintiffs excepted.

Robt. C. & Philip H. Alston, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

Green, Tilson & McKinney and R. B. Blackburn, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. [1] 1. One of the grounds of demurrer on which the petition is attacked is as follows:

"It affirmatively appearing from the petition that the legacy referred to was willed to Mrs. M. A. J. Powell for and during her life, and at her death said sum, with its accumulations, if any, to be equally divided between her children, and it further appearing that H. Chapman Powell departed this life prior to the death of Mrs. M. A. J. Powell, the life tenant, the defendants herein named contend that upon the death of H. Chapman Powell no interest in said legacy passed to plaintiffs, and as a matter of law they cannot recover as against these defendants, or as against the estate of Mary J. Rucker, deceased, in any sum or in any amount as charged in said petition; these defendants contending that, the legacy referred to being to one person for life and at her death to the children of the life tenant as a class, upon the death of either of the children before the death of the life tenant, the legacy as to such deceased child was divested, and no interest went to the children of such deceased child, to wit, the plaintiffs."

As shown in the statement of facts, Mrs. Powell, the life tenant, and all of her four children, were in life at the death of Mrs. Mary J. Rucker, the testatrix. After the death of the testatrix, but prior to the death of the life tenant, one of the children of the latter, H. Chapman Powell, died, leaving two children, the plaintiffs in the trial court and plaintiffs in error in this court. The item of the will under which they claim, and upon which their suit is based, is as follows:

"I give to my sister, Mrs. Martha A. J. Powell, twenty thousand ($20,000.00) dollars during her natural life, she to enjoy the income from the same, at her death said amount, with the accumulations, if any, to be equally divided between her children. If I should survive my sister Martha, then the legacy herein to be equally divided between her children."

The last sentence in the item of the will just quoted need not be considered, since the condition that "if I should survive my sister Martha" did not occur; the testatrix having predeceased her sister Martha. The correct decision of the question depends upon whether the remainder interests vested at the death of the testator or at the death of the life tenant. By this we mean the vesting of the title, and not the vesting to the right to the possession, use, and enjoyment of the property. 23 Ruling Case Law, p. 526, § 68. Code 1910, § 3680, declares:

"The law favors the vesting of remainders in all cases of doubt. In construing wills, words of survivorship shall refer to the death of the testator in order to vest remainders, unless a manifest intention to the contrary appears."

Section 3677 provides as follows:

"If the remainderman dies before the time arrives for possession his estate in remainder, his heirs are entitled to a vested remainder interest."

In the case of Irvin v. Porterfield, 126 Ga. 729, 55 S. E. 946, the will provided for a life estate to the widow of the testator, and further provided:

"At the death of my wife I wish my property equally divided between my children."

In that case (126 Ga. at page 732, 55 S. E. 948) it was held:

"As a general rule, when there is a devise to a class, the members of the class are to be ascertained upon the death of the testator, as the will takes effect on that date. In a devise to children as a class by way of remainder, children in esse at the death of the testator take vested interests. * * * The devise was to a class of children of the testator. This class was fixed by the conditions that existed at the death of the testator. And the interest of any that might die before the period of distribution passed to their heirs."

See Crawley v. Kendrick, 122 Ga. 183, 187, 50 S. E. 41, 2 Ann. Cas. 643; Milner v. Gay, 145 Ga. 858, 860, 90 S. E. 65; Gibbons v. International Harvester Co., 146 Ga. 467, 91 S. E. 482.

The general rule elsewhere is that where property is devised or bequeathed to one person for life, with remainder over to the testator's children, the latter take a vested interest on the death of the testator, unless there is a clear manifestation of a contrary intent on the part of the testator. 23 Ruling Case Law, pp. 530, 534, §§ 72, 73. In the present case there seems to be no clear manifestation of an intent to postpone the vesting of the title in the remainderman, and therefore it is to be presumed that the testator intended that the remainder interest should vest at the moment when the will became operative. If there should be doubt on this question, it must be resolved in favor of the earlier vesting. We conclude that the remainder interest of H. Chapman Powell vested at the death of the testatrix, Mrs. Rucker, and that therefore the petition was not subject to demurrer on this ground.

[2] 2. The petition is attacked by demurrer on the ground that, the petition showing that there was an administrator upon the estate of H. Chapman Powell, the right to the custody and possession of any property, interest, or assets of such estate was in such legal representative, and that the plaintiffs could not sue in their individual capacity to recover such property. This ground of the demurrer is without merit, since the petition alleges that the judgment appointing the administrator was void, because obtained by fraud and without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, who resided in the state of Virginia, and that the acts and doings of the administrator were adverse to the plaintiffs and in fraud of their rights. In Neal v. Boykin, 129 Ga. 676, 59 S. E. 912, 121 Am. St. Rep. 237, it was said:

"The heirs and creditors of the decedent, who had no knowledge that the application for letters of administration was pending, were proper parties to institute and maintain an equitable proceeding to set aside or vacate the judgment appointing the administrator."

In the opinion in that case (129 Ga. at page 682, 59 S. E. 915, 121 Am. St. Rep. 237) it was said:

"The petitioners in the present case were heirs and creditors of the decedent. They were interested in the assets of the estate and their distribution. They would, therefore, have been heard as caveators when the application for letters of administration was pending. Towner v. Griffin, 115 Ga. 966. And it is quite clear that they are the proper parties plaintiff to the proceeding to vacate or set aside the judgment appointing the administrator. See Jones v. Smith, 120 Ga. 642. The fact that citation was published would not prevent the plaintiffs, who had no knowledge of the application for letters of administration, from moving in due time to have the judgment appointing the administrator set aside. Davis v. Albritton, 127 Ga. 517."

[3] 3. Another ground of the demurrer was that it affirmatively appears from the petition that the judgment and orders of the court of ordinary of Hall county, which were sought to be set aside, were rendered more than three years prior to the filing of the petition, and therefore that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. It appears from the petition that one of the plaintiffs, Travis Leigh Powell, was still a minor when the present suit was filed. It does not clearly appear when H. Chapman Powell, the other plaintiff, attained his majority.

"Where it does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the declaration that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, this defense cannot be made by general demurrer setting up that the action is barred by the statute, but is matter for plea." Stringer v. Stringer, 93 Ga. 320(2), 20 S. E. 242; Coney v. Horne, 93 Ga. 723, 728, 20 S. E. 213; Thorn-ton v. Jackson, 129 Ga. 700(2), 59 S. E. 905.

It does appear from the petition that on December 27, 1915, Frank Powell filed his final report, as administrator, as to the sale of certain property, and that at that time H. Chapman Powell was a minor. The petition was filed by the plaintiffs on January 21, 1920. Moreover, the demurrer attacks the petition on the ground that both of petitioners are barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer was based upon the ground that the action was barred as to both plaintiffs, and it affirmatively appears that one of them was still a minor. It is not necessary to decide whether, in view of the allegations of fraud, the statute of limitations began to run as against H. Chapman Powell on the day he attained his majority, or whether it began on his discovery of the rendition of the fraudulent judgment sought to be set aside.

[4] 4. The petition is also attacked by demurrer on the ground that there is a misjoinder of parties and a misjoinder of causes of action. The petition was not subject to demurrer on either of these grounds. All of the parties were necessary to a complete adjudication of the issues. As was said in the case of Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 193, 28 S. E. 97, 99:

"The principle to be deduced * * * is that a bill against several persons must relate to matters of the same nature and having a connection with each other, and in which all of the defendants are more or less concerned, though their rights in respect to the general subject of the case may be distinct."

Separate suits against the several defendants would not afford effective and complete justice to the plaintiffs. All of the parties defendant are interested in and contesting over the same fund. That fund is the portion of Mrs. Rucker's estate bequeathed to H. Chapman Powell, and which became vested on the death of the testatrix.

"Equity seeks always to do complete justice; and hence, having the parties before the court rightfully, it will proceed to give full relief to all parties in reference to the subject-matter of the suit, provided the court has jurisdiction for that purpose." Civil Code 1910, § 4522.

The court having taken jurisdiction for the purpose of setting aside a judgment on the ground of fraud, it will proceed to give full relief to all of the parties in reference to the subject-matter of the suit. McDonald v. Davis, 43 Ga. 356 (2); Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic R. Co. v. Smith, 148 Ga. 282, 96 S. E. 562; Kirkpatrick v. Holland, 148 Ga. 708, 98 S. E. 265.

[5, 6] 5, 6. The fifth and sixth headnotes do not require elaboration.

[7] 7. The petition is attacked by demurrer on the ground that there is a want of equity and failure to set forth a cause of action. The judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition does not indicate the particular ground or grounds of the demurrer to which the court adjudged the petition to be subject. The demurrer was sustained as a whole, and the petition dismissed. It is a necessary conclusion that the trial court was of the opinion that the petition was insufficient to afford any relief upon any of the prayers; for the general demurrer would have been overruled if the petition had been considered sufficient to afford any relief upon any prayer of the petition. It is argued that there is no equity, because the plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law. We think it obvious, the allegations of the petition being taken as true, that the petitioners have not an adequate remedy at law. The judgments of the court of ordinary completely bar the way of plaintiffs to an adjudication of their rights. These judgments are alleged to have been obtained by fraud, and relief in these matters falls peculiarly within the province of a court of equity. Under the contention that there is a want of equity and a failure to set forth a cause of action generally, it is argued that none of the relief can be obtained, because it appears from the petition that Frank A. Powell has obtained a judgment from the court of ordinary of Hall county, dismissing him as administrator of the estate of H. Chapman Powell, deceased. The petition alleges that Frank Powell obtained his appointments, both as administrator and as administrator de bonis non, by fraud; that these plaintiffs resided in the state of Virginia, and had no notice of his appointment until after the fraud had been accomplished; and they seek to have the judgments appointing him set aside for these reasons. The petition does not allege that Frank A. Powell had obtained a judgment of the court of ordinary of Hall county, dismissing him; but it is shown that he had made his final report as administrator, and had later made application for and been appointed administrator de bonis non upon the same estate, and from this it is argued that it must be assumed that he had obtained a judgment dismissing him as administrator. The petition does not pray for the setting aside of any such judgment of dismissal. It has been held in a number of cases that such a judgment of dismissal must be set aside before an administrator's sale can be set aside, because until then the administrator making the sale could not be made a party to the suit. Whitley Grocery Co. v. Jones, 128 Ga. 791, 58 S. E. 623. It has also been held that, where there has been a judgment of dismissal, this judgment must be set aside before the administrator can be cited to appear in a court of ordinary to account to the heirs or probate the will in solemn form. Jacobs v. Pou, 18 Ga. 346; Thompson v. Chapeau, 132 Ga. 847, 65 S. E. 127. The rulings made by these decisions are based upon the fact that the administrator was a necessary party; and, if he had been granted letters of dismission, he could not be made a party unless the grant was reopened and he was reinstated in office.

In the present case Frank A. Powell is administrator de bonis non on the estate of H. Chapman Powell. After having his dismission as administrator, apparently, he subsequently had himself appointed administrator de bonis non, and as such representative of the same estate he is made a party to this suit. Nothing could be gained, therefore, and no useful purpose could be served by including a prayer for setting aside the judgment dismissing Frank A. Powell as administrator. Moreover, his entire connection with the administration of that estate, including the sale of the property made by him, is attacked on the ground of fraud, and according to the allegations the fraud runs through the entire transaction from beginning to end, including the judgment of dismissal. Pass v. Pass, 98 Ga. 791, 25 S. E. 752; Pollock v. Cox, 108 Ga. 430, 34 S. E. 213.

"The superior court in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction may set aside a judgment of a court of ordinary, procured by fraud, upon proper allegations and proof. The party seeking such relief is not compelled to move to set aside the judgment in the court of ordinary." Lester v. Reynolds, 144 Ga. 143(2), 86 S. E. 321; Wash v. Wash, 145 Ga. 404, 89 S. E. 364.

Our conclusion is that the petition set out a cause of action, and that the court erred in sustaining the general demurrers and dismissing the case.

1. Attorney and client  $\S$ 101(1) — Attorney cannot consent to judgment contrary to client's instructions when other party knows of violation of instructions.

An attorney at law has no authority to bind his client by a compromise agreement resulting in a consent judgment in direct opposition to the instructions of his client, and with the knowledge of the adverse party of such violation of instructions.

2. Execution  $\S$ 166 — Judgment  $\S$ 373 — Defendant cannot go behind judgment on affidavit of illegality though wrongfully consented to by attorney; judgment may be set aside when rendered on attorney's wrongful consent.

The client cannot, by affidavit of illegality, go behind the consent judgment so entered, but such judgment may be set aside upon proper proceedings therefor, duly commenced.

Error from Superior Court, Wheeler County; E. D. Graham, Judge.

Suit by the Georgia Gravel Company against J. C. Patterson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, on demurrer, and defendant named brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Patterson filed a petition against the Georgia Gravel Company, a corporation, and S. M. Kennedy, seeking to recover a personal judgment against each of the defendants. Subsequently the plaintiff sued out an attachment against the defendants. The defendants employed an attorney at law to defend the actions; and answers were filed by each of the defendants, denying any indebtedness to the plaintiff. During the regular term of the court to which the suit and attachment were made returnable, the attorney for the defendants withdrew as counsel from the cases, and consented that plaintiff take a verdict in each of said cases against each of the defendants for the principal sum sued for, with interest. Verdicts were accordingly taken, without proof or evidence, without notice to the defendants, without their consent, contrary to the instructions of the defendants to their attorney, and with the knowledge of the plaintiff of such violation of instructions.

The defendant, the Georgia Gravel Company, did not know of the taking of the verdicts against it, and the entry of judgment thereon by the plaintiff, until after the term of the court at which the same were taken had adjourned, when it was too late to except to said verdicts or judgments by motion for new trial or otherwise; nor did it know of the withdrawal of the attorney from the cases, and his consent that plaintiff might take verdicts and judgments, until after the verdicts and judgments were rendered. After the verdicts and judgments were entered, executions were issued against the defendants, and these executions were levied by the sheriff of the county upon certain land belonging to the defendant, the Georgia Gravel Company, and the land was being advertised for sale. Whereupon the defendant, Georgia Gravel Company, filed an equitable petition against the plaintiff, J. C. Patterson, the sheriff, the attorney of record of the defendant in the common-law action and attachment suit, and S. M. Kennedy, its codefendant in said action and suit, seeking to have the consent verdicts and judgments set aside, and for other relief. To the petition J. C. Patterson demurred, upon the ground that it set forth no cause of action, and that the petitioner had an adequate and complete remedy at law, by affidavit of illegality. The demurrer was overruled, and Patterson excepted.

H. W. Nalley, of Alamo, for plaintiff in error.

Eschol Graham and Geo. H. Harris, both of McRae, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Upon the first question raised by the demurrer, the case is controlled by the decision in Davis v. First National Bank of Blakely, 139 Ga. 702, 78 S. E. 190, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 750, where it was held:

"Where a suit was brought to cancel a deed, to have the land described in it decreed to belong to the plaintiff, to have an accounting, to recover double the usurious interest alleged to have been paid to the grantee, a national bank, and to obtain other equitable relief, if the plaintiff authorized her attorneys to enter into a consent decree fixing the amount required to be paid by her to the defendant in discharge of all liabilities against her and the property at $5,000, and expressly instructed them that she would not consent to a compromise or settlement of the case except upon such terms, to which the attorneys agreed, which instructions were known to the adverse party through its leading attorney; and if nevertheless the defendant's leading attorney persuaded the plaintiff's counsel to disregard such instruction, and induced them to consent to a decree fixing such liability at $15,000, declaring the debt to be hers, and not that of her husband, as she alleged it was, and directing that in default of payment by her the land should be sold as provided therein, a consent decree so entered could be set aside by the client upon proper proceedings therefor, duly commenced."

[2] 2. Upon the second question, the plaintiff in the equity suit cannot go behind the judgments by affidavit of illegality, and attack the judgments upon the ground that they were rendered by the consent of his counsel, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, in direct opposition to his instructions to his attorney, and with the knowledge of the adverse party of the violation of such instructions. Civil Code 1910, § 5311; Tumlin v. O'Bryan, 68 Ga. 66; Southern Railway Co. v. Daniels, 103 Ga. 541, 29 S. E. 761; Fitzgerald Granitoid Co. v. Alpha Portland Cement Co., 15 Ga. App. 174, 82 S. E. 774. It is obvious that illegality was not an available remedy.

1. Criminal law §953—Statute as to notice of motion for new trial complied with where state had sufficient notice before final hearing.

Where an extraordinary motion for new trial in a criminal case is made in term, upon grounds which were not known to the movant or his counsel before the convening of the court, and the judge entertains the motion, grants a rule nisi thereon, and the solicitor general acknowledges service of the motion and nisi, expressly waiving "all other and further service or notice," and is given 20 days' notice of the motion and of the grounds thereof before final hearing, the judgment overruling the motion and denying the new trial will not be affirmed upon the ground that the movant did not give to the opposite party 20 days' notice of his intention to make the motion.

2. Criminal law §957(1), 1156(4)—Finding on motion for new trial that juror was competent not reversed unless discretion abused; deceased juror's statements on voir dire may be considered on motion for new trial.

When in a criminal case, after verdict, either in an original motion or an extraordinary motion for new trial, an attack is made upon a juror upon the ground that he was not impartial, the trial judge occupies the place of a trier, and his finding that the juror is competent will not be reversed unless under all the facts the discretion is manifestly abused.

(a) The statements of a juror on voir dire may be considered by the trial judge on the hearing of an extraordinary motion for new trial, where the juror died subsequently to the trial and before the making of the motion.

3. Criminal law §923(4)—Jury §90—Juror related to prosecutrix within ninth degree is disqualified; disqualification by relationship when unknown at trial is good ground for extraordinary motion for new trial; juror's ignorance of relationship does not prevent new trial.

A juror in a criminal case who is related either by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree to the prosecutrix, ascertained according to the rules of the civil law, is a disqualified juror.

(a) That a juror is related to the prosecutrix in a criminal case within the prohibited degree, unknown to the defendant until after verdict, is a good ground for an extraordinary motion for new trial.

(b) That the juror was unaware of the relationship to the prosecutrix until after verdict will not prevent a new trial.

GEORGE, J. George Crawley, Decatur Crawley, Rosa Crawley, and Blain Stewart were jointly indicted and jointly tried at the October term, 1919, of Union superior court, for the offense of murder. The defendants were convicted. George Crawley and Decatur Crawley were sentenced to be hanged, and Rosa Crawley and Blain Stewart were sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. The defendants made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and the judgment of the lower court affirmed by the Supreme Court on September 30, 1920. A motion for rehearing was filed, and this motion was denied on October 2, 1920. 150 Ga. 586, 104 S. E. 410. Union superior court convened on October 4, 1920, and adjourned on October 9, 1920. On October 9, 1920, and before the adjournment of court, the defendants named above filed an extraordinary motion for new trial, upon the grounds that: (1) One of the jurors who had rendered the verdict finding them guilty, to wit, Frank H. Spivia, was disqualified by reason of relationship to the prosecutrix which fact was unknown to the defendants or their counsel; and (2) one of the jurors who rendered the verdict finding them guilty, to wit, Luther Chastain, was disqualified by reason of prejudice and bias against the defendants, which fact was unknown to the defendants or their counsel. On December 7, 1920, the judge of the superior court entered a judgment overruling the extraordinary motion for new trial, and the movants excepted.

[1] 1. Penal Code 1910, § 1091, provides:

"In case of a motion for a new trial made after the adjournment of the court, some good reason must be shown why the motion was not made during the term, which shall be judged of by the court. In all such cases, twenty days' notice shall be given to the opposite party."

The state contends that the judgment denying the extraordinary motion for new trial should be affirmed, because, if for no other reason, 20 days' notice of movants' intention to move for a new trial upon extraordinary grounds was not given to the solicitor general as required by the Code. The record discloses that the grounds upon which the extraordinary motion was made were not discovered until after the convening of the superior court on October 4, 1920. As stated above, the motion was filed on the last day of the term of the court, to wit, October 9, 1920. The motion for rehearing made in the case was denied by the Supreme Court only 2 days before the convening of the October term, 1920, of Union superior court. A motion for new trial based on extraordinary grounds must be filed in term time, either at the term when the case is tried or at some subsequent term. Due diligence required the movants to make their extraordinary motion for new trial promptly on discovery of the grounds. As stated, the grounds of the motion relied on were discovered by movants and their counsel during the October term, 1920, of Union superior court. It was therefore impossible for the movants to give counsel for the state 20 days' notice of their intention to file the extraordinary motion for new trial at the October term. It appears, however, that the trial judge entertained the motion and granted a rule nisi thereon, calling on the solicitor general to show cause on November 23, 1920, why the motion should not be granted. Upon the motion and nisi the solicitor general acknowledged service in the following language:

"Service of the within extraordinary motion for new trial, with orders thereon, is hereby acknowledged. Copy waived. All other and further service of notice is hereby waived."

On motion of the solicitor general the hearing was postponed until November 6, 1920, and again postponed until November 9, 1920, on which latter date the court took the motion under advisement, and thereafter, on December 7, 1920, entered a judgment overruling the motion. It will be noted that the opposite party had 20 days' notice of the motion before the final hearing thereon, and that he was fully advised of the grounds of the motion. We are of the opinion that this was sufficient. Compare Brinkley v. Buchanan, 55 Ga. 342. We do not rest the decision of this point upon the doctrine of waiver alone, nor upon the fact that the court granted the nisi notwithstanding the failure of movants to give the solicitor general 20 days' notice of their intention to file the motion for new trial; but we are of the opinion that 20 days' notice of the filing of the extraordinary motion for new trial before final hearing thereon is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute. The decision on this point is made upon all the facts as they appear in the record, and it is unnecessary to decide whether the refusal of the judge to grant a rule nisi solely upon the ground that movants had failed to give the solicitor general 20 days' notice of their intention to make the extraordinary motion would be erroneous.

[2] 2. Considering the grounds of the extraordinary motion in their inverse order, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in overruling the motion upon the second ground thereof. This ground is based upon an affidavit of a witness to the effect that prior to the trial of the case Luther Chastain, one of the jurors, had stated that "the Crawley boys and Blain Stewart ought to be hung, and if he got on the jury he would make it had for them," and upon the affidavit of another witness to the effect that this juror, after the trial of the case, had stated that the verdict rendered in the case was in accordance with his previously fixed opinion. After the trial of the case and before the filing of the extraordinary motion for new trial, the juror died. The state was therefore unable to produce an affidavit by the juror; but the state offered certain affidavits detailing facts and circumstances tending to cast suspicion upon the truth of the statements contained in the affidavits offered by the movants and to disprove this ground of the motion. In addition, the juror had been sworn on the voir dire. Being dead at the time of the filing of the extraordinary motion for new trial, it was competent for the court to take in consideration the juror's sworn statement that he had not formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and that there was no bias or prejudice resting on his mind either for or against the accused. See Buchanan v. State, 24 Ga. 282, 286. In view of the counter showing submitted by the state, the case on this point is within the rule announced in Jefferson v. State, 137 Ga. 382, 73 S. E. 499; McNaughton v. State, 136 Ga. 600, 71 S. E. 1038; Embry v. State, 138 Ga. 464, 75 S. E. 604.

[3] 3. On the first ground of the motion it appears that the prosecutrix, the wife of the deceased, is related to the wife of the juror Spivia. Upon this point the evidence submitted by the movants and the state is not in conflict. The wife of the juror is five degrees removed from the common ancestor, and the prosecutrix is four degrees removed from the common ancestor. By the rule of the civil law the juror's wife and the prosecutrix are related in the ninth degree; by the canon law in the fifth degree. The movants and their counsel were unaware of this relationship until the judgment of the trial court overruling the original motion for new trial was heard and affirmed by the Supreme Court. That the movants and their counsel, by the exercise of due diligence, could not have sooner discovered the relation of the juror to the prosecutrix, is not fairly in dispute. The trial court, in overruling the extraordinary motion, expressly found that neither the movants nor their counsel had waived the alleged disqualification of this juror, and waiver necessarily results either from knowledge of such relationship or from ignorance of such relationship, due to the failure to exercise proper diligence. It appears that the prosecutrix and counsel for the state were also unaware of the relationship until after verdict; and the affidavit of the juror himself, to the effect that he did not know of the relationship until after the trial, and that even upon notice and inquiry he was unable to ascertain the exact relationship, was offered by the state upon the hearing of the motion. In view of all the facts and circumstances detailed in the affidavits of movants and of their counsel, it must be held that both movants and their counsel exercised due diligence in the premises. There is no statute in this state expressly declaring what degree of relationship will disqualify a juror in a criminal case. Nor is the rule prescribed by which the degree of relationship is to be determined. In the selection of a juror for the trial of a criminal case the state or the accused may make either of the following objections:

"1. That he is not a citizen, resident in the county. 2. That he is over sixty or under twenty-one years of age. 3. That he is an idiot or lunatic, or intoxicated. 4. That he is so near of kindred to the prosecutor, or the accused, or the deceased, as to disqualify him by law from serving on the jury." Penal Code 1910, § 999.

In Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 489 (original motion for new trial), it appeared that one of the jurors was a cousin of the prosecutor, but the degree of the relationship is not stated. It was held that a new trial should be granted "where one of the jury is cousin to the prosecutor, and the fact not known to the accused or his counsel until after his conviction." In Ledford v. State, 75 Ga. 856 (original motion for new trial), it was held that a third cousin of the prosecutor in a criminal case is not a qualified juror. In the opinion by Chief Justice Jackson (page 857) it is said:

"The juror was disqualified, being a third cousin and within the ninth degree, which fact was unknown to the defendant and his counsel until after trial."

In Watkins v. State, 125 Ga. 143, 144, 53 S. E. 1024, 1025, it is said:

"The ninth degree of relationship, as that expression was used in Ledford's Case, has been construed to mean the ninth degree as calculated by the rules of the civil law, and not of the canon law. Thompson on Trials, 53;

17 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1124. * * * Sir Edward Coke stated that relationship in any degree was sufficient to disqualify a juror. Co. Litt. 157a. But later writers state that the relationship must be within the ninth degree, calculated according to the civil law. 3 Bl. Com. 863; 1 Chitty's Crim. L. 541; Finch's Law, 401. Such seems to be the view adopted in this state, as indicated in Ledford's Case, supra."

In Roberts v. Roberts, 115 Ga. 259, 261, 41 S. E. 616, 617, 90 Am. St. Rep. 108, it is said:

"In Ledford v. State, supra, Mr. Chief Justice Jackson says: 'The juror was disqualified, being a third cousin and within the ninth degree.' This statement by the Chief Justice, that relationship within the ninth degree would disqualify, we suppose meant within the ninth degree as calculated by the rules of the civil law, and not by the rules of the canon law, which are of force in this state in reference to matters of inheritance."

See, also, Moody v. Griffin, 65 Ga. 304; McElhannon v. State, 99 Ga. 672, 26 S. E. 501.

The state insists, however, that upon the point involved, the statements in 75 Ga. and in the other cases cited are obiter dicta. According to 1 Chitty, Criminal Law, 541, a principal challenge will be admitted if the juror is related to either party within the ninth degree, though only by marriage. See 2 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure (2 Ed.) § 901. In Thompson on Trials (2d Ed.) § 62, it is said that relation by consanguinity and affinity "is reckoned according to the rule of the civil law, as distinguished from that of the canon law, which law was the English law of descent." Relation is a common-law disqualification, and the statement of the Chief Justice in Ledford's Case, supra, is a recognition of the common-law rule. In Smith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 574, 59 S. E. 311, it was held that a juror who was related by affinity to the prosecutor within the ninth degree as determined by the rule of the civil law is a disqualified juror, and that a new trial should be granted upon this ground, upon extraordinary motion. In the opinion, by Judge Russell, attention is called to the fact that the movant contended that the juror was related to the prosecutor in the seventh degree, but that the counter showing submitted by the state authorized the trial judge to find that the juror was related to the prosecutor in the ninth degree only. At page 577 of 2 Ga. App., at page 313 of 59 S. E., it is pointed out that—

"The degree of relationship to a party which will disqualify a juror is not the same as will disqualify a judge. At common law favor was not presumed in a judge, while originally the presumption as to a juror was that any relationship whatever, either by affinity or consanguinity, would disqualify a juror, this rule being later modified so that the disqualification by reason of kinship extended no further than to include the ninth degree. The limitation of the disqualification of judges to cases where" one or more of the parties to the case may be of kin within the fourth degree was the adoption of an arbitrary rule by statute, regardless of the common law, while the rule as to the disqualification of jurors (in the absence of legislation on the subject) is the common law."

It has been held by this court that relation within the fourth degree to either party will disqualify a juror in a civil case. Roberts v. Roberts, supra; Central Georgia Power Co. v. Nolen, 143 Ga. 776 (2), 85 S. E. 945; Central Georgia Power Co. v. Pope, 144 Ga. 130, 86 S. E. 322. The common-law rule, which disqualifies a juror in a case where he is related to one of the parties, is in force in this state, both in civil and criminal cases. Under the statute the judge is disqualified if related to either party within the fourth degree, computed by the canon law (Short v. Mathis, 101 Ga. 287, 28 S. E. 918). Under the decisions of this court a juror in a civil case is disqualified if related to either party within the fourth degree, computed by the canon law. Under the common-law rule applied in this state a juror in a criminal case is disqualified if related to the prosecutor by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree, computed by the rule of the civil law. It is insisted by the state that, since the statute (Penal Code, § 999) recognizes the relation of the juror to the prosecutor, the accused, or the deceased as ground for challenge for cause, objection to the juror upon this point must be taken before trial. Cases in other jurisdictions support this contention. See 3 Wharton's Criminal Procedure (10th Ed.) § 1786, and cases cited in note 10. According to these decisions disqualifications not absolute, which are ground for challenge, are not grounds for new trial, unless urged before trial. In Georgia Railroad v. Cole, 73 Ga. 715, it is said:

"A jury composed of men who are not lawful men, men whose relationship to the parties renders them incompetent as jurors, cannot render a lawful verdict. If the parties consent to the jurors, or have knowledge of their incompetency, then they will be held to waive the same. It cannot be said that the defendants in error have had their case tried, certainly not legally, and, although the verdict may be in accordance with the facts, and such as a lawful jury should have rendered, yet it is no verdict, and the court did right to set it aside."

In view of the prior decisions of this court, it must be held that a juror related by consanguinity or affinity within the ninth degree to the prosecutor in a criminal case is a disqualified juror; and, where such relation is unknown to the accused until after verdict, a new trial will be granted.

But it is finally insisted that the juror himself was unaware of the relation and could not have been influenced thereby, and that any such disqualification, if good ground for granting an ordinary motion, cannot be classified as among the extraordinary grounds recognized by law. In Ledford v. State, supra, it was said:

"It would be too dangerous a precedent to allow the juror to assert that he was ignorant of the relationship till after trial, too. The principle on which the law rejects him is that he is not impartial; the same objection lies to his assertion that he was ignorant of the relationship at the time of the trial, after he had assisted in the conviction."

While the reasoning on this point may not be altogether satisfactory, the exact point was ruled and the policy of the state declared. The ruling has been subsequently followed. Lyens v. State, 133 Ga. 587, 600, 66 S. E. 792. The suggestion that the disqualification of a juror in a criminal case on account of relation to the prosecutor cannot be classed as among the extraordinary grounds recognized by law is convincingly disposed of by Judge Russell in Smith v. State, supra, as follows:

"Counsel argue that 'the question of the relationship of a juror not only ordinarily occurs in the trial of cases, but is of general and constant occurrence. And the motion in this case shows on its face that it did occur in this case and was inquired for.' We will agree with counsel that the inquiry into the subject of the relationship of jurors—questions as to such relationship—is almost a matter of daily occurrence in the courts. But in the opinion that the discovery of disqualification after counsel has called attention to the subject of relationship, and the trial judge has taken the pains to have an investigation in open court touching relationship, and the cautious juror's mind is again indirectly turned to any cause which might bias his judgment by the questions propounded on the voir dire, is a common or ordinary occurrence, we do not concur. We hold such a circumstance to be extraordinary, and the law has long so regarded it; for, contrary to the prevailing rule, it absolutely shuts its ears to the explanation that the juror was not aware of the relationship and that such relationship did not in any wise affect the verdict. The law will not hear or consider that the presence of the disqualified juror did not hurt the losing party. This ground of motion for new trial is extraordinary in the same sense as the ground mentioned in Cox v. Hillyer [65 Ga. 572], where one is convicted on the testimony of a witness subsequently found guilty of perjury in giving that testimony. It is lamentably true that perjury is not uncommon, but the law justly considers it an extraordinary circumstance that the falsity of testimony which has been credited by a jury and has induced a solemn verdict of guilty should be established."

See, also, Harris v. State, 150 Ga. 680, 104 S. E. 902.

Whether a juror is disqualified on account of bias is a question of fact. Whether a juror is disqualified on account of relationship to the prosecutrix is likewise a question of fact; but the inquiry, in the absence of waiver by the accused, extends only to the existence of the relation and to the degree thereof.

If related to the prosecutrix within the prohibited degree, the law declares the disqualification. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court erred in refusing the new trial upon this ground of the motion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari ¶68—Petition for certiorari properly overruled when evidence supported verdict.

There being evidence to support the verdict rendered in the municipal court, the judge of the superior court did not err in overruling the petition for certiorari, which complained of the verdict only upon the grounds that it was contrary to law and without evidence to support it.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by W. B. Gresham against Sol Rubin. Judgment for defendant and petition for certiorari overruled by the superior court, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Neufolille & Neufolille, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

STEPHENS, J. Rubin contracted with Flury to purchase from Flury a described "house and lot completely furnished," and contracted with Gresham, a real estate broker who negotiated the sale, to pay Gresham's commission in the event that he (Rubin) should wrongfully fail to comply with the contract to purchase. Rubin refused to complete the purchase and also refused to pay Gresham's commission. Upon being sued by Gresham for the commission, Rubin contended that he did not owe it, since he had not wrongfully failed to comply with his contract with Flury, but had been prevented from so doing by reason of Flury's breach of contract in refusing to deliver all the household furniture included in the terms of the contract. This was controverted by Gresham. There was evidence in support of each of these contentions. There was a further issue of fact as to whether Rubin refused to comply with his contract with Flury, upon the ground that Flury would not deliver all the household furniture. The verdict was for the defendant; the plaintiff's petition for certiorari, based upon the general grounds only, was overruled; and to this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

It is not necessary to add anything further to what is said in the headnote.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Continuance ¶19—Denial because of defendant's absence when not accounted for not abuse of discretion though third person's rights prejudiced.

In the absence of any legal showing demanding a continuance upon the ground of the absence of a party to the case, as required by Civil Code 1910, § 5717, this court cannot hold that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to grant a motion to continue, made by the defendant's counsel, upon the ground of the defendant's absence, when upon the hearing on the motion the defendant's absence could in no wise be accounted for, and it affirmatively appeared that he had received actual notice of the time and place of trial. This is true even though the rights of a third person not a party to the record might be prejudiced by the defendant's failure to appear and defend the case when certain property belonging to the defendant, which might be subjected to a judgment in behalf of the plaintiff, might, in the event the defendant prevailed, inure to the benefit of such third person and satisfy a judgment which the latter might obtain in a suit which he has pending against the defendant.

VEAL v. STATE. (No. 12515.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 26, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §595(10)—Denial of continuance on ground that testimony of absent witness would not be admissible held not an abuse of discretion.

The defendant was charged with an assault and battery, and he made a motion for a continuance of the case on the ground of the absence of a material witness. Upon the hearing of the motion the defendant testified that he expected to prove by the absent witness that a few days before the assault he (the witness) saw the prosecutor pass the defendant and "throw his hand on his pistol," and that he also, prior to the difficulty, heard the prosecutor threaten to kill the defendant. It was not shown, however, that the menacing movement of the prosecutor was seen by the defendant or the threat heard by him, or that he had been informed of either before the assault and battery was committed. The court denied the continuance, holding that the evidence would not be admissible if the witness were present. This judgment was excepted to on the following grounds:

The evidence of the absent witness would have tended strongly to illustrate the motive with which the defendant acted at the time of the difficulty.

Because the ruling of the court was tantamount to declaring that the defendant could not show the previous conduct of the prosecutor as illustrating the necessity on his part for doing something in his defense at the time of the difficulty, when the prosecutor attempted to draw his pistol on the defendant.

Because the ruling of the court was tantamount to declaring that any evidence as to the previous relation between the parties was not admissible, thereby shutting the defendant off from offering any testimony except his own statement going to show that the conduct of the prosecutor at the time of the difficulty was such as to reasonably justify the defendant in apprehending serious bodily injury and to furnish a justification for the assault and battery administered to the prosecutor.

Held, it does not appear that the court, for any reason assigned, abused its discretion in denying the continuance.

2. Instructions not erroneous.

None of the instructions complained of, when considered in connection with the rest of the charge of the court and the facts of the case, show reversible error.

3. Criminal law §1064(4)—Ground of motion for new trial did not raise question, where it did not show to whom excluded testimony referred.

A ground of the motion for a new trial complains that on cross-examination of a named witness the court, upon motion of the state, excluded the following testimony: "I have not plotted to kill him, nor made any remarks that I was going to." The ground does not disclose what person the pronoun "him" refers to, and an examination of the brief of evidence would be necessary to ascertain this fact. Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, that a ground of a motion for a new trial will not be considered unless it is complete and understandable within itself, this ground is too indefinite and incomplete to raise any question for determination by this court.

4. Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly denied when verdict demanded.

The verdict was demanded by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

A petition in trover describes the property in the possession of the defendants as "$2,500 in lawful money which was deposited with said defendants, it being the said $2,500 which was delivered to said defendants by petitioner on or about the 5th day of November, 1919, and to be returned to your petitioner when said defendants[?] should request the same," and alleges that "the said defendants converted said money and have failed and refused to deliver said money to your petitioners on demand," and "refuse to pay the hire thereof, which is 7 per cent. per annum from the time of the conversion." A further description of the property was added by amendment as follows: "Twenty-five hundred dollars in lawful money of the United States and legal tender for all debts on the 2d day of April, 1920, and said property, to wit, $2,500, was and is the said sum of $2,500 which went into the possession of the defendants named in this suit on the 5th day of November, 1919, and was by the defendants to be deposited in the Farmers' State Bank, located in Lumpkin, Ga., and to be returned to plaintiffs after 90 days from November 5, 1919, when called for by the plaintiffs, and plaintiffs aver that the same was deposited in the Farmers' State Bank, which the said defendants agreed to do." Held, the description of the property for which a recovery is sought is too vague and indefinite, and the judgment sustaining a demurrer on this ground was proper. McElhannon v. July 26, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)*

1. Jury  $\S$  67(2)—Nominal interest of sheriff as prosecutor not ground for challenge to the array.

The challenge to the array of jurors put upon the defendant is without merit, since it does not appear that the sheriff, who performed the mere ministerial act of summoning the jury, had more than a nominal interest in appearing as prosecutor upon the indictment.

2. Criminal law  $\S$  1172(9)—Instruction as to recommending punishment as for a misdemeanor not harmful to defendant.

No error harmful to the defendant was shown by the assignment of error upon the instruction of the court that if the jury saw fit to do so they could find the defendant guilty, and recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and, if the judge should approve the recommendation, he would be punished as for a misdemeanor.

MARTIN & LANIER PAINT CO. v. DANIELS. (No. 12517.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. July 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  1040(13) — New trial not granted for error in overruling demurrers from which no injury resulted.

A new trial will not be granted for error in overruling special demurrers to the amended answer where it appears with reasonable certainty that no injury resulted.

2. Evidence  $\S$  185(1)—Carbon copies admissible without notice to produce; "copies."

Duplicate or carbon copies of letters made by the same pencil at the same time are not "copies," but duplicate originals, and could be introduced in evidence without notice to produce.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Copy.]

3. Evidence  $\S$  187 — Letters admissible notwithstanding affidavits on notice to produce stating the letters were not received.

Where, in response to notice to produce certain letters claimed to have been mailed to plaintiff, affidavits of all of the members of the firm stating that no such letters were ever received were read, such affidavits were not admissible evidence on the trial, and where they were not put in evidence they were properly disregarded in passing on the admissibility of duplicates of the letters.

4. Sales  $\S$  340, 358(1)—Remedy for countermand of order is suit for breach; letter countermanding order held admissible, though order not subject to countermand.

Though an order for goods was not subject to countermand, a letter countermanding it was admissible in a suit on an open account, since if the order was in fact countermanded, the seller's remedy was by suit for breach of the contract, and not by action on open account.

Error from City Court of Blakely; A. H. Gray, Judge.

Action by the Martin & Lanier Paint Company against J. B. Daniels. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. L. Smith, of Edison, for plaintiff in error.

B. W. Fortson, of Arlington, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. 1. The court did not err in allowing the amendment to the defendant's answer.

2. The amended answer was not subject to general demurrer.

[1] 3. Conceding that the court erred in overruling some of the special demurrers interposed to the amended answer, it appears with reasonable certainty from the facts of the case that no injury resulted to the plaintiff in error, and therefore a new trial will not be granted because of such errors. See, in this connection, Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co. v. Vaughan, 9 Ga. App. 371(5), 71 S. E. 691.

4. Upon the call of the case for trial, counsel for the plaintiff company, in response to a notice from the defendant to produce certain letters alleged to have been mailed to the plaintiff, read affidavits from all the partners of the plaintiff company showing that no such letters had ever been received by them or the company. Subsequently, upon the trial, the defendant was permitted, over the plaintiff's objection, to prove that he had written such letters to the plaintiff company, and had properly addressed and stamped the envelopes and placed them in the post office; that his return address was upon the envelopes, and that the letters had never been returned to him; that the letters which he (the defendant) held in his hands were duplicate or carbon copies of the letters mailed to the plaintiff company—that they were made by the same pencil at the same time. The plaintiff objected to this evidence, and also to the introduction of the letters themselves, on the grounds that the originals of the letters had not been sufficiently accounted for to authorize the introduction of secondary evidence, and that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, since the uncontradicted affidavits of all the members of the plaintiff company, which were read in response to the notice to produce the letters, showed that the letters had never been received by the company, and therefore the presumption that they had been received was completely rebutted. Another ground of objection to one of the letters was that it countermanded the order for the goods in question, which order was not subject to countermand. These grounds were properly overruled, for the following reasons:

[2] First, the letters admitted in evidence were not copies, but were "duplicate originals," and could have been introduced in evidence without any notice "to produce." Bowman & Tarpley v. Atlantic Ice & Coal Co., 19 Ga. App. 115(2), 117, 91 S. E. 215, and citations.

[3] Second, the affidavits of the members of the plaintiff company, read in response to the notice to produce, were not admissible evidence, and were not put in evidence during the trial of the case, and were properly disregarded by the court.

[4] Third, the fact that one of the letters countermanded the order which was not subject to countermand did not render the letter inadmissible. The plaintiff was suing upon an open account, and while the order for the goods sold provided that it was not subject to countermand, yet if the defendant did in fact countermand it before the goods were shipped, while this would not relieve him from liability, the plaintiff could not maintain an action upon an open account for goods sold and delivered, but would have to sue for a breach of the contract.

5. The evidence authorized a finding that the goods shipped to the defendant were not the goods ordered by him, and the verdict in his favor was supported by the evidence, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

LACEY v. FOREHAND. (No. 12312.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Master and servant §301(1), 332(1)—Parent and child §13(1)—Evidence held to make question for jury whether son was engaged in father's business when driving car; parent not liable for child's torts unless his agent; relation may arise by implication; "business."

A minor son, while driving an automobile belonging to his father, collided with and damaged the automobile of the plaintiff. The evidence presented an issue for the jury as to whether at the time of the accident the son was acting, expressly or by implication, for his father and within the scope of his father's business. The judgment of nonsuit was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Business.]

Error from City Court of Oglethorpe; R. L. Greer, Judge.

Action by J. H. Lacey against T. C. Forehand. Judgment of nonsuit, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jere M. Moore and John B. Guerry, both of Montezuma, for plaintiff in error.

Gilbert C. Robinson, of Montezuma, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This case is here on exceptions to a judgment awarding a nonsuit. The facts, substantially stated, are as follows: The defendant was the owner of an automobile. He could not drive it himself, but his wife and his son, 18 years of age, when the defendant desired to use the car in his general business, acted as his chauffeur, driving the car for him; and his business included his "going to town with his wife or son driving or attending to his business." This car, while being driven by his son, collided with the plaintiff's car, causing the injuries for which the suit was brought. The collision occurred while the car was coming from the town of Montezuma to the defendant's home, about 3½ miles away. The son had been away from home and was on his way back home. The defendant did not know that his son was returning home, and was absent himself from home at the time. His wife, who did know that the son was returning home that night, took the car in question to Montezuma for the purpose of meeting the son and bringing him home, and when returning home she turned the car over to him to drive home, sitting by his side on the front seat. There were other companions with the son, riding in the car. While the defendant did not know that the son was coming home that night, he recognized that it was his duty as parent to have him brought home from Montezuma, and that the use of the car by his wife for the purposes stated, while without his knowledge, was "all right," and it was "all right" for his son to drive the car on the occasion in question. At the conclusion of the evidence a nonsuit was granted on the ground that the relation of master and servant, or of principal and agent, between the father and the son did not prima facie appear so as to create a liability against the father for the tort of the son. It is well established that such a relationship must appear in order to create a liability for the tort of a minor child.

The controlling question in this case is fully and exhaustively considered by the Supreme Court in the case of Griffin v. Russell, 144 Ga. 275, 87 S. E. 10, L. R. A. 1916F, 216, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 994. In that case Justice Lumpkin, speaking for the court, stated that "it may be taken as settled law in this state that a father is not liable for the tort of a minor child, with which he was in no way connected, which he did not ratify, and from which he did not derive any benefit, merely because of the relation of parent and child," and that ruling is in accord with the decisions of this court in the cases of Schumer v. Register, 12 Ga. App. 743, 78 S. E. 731, and Quinn v. Neal, 19 Ga. App. 484, 91 S. E. 786. Although these decisions of this court may seem to conflict with that of the Supreme Court, supra, a careful consideration of the facts of the cases shows that the conflict is simply apparent; the cases are distinguishable on the facts, and the legal conclusions are entirely harmonious. These decisions are also in harmony with the decisions of other courts involving the same question. Any seeming conflicts in the decisions arise from differences in construing and applying the rule that a master is liable for the negligence of the servant only when the servant is "acting in the scope of his employment"; there being some differences in the opinions as to what was an act within the scope of the servant's employment, or what was an act in regard to the master's business, and what was comprehended by the term "business." The relation of agent or servant frequently arises by implication as well as expressly. As stated in Civil Code 1910, § 3569:

"The relation of principal and agent arises wherever one person, expressly or by implication, authorizes another to act for him, or subsequently ratifies the acts of another in his behalf."

The word "business" is commonly employed in connection with an occupation for livelihood or profit, but it is not limited to such pursuits. And the fact that an agency is not a business agency, or the service of a servant or minor child is not remunerative service, does not illustrate the question as to liability devolving upon the master or parent for the tort of either the servant or the minor child. In the case of Griffin v. Russell, supra, the Supreme Court extended this relationship of agency to apply to the act of a parent who had furnished an automobile for the comfort and pleasure of himself and family. Some of the cases cited by Justice Lumpkin, in his exhaustive review of the question in that case throw considerable light on the question now under consideration by this court and make a very wide and elastic application of the relationship or agency which must exist between the parent and child or master and servant, in order to give rise to a liability on the part of the former for the tort of the latter.

In Lashbrook v. Patten, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 316, a minor son, while driving his two sisters to a picnic in his father's carriage, drawn by his father's horses, and with his father's approbation, all of the children being members of his father's family, through negligence ran against the carriage of another, causing damage. The Court of Appeals said:

"The son must be regarded as in the father's employment, discharging a duty usually performed by a slave, and therefore must, for the purposes of this suit, be regarded as his father's servant."

In the case of Stowe v. Morris, 147 Ky. 386, 144 S. W. 52, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 224, a motorcar was kept by a man for the comfort and pleasure of his family, including a minor son and a daughter as members of it. They had the right to use it as often as and when they liked. On the occasion in question the son took the car at his own volition, and at his suggestion carried his sister and three other ladies for a ride. While he was driving the machine he carelessly ran down and injured a boy on a bicycle. The father was held liable on the ground that, the machine having been provided for the comfort and pleasure of the family, and the son having been given the right to use it, the son was to be treated as the servant of his father when operating it (though without a special permission on that occasion) for the entertainment of his sister and her friends, and in the use of the car for that purpose the son was not performing an independent service of his own, but was carrying out what, within the spirit of the matter, was the business of the father. See, also, the case of McNeal v. McKain, 33 Okl. 449, 126 Pac. 742, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 775, and the case of Birch v. Abercrombie, 74 Wash. 486, 133 Pac. 1020, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 59. In the latter case the court in its opinion said:

"It seems too plain for cavil that a father, who furnishes a vehicle for the customary conveyance of the members of his family, makes their conveyance by that vehicle his affair—that is, his business—and any one driving the vehicle for that purpose with his consent, express or implied, whether a member of his family or another, is his agent."

Other decisions on the same line are cited by Justice Lumpkin in Griffin v. Russell, supra. The conclusion which is arrived at—and we think it is a sound one—is that the scope of the employment is necessarily dependent on the circumstances, and that no hard and fast rule can be laid down, but that it is ordinarily a question for the jury whether or not a particular act falls within the scope of the servant's employment or that of a minor child.

In the present case the facts admitted by the defendant show that the bringing of his minor son home was regarded by him as a part of his parental duty, and for that purpose he made the furnishing of the automobile his affair; in other words, it was the means which he adopted for the performance of his duty. His wife, according to the evidence, was authorized to use the car whenever she desired. This, it would seem, would give her an implied permission to take the car and go to Montezuma for the purpose of bringing the son home. In that act she was acting as an agent of her husband, and in allowing the son to drive the car she did not extend her agency beyond its legitimate scope. Considering this fact, in connection with the testimony of the father that both the son and the wife were permitted to use the car whenever they desired it, the conclusion inevitably follows that the son, on the occasion in question, in driving the car home, was fully authorized to do so, if not expressly on that occasion, yet by implication; and we conclude that these facts should have been submitted to the jury, in order that it might be determined whether or not the son was, on the occasion in question, engaged in the business of his father.

Judgment reversed.

CHANCE v. STATE. (No. 12526.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law  $\S$ 998 — Rule on motion to set aside judgment properly denied because motion not directed to anything apparent on face of record.

As the motion to set aside the judgment in this case was not predicated on a defect apparent on the face of the record, the trial judge properly refused to grant the rule nisi prayed for.

Error from City Court of Carrollton; Leon Hood, Judge.

M. B. Chance was convicted of an offense, and his motion to set aside the judgment was denied, and he brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 106 S. E. 920.

The bill of exceptions in this case states that—

"The defendant was tried and convicted on June 14, 1920, and sentenced to pay a fine of $300 or serve 6 months in the county chain gang. Motion for new trial was filed, which was dismissed for failure of defendant to file a brief of evidence. The defendant then filed an extraordinary motion for new trial, which was also dismissed for the reason that defendant had failed to file a brief of evidence. Defendant then filed a motion or presented same to the court, asking that the judgment and sentence of the court in said case be set aside, on the ground that the accusation was drawn under section 722 of Park's Ann. Penal Code, and that the evidence adduced on the trial showed that, if the defendant was guilty of anything at all, he would be guilty under section 723a of Park's Ann. Penal Code; the defendant asking that a rule nisi be granted, directed to the solicitor of the city court of Carrollton, to show cause why said judgment should not be set aside. Upon the motion's being presented to the judge of the city court of Carrollton, he refused to grant said rule nisi, and passed the following order: 'The within motion to set aside judgment having been presented to me, and after considering same, it is ordered, considered, and adjudged that the rule nisi prayed for be and the same is denied. This May 13, 1921. Leon Hood, J. C. O. C.'"

Smith & Millican, of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). In Spence v. State, 7 Ga. App. 826, 68 S. E. 444, Chief Judge Hill said:

"A motion in arrest of judgment will reach any defect apparent on the face of the record, not cured by the verdict, to which a general demurrer could have been successfully interposed before arraignment. It is also proper procedure where the verdict is for some offense not covered by the charge made in the indictment. As used in this connection, the expression 'the face of the record' means, in a criminal case, the indictment and the verdict; a defect on the face of the record exists when there is any inadequacy in the allegations, not cured by the verdict, or where the verdict does not conform to the charge in the indictment. It is not, in our opinion, broad enough to reach the charge of the court or the brief of the evidence. These are parts of the record subsequent to the trial; and if the verdict is contrary to the charge of the court for any reason, or contrary to law for any reason, or is without evidence to support it, it is ground for a new trial, and not for arrest of judgment."

In Regopoulos v. State, 116 Ga. 596, 42 S. E. 1015, Justice Cobb said:

"It has been repeatedly held by this court that a motion to set aside a judgment must be based upon some defect which appears on the face of the record"—citing Dugan v. McGlann, 60 Ga. 353; Pulliam v. Dillard, 71 Ga. 598; Artope v. Barker, 74 Ga. 462; Clark's Cove Guano Co. v. Steed, 92 Ga. 440, 17 S. E. 967; Mize v. Americus Mfg. Co., 109 Ga. 359, 34 S. E. 583.

In the Regopoulos Case, Justice Cobb further said (116 Ga. p. 598, 42 S. E. 1015):

"It seems to be now settled, so far as the rulings of this court are concerned, that the only difference between a motion in arrest of judgment and a motion to set aside a judgment is as to the time within which each must be made. The former must be made during the term at which the judgment was rendered; and the latter may be made at any time within three years from the rendition of the judgment."

As the motion to set aside the judgment in this case was not predicated on a defect apparent on the face of the record, the trial judge properly refused to grant the rule nisi prayed for, and the judgment must be affirmed.

SOUTHERN WOOD PRESERVING CO. v. STRAIN. (No. 11826.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Aug. 3, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Sales ¶33—Accepted order amounts to valid contract.

A request to furnish goods upon certain terms as to price, time, and place of delivery, which is accepted by the party to whom it is directed, constitutes a valid contract, containing an implied promise by the party making the request to accept and pay for the goods when delivered upon the terms named, and a promise by the party accepting the offer to make deliveries upon the terms named.

2. Sales ¶411—Petition held to allege sufficiently that contract was executed by plaintiff.

Where, in a suit upon a contract evidenced by a written memorandum (attached to the petition as an exhibit) which does not purport to be signed by the plaintiff, there is an allegation in the petition that the plaintiff was one of the parties to the contract, the petition sufficiently alleges that the contract was executed by the plaintiff.

3. Sales ¶411, 418(2)—Measure of damages for breach stated; petition construed as alleging amount sued for was difference between contract price and market value.

The measure of damages for a breach of a contract of sale of personalty is the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place for delivery. In a suit by the purchaser against the seller for a breach of contract of sale of lumber, an allegation in the petition that the amount sued for represents the difference between the contract price "and the price which petitioner had to pay for the lumber" will be treated as an allegation that the amount sued for was the difference between the contract price and the market value.

4. Pleading ¶8(7)—Sales ¶411—Petition in action for seller's breach held to state cause of action; paragraph held not to allege mere conclusions, and not demurrable for failure to give dates; allegation that by reason of seller's breach buyer was forced to buy other lumber not a conclusion; paragraph not demurrable for failure to allege when or from whom other lumber purchased; allegation as to plaintiff's loss held not a conclusion; paragraph not demurrable for failure to allege particulars of orders which buyer had; allegation that amount sued for was difference between contract price and amount paid others not a conclusion.

The petition set out a cause of action, and was good against the general and special demurrers interposed. The trial judge erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

"Southern Wood Preserving Company, Creosoting and Wood Block Paving. Order. Atlanta, Ga., 10-1-17. Placed with E. E. Strain, Hill City, Ga. Please furnish us the following material at prices stated below per M. f. o. b. cars Tunnell Hill, Ga., or other places equal or less frt. rate. Ship to Atlanta, Ga. Delivery start at once—complete sixty days. 10 cars [described], $16.50. Accepted 10/1/17. [Signed] E. E. Strain. J. N. Jones."

The petition alleges:

"(5) Under said contract, said defendant E. E. Strain, was to furnish petitioner 10 carloads of lumber, which amount to 100,000 feet, of the kind and quality stated in Exhibit A at the price of $16.50 per M. board feet.

"(6) Said defendant furnished to petitioner on said order and acceptance thereof, only 7,785 feet, leaving a balance due on the order of 92,215 feet of lumber.

"(7) Said defendant failed and refused to furnish said balance of 92,215 feet of lumber, and has breached and violated his said contract by such failure and has continued to fail to comply with said contract, although repeatedly requested by petitioner to comply therewith.

"(8) By reason of said defendant's failure to furnish said balance of 92,215 feet of lumber, petitioner was forced to purchase other lumber to take the place of lumber which defendant agreed to furnish petitioner.

"(9) In rebuying said lumber which was made necessary by failure of said defendant to fill his said contract, petitioner was forced to buy 92,215 feet of lumber at an advance of $8.50 per M. board feet; said 92,215 feet of lumber costing petitioner $783.83 over and above the purchase price from defendant, which is the actual loss sustained by petitioner by reason of defendant's breach of and failure to carry out the terms of said contract and to furnish said lumber.

"(10) By reason of said breach and failure, petitioner sustained an actual loss and damage of $783.83 principal, on which petitioner is entitled to interest at 7 per cent. per annum from December 10th, 1917.

"(11) Petitioner further shows that defendant knew that petitioner was engaged in the manufacture of lumber in various forms and kinds of material for sale for use in the commercial and industrial world, and knew said lumber was purchased by petitioner for such use and for such purpose.

"(12) When defendant failed and refused to perform his said contract with petitioner, and failed and refused to deliver balance of said lumber, petitioner was thereby compelled to buy other lumber to take its place, and to fill orders which petitioner had accepted for material, which orders could only be filled by petitioner by rebuying lumber, which defendant had failed to deliver. Petitioner did so buy, using all diligence in the purchase thereof.

"(13) Said sum of $783.83 herein sued for represents and is the difference between the contract price at which defendant agreed to furnish said lumber to petitioner and the price which petitioner had to pay for the lumber petitioner was forced by defendant's breach of said contract to buy to take the place of the lumber which defendant had contracted and agreed to furnish, but failed to furnish."

Judgment for $783.83 and interest is prayed for.

The demurrer was on the following grounds:

"(1) Because under the facts alleged plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

"(2) Because no cause of action is alleged against defendant in plaintiff's petition.

"(3) Because the contract sued upon is unilateral, wanting in mutuality, in that plaintiff does not agree to receive and pay for the lumber when delivered as per the contract.

"(4) Because the measure of damages under the contract as sued for are not recoverable; the measure of damages under the facts alleged being the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery on the date of the breach of contract. And the damages sued for cannot be measured by profits of a contract of resale, in the absence of an allegation that the seller, that is the defendant, at the time of making the contract of sale, had notice of such contract of resale. That is, that plaintiff had purchased the lumber for the purpose of filling contracts made on the date of the making of the contract sued upon.

"(5) Because under the facts as alleged plaintiff was not authorized to go into the market and buy lumber and charge defendant with the price thereof, in the absence of an allegation that defendant knew at the time of making of the alleged contract that plaintiff had sold the lumber, the prices for which plaintiff had sold it, and to whom plaintiff had sold it, and the profit plaintiff would realize by the sale of the lumber. In the absence of such allegations, the measure of plaintiff's damages would be the difference in the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery when the contract was breached.

"(6) Defendant demurs specially to paragraph 7 of plaintiff's petition because the date defendant is alleged to have failed and refused to furnish the balance of said lumber is not alleged. Nor is the date alleged that plaintiff requested defendant to comply therewith. The allegations of this paragraph being mere conclusions, the facts with reference to what is attempted to be alleged should be given.

"(7) Defendant demurs specially to paragraph 8 of plaintiff's petition because what is therein attempted to be alleged is a mere conclusion.

"(8) Defendant demurs specially to paragraph 9 of plaintiff's petition because it is not alleged from whom plaintiff purchased said lumber, the time it was purchased, and because the facts as alleged incorrectly state the measure of damages plaintiff can recover, if anything.

"(9) Defendant demurs specially to paragraph 10 of plaintiff's petition because what is attempted to be alleged are mere conclusions. The facts with reference to what is alleged should be stated.

"(10) Defendant demurs specially to paragraph 12 of plaintiff's petition because the date when defendant failed and refused to perform the alleged contract is not alleged. The date when defendant failed and refused to deliver the balance of said lumber is not alleged. It is not alleged where and from whom and the date petitioner purchased other lumber to take the place of that alleged to have been purchased from defendant. Nor is it alleged from whom petitioner had taken orders, from whom orders had been accepted, the date of such orders, the amounts thereof. Nor is it alleged why plaintiff could not fill said orders without rebuying lumber. The facts attempted to be alleged in this paragraph being mere conclusions.

"(11) Defendant demurs specially to paragraph 13 of plaintiff's petition because what is alleged therein are mere conclusions. It is not alleged in this paragraph, or elsewhere in the petition, from whom petitioner bought said alleged lumber, the date it was bought, the amount bought from each party, if there was more than one. The facts with reference thereto should be definitely and specifically alleged so as to put the defendant upon his defense."

TOWNSEND v. STATE. (No. 12543.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
July 28, 1921.)

(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

1. Criminal law §108½—Assignments of error not considered, when allegations not verified by judge's answer.

On review of a judgment on certiorari, an assignment of error in the petition for certiorari based upon the admission of specified testimony cannot be considered, where the allegations of the petition as to the admission of such testimony were not verified by the trial judge's answer.

2. Criminal law §1178—Reference to certiorari for statement of complaint not sufficient argument of assignment of error.

On review of a judgment on certiorari, an assignment of error in the petition for certiorari complaining of the admission of testimony will be treated as abandoned, when not argued in the brief for plaintiff in error, though the brief refers to the certiorari for a statement of the complaint under such assignment.

3. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  1172(1)—inadvertent reference to wrong statute harmless.

On a trial under Pen. Code 1910, § 703, relative to false representations of respectability, wealth, etc., the inadvertent statement in the charge that defendant was being tried under section 719, relative to other deceitful means, etc., was harmless, where the evidence demanded conviction under section 703, and the charge called the jury's attention to the various allegations, and required all of them to be proved, and charged solely on such allegations, and did not refer to any other deceitful means or artful practices covered by section 719.

4. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  828—Instruction in precise language of statute should be requested, if desired.

Where the court substantially instructed the jury as to the elements of the offense charged, if the precise words of the statute on which the prosecution was based (Pen. Code 1910, § 703) were desired, a timely written request therefor should have been presented.

Luke, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Samuel Townsend was convicted of fraudulent representations. Certiorari was overruled by the superior court, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Sims & Howard, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

John A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., Roy Dorsey, and E. A. Stephens, all of Atlanta, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. 1. The court did not err in overruling all the grounds of the demurrer interposed to the accusation.

[1] 2. The fourth assignment of error in the petition for certiorari is based upon the admission of specified testimony. The allegations in the petition as to the admission of this testimony are not verified by the answer of the trial judge, and therefore the assignment of error cannot be considered.

[2] 3. The third assignment of error in the petition for certiorari (complaining of the admission of certain testimony) is not argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, and therefore is treated as abandoned. The mere statement in the brief, that "for other assignments of error we respectfully refer to the certiorari as a clear statement of complaints as we could make here," cannot be considered as an argument. See, in this connection, O'Neal v. State, 24 Ga. App. 335 (1), 100 S. E. 787, and citations.

[3, 4] 4. The accusation was based upon section 703 of the Penal Code, which makes it a misdemeanor for any person, by false representations of his own respectability, wealth, etc., to obtain a credit from some other person and thereby defraud him of any money or other valuable thing. Section 719 of the Penal Code provides that—

"Any person using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned in this Code, by which an individual, or a firm, or a corporation, or the public is defrauded and cheated, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor."

The judge, in the beginning of his charge, read section 719, and inadvertently stated to the jury that the defendant was being tried under that section. This error, however, was harmless, for the following reasons: First, the evidence demanded the defendant's conviction under section 703 of the Penal Code; and second, the judge in his charge specifically called the jury's attention to the various allegations in the accusation, and instructed them, in substance, that all of those averments must be proved by the state, beyond a reasonable doubt, before the defendant could be convicted, and furthermore, the court charged solely upon the allegations of the accusation, and did not refer at all to any other "deceitful means or artful practice." Under these circumstances no jury of ordinary intelligence could have been misled or confused by the inadvertent statement of the court as above set forth. The only case cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error to sustain their contention that this error of the court was harmful is Ratteree v. State, 77 Ga. 774. In that case, however, the trial judge in his charge wholly ignored the offense as set forth in the accusation, and because of that error, and also because, as stated by the Supreme Court, "the evidence and indictment did not correspond, and * * * neither is sufficient to uphold the conviction" (italics ours), the case was sent back for a new trial. In the instant case the judge in his charge specifically and fully instructed the jury upon the offense as set forth in the accusation, and the evidence and the accusation corresponded perfectly, and both were amply sufficient to uphold the verdict of guilty.

[4] 5. There is no merit in the assignment of error that the judge failed in his charge to read section 703 of the Penal Code. The court substantially instructed the jury as to the elements of the offense charged, and, if the precise words of the statute were desired, a timely written request therefor should have been presented.

6. The verdict was demanded by the evidence, and the judge of the superior court properly overruled the certiorari.

Judgment affirmed.

BLOODWORTH, J., concurs.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I think that the third assignment of error in the petition for certiorari was sufficiently argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error to warrant a consideration thereof by this court; and, in my opinion, the ruling complained of therein was reversible error. Moreover, I cannot agree that the court did not commit error in charging the jury, for the following reason: The accusation charged the defendant with violating section 703 of the Penal Code. This section refers to cheating and swindling by false representations as to one's wealth, etc., and, in my opinion, it was error for the court to instruct the jury that the defendant was charged with a violation of section 719 of the Penal Code, which declares that—

"Any person using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned in this Code, by which an individual, or a firm, or a corporation, or the public is defrauded and cheated, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor" (italics mine).

Neither can I concur with the ruling of the majority that the evidence demanded the defendant's conviction, and, for the reasons stated above, it is my judgment that a new trial should result.

M. S. CORNETT & CO. v. NEWSOME.
(No. 12309.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 719(1,4)—Exceptions pendente lite not considered, when error not assigned thereon; overruling of demurrer not considered without assignment of error.

Exceptions pendente lite (although duly allowed and ordered filed as a part of the record), upon which no assignment of error is made in the main bill of exceptions, and upon which no assignment of error is made before the argument of the case before this court, will not be considered.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$ 702(1) — Portions of charge not considered, when entire charge not in record.

Isolated and incomplete portions of the charge excepted to cannot be intelligently considered, in the absence of the entire charge, unless the portion of the charge excepted to is without qualification and is inherently erroneous.

3. Sales  $\S$ 479(10)—Conditional sale rescinded and canceled by retaking property and not giving buyer credit.

Where, under a contract of sale, property has been sold and delivered to the buyer, and when the debt matures the buyer fails or refuses to pay it, and the seller thereupon retakes possession of the property, without authority under the contract itself or from the maker, and holds it as his own, and does not sell the property or give to the buyer any credit on the debt for its value, the retaking of the property operates as a complete rescission and cancellation of the contract of sale.

Error from City Court of Sandersville; W. M. Goodwin, Judge.

Proceeding by M. S. Cornett & Co. against D. S. Newsome. To the affidavit of foreclosure defendant filed counterclaim. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Cornett & Co. sold to Newsome a pair of mules, to which they retained title by a conditional bill of sale to the mules. As additional security, in the same instrument Cornett & Co. took from Newsome a mortgage covering another pair of mules belonging to Newsome. This instrument was in the usual form, and, as to the two mules sold to Newsome, gave to the seller, upon default in payment, no option to retake without legal process the two mules in question. As to the mortgage on the other two mules, the right to retake by the seller upon default was given in the instrument. Newsome failed to pay part of the purchase price of the two mules on maturity of the obligation in question, and, in the absence of Newsome from home, and without legal process, Cornett & Co. sent to Newsome's farm and took possession of these two mules, and they subsequently sold the mules for their own benefit, giving to Newsome no credit on the instrument for the amount of the purchase price. Subsequently Cornett & Co. foreclosed the instrument in question as a mortgage, alleging that the entire amount of the principal and interest was due, and the mortgage fi. fa. was levied upon the two mules belonging to Newsome and covered by the mortgage. To the affidavit of foreclosure Newsome filed a counteraffidavit, denying any indebtedness and setting up a rescission of the contract by reason of the retaking and selling by Cornett & Co. of the two mules to which title had been retained.

On the trial Cornett & Co. admitted the retaking and contended that it was with the consent of Newsome and under an express agreement. This was denied by Newsome, who alleged that the retaking was without his consent and without his knowledge, and he asserted that the plaintiffs sent to his home and took the mules without lawful authority, and disposed of them without his consent, and that he had protested against the unlawful retaking. The trial court submitted to the jury the question of rescission, and the jury found in favor of the defendant. The plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case is before this court on exceptions to that judgment. In the motion for a new trial error is assigned upon an extract from the charge of the court, the movant complaining generally that this excerpt was not sufficient to furnish any "comprehensive idea" of the issues as submitted to the jury by the court. The charge as a whole is not a part of the record in the case. The plaintiffs filed also a demurrer to the defendant's counter affidavit to the foreclosure proceeding, the demurrer was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite to this ruling were allowed and ordered filed as a part of the record, but in the main bill of exceptions no assignment of error is made as to this judgment, and no assignment of error on the exceptions pendente lite was made in this court.

Evans & Evans, of Sandersville, for plaintiff in error.

Jordan & Harris, of Sandersville, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. The main bill of exceptions fails to show any assignment of error upon the judgment overruling the demurrer, nor does the record show any assignment upon the exceptions pendente lite complaining of that judgment. In the absence of such assignment of error, this court cannot consider the question made on the judgment overruling the demurrer. Tift v. Shiver & Aultman, 24 Ga. App. 638, 102 S. E. 47; Campbell v. State, 24 Ga. App. 138, 100 S. E. 30; Smiley v. Smiley, 144 Ga. 546, 87 S. E. 668.

[2] 2. In the absence of the entire charge of the trial court, this court cannot intelligently pass upon the isolated fragment of the charge specified, and will not consider such detached portion, unless the portion of the charge excepted to is without qualification and is inherently erroneous. Central R. R. v. Senn, 73 Ga. 706; Mixon v. State, 15 Ga. App. 252, 82 S. E. 935; Mills v. State, 133 Ga. 156, 65 S. E. 368.

[3] 3. The main question in the case is whether or not the facts submitted to the jury were sufficient to support the defense set up, that the retaking of the two mules by the sellers without authority, and the appropriation of the proceeds thereof to their own use, amounted in law to a rescission of the contract of sale and to a legal cancellation of the contract. The general proposition is well established that, when property has been sold and delivered to the buyer under a contract of sale, and when the debt has matured, the buyer has refused or failed to pay the debt, and the seller thereupon retakes possession of the property and holds it as his own, or disposes of it for his benefit, and does not give to the buyer any credit on the debt for its value, the retaking of the property operates as a complete rescission and cancellation of the contract of sale. This principle is thus stated by the Supreme Court:

"When an election is made to take the property itself, and it has been recovered by the plaintiff, this is a rescission of the contract of purchase, and no subsequent action can be had for any further recovery." Glisson v. Heggie, 105 Ga. 34, 31 S. E. 118.

In the case of Pannell v. McGarity, 107 S. E. 352, the court held, in effect, that where the contract of sale contains a provision that if the note is not paid at maturity the vendor is authorized to repossess himself of the property, to sell it for cash at public outcry, and to credit the proceeds from the sale on the note, this principle is not applicable, and the vendor can also bring suit in trover for the sole purpose of obtaining possession of the property in order that he might sell it and credit the proceeds of the sale on the purchase money note.

There is a great distinction between the case just cited and the facts of the one under consideration. Here no such election was provided for in the contract of purchase, nor did the sellers retake the property and sell it, and apply the proceeds as a credit on the purchase-money note; but, on the contrary, they retook possession of the property without authority and applied it for their own benefit, subsequently bringing a foreclosure suit for the full amount of the note.

We think the present case is controlled in principle by the decision of the Supreme Court in Glisson v. Heggie, supra, and that the conduct of the sellers, in retaking the property and in selling it without authority and without giving to the buyer the benefit of the sale, amounted in law to a full rescission and cancellation of the contract of sale, and that under the evidence the jury were fully authorized to find a verdict in accordance with this principle in favor of the defendant, and that there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

RIGGS v. KINNEY. (No. 12064.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Aug. 3, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  303—Grounds of motion for new trial held unqualifiedly approved.

The grounds of a motion for a new trial are sufficiently certified when certified by the trial judge as being "true and correct." This is true notwithstanding the judge may, supra, in the certificate, have certified that the grounds "are hereby approved subject to correction." In such a certificate the grounds of the motion are unqualifiedly approved as true and correct.

2. Trial  $\S$ 110—Evidence that third person had employed counsel and agreed to make defendant good held improperly admitted.

Upon the trial of an action in trover, where the evidence presented an issue of fact as to the title of the property sued for, it was error, tending to influence the jury in favor of the plaintiff, to admit evidence to the effect that a third person had employed counsel to represent the defendant upon the trial of the case, and that such third person had promised to make good to the defendant the title to the property. See, in this connection, O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Pruitt, 110 Ga. 577, 86 S. E. 59.

GOLDSTEIN BROS. v. BROWN et al.
(No. 12394.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Aug. 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Garnishment  $\S$ 219—When plaintiffs or counsel not present when claim case called, levy should have been dismissed.

Goldstein Bros. obtained a judgment against Brown and had summons of garnishment issued thereon and served on the La Grange Banking & Trust Company. The garnishee answered that it held a certain sum due the defendant. There was no traverse to the answer. A claim to the fund was filed, and, when the claim case was called, neither the plaintiffs nor their counsel were present. The claimant introduced evidence and took a verdict finding the property "not subject." Held:

This was unauthorized by law. When a claim is filed, and at the hearing neither the plaintiff nor counsel representing the plaintiff is present, the levy should be dismissed. Bell & Co. v. Martin, 142 Ga. 55 (1), 82 S. E. 444.

2. Garnishment  $\S$ 223—Claimant not entitled to judgment when garnishee's answer admitting liability to defendant not traversed.

The answer of the garnishee admitting indebtedness to the defendant, but no traverse having been filed to the answer, the claimant could not legally obtain a judgment in her favor. Davis v. Pringle, 108 Ga. 93, 83 S. E.

HENING & HAGEDORN v. GLANTON.
(No. 12145.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1
Aug. 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 1056(2)—Corporations  $\S$ 193—Meeting cannot be held outside state; exclusion of evidence of organization harmless where not in issue.

Under the general rule that a corporation as an artificial person must dwell in the state of its creation, and has no legal existence outside of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created (Union Branch R. R. Co. v. East Tennessee R. Co., 14 Ga. 827, 328 [9], 341; Port Royal R. Co. v. Hammond, 58 Ga. 523, 526), its incorporators or stockholders, as the corporate entity, cannot hold meetings in another state for the performance of strictly corporate functions, such as accepting the charter and organizing the corporation (Duke v. Taylor, 37 Fla. 64, 19 South. 172, 31 L. R. A. 484, 53 Am. St. Rep. 232, 14 O. J. 112, 343, 886). Hence the court did not err in refusing to admit in evidence the alleged minutes of the first stockholders' meeting of the defendants, held in North Carolina under their alleged Georgia charter. Moreover, the exclusion of such evidence could not have been prejudicial, as the issue was not as to the existence of the corporation (this being undisputed), but solely whether the defendant dealt with the plaintiff and executed the note sued on as a corporation or as a partnership. Nor could the rights of the defendant have been prejudiced by the refusal of the court to admit in evidence the minutes of a meeting of the board of directors of the corporation, offered merely for the purpose of showing its organization, since under the evidence and the charge this was not an issue in dispute.

2. Evidence  $\S$ 213(1)—Admission of liability not inadmissible when no effort to compromise indicated.

"An admission of liability contained in an offer to settle, brought about by a simple demand for settlement, is not inadmissible on the ground that such admission was 'made with a view to a compromise,' when there is nothing whatever to indicate that there has been an effort to compromise, and when it cannot be inferred from the circumstances under which the offer was made that there has been such an effort." Teasley v. Bradley, 110 Ga. 497, 498 (6), 35 S. E. 782, 78 Am. St. Rep. 113; Akers v. Kirke & Co., 91 Ga. 590 (3), 18 S. E. 366.

3. Trial ¶296(2)—Portion of charge held cured by rest of charge.

The remaining grounds of the motion for new trial, all complaining of substantially the same alleged error manifested in various portions of the charge, are without merit. While, as set forth in the third ground of the amendment to the motion, the judge did instruct the jury that, if they found the defendant was a corporation, a verdict should be found for the defendant, and, if a partnership, then for the plaintiff, still, as conceded by all parties, and as repeatedly and plainly stated throughout the charge (including the language immediately preceding the particular excerpt), the one disputed and controlling issue was whether the maker of the note was dealt with as a partnership or as a corporation, and in which capacity the credit was extended and the note executed.

A. W. WATTERS & CO., Inc., v. O'NEILL et al. (No. 11602.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1 July 26, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Attorney's fees recoverable in attachment suit.

"The statutes prescribing procedure in attachment suits make provision for 'a return day' within the meaning of the statute prescribing the conditions on which agreements to pay attorney's fees, in addition to the stipulated principal and interest, may be enforced; and such agreements may be enforced in an attachment suit under conditions specified in the statute." Watters & Co., Inc., v. O'Neill et al. (this case), 108 S. E. 85, decided by the Supreme Court, July 18, 1921.

Under the above ruling and the facts of the instant case, the court did not err in including attorney's fees in the judgment rendered for the plaintiffs.

2. Attachment ¶274, 276—Declaration praying personal judgment not dismissed though attachment void; when attachment abandoned, refusal to pass on motion to dismiss, special plea, and traverse of grounds of attachment, not error.

"Though * * * an attachment be absolutely void, this is no ground for dismissing a declaration thereon, praying for judgment in personam, where the declaration has been properly filed and the defendant duly cited to appear, and general appearance has been made therein." Falligant v. Blitch, 19 Ga. App. 675 (2), 91 S. E. 1057, and citations.

In the instant case, while the declaration in attachment did not pray solely for judgment in personam, yet upon the trial counsel for the plaintiffs announced to the court that they would abandon the attachment and ask only for a common-law judgment in personam against the defendant. Under these circumstances the court did not err in refusing to pass upon: First, the defendant's motion to dismiss the attachment proceedings; second, the defendant's special plea setting up that the attachment was void; and third, the defendant's traverse to the grounds of the attachment.

3. Amended declaration not demurrable.

The amended declaration in attachment was not subject to any ground of demurrer interposed, and the court did not err in so ruling.

4. Amendment properly disallowed.

Under all the particular facts of the case the court did not err in disallowing the proffered amendment to the defendant's answer, or in striking the answer itself.

5. Judgment properly rendered.

The court did not err in rendering judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount of the principal, interest, and attorney's fees sued for.

6. Costs ¶262—Damages denied when prosecution for delay only does not appear.

It not appearing that the writ of error in this case was prosecuted for delay only, the request of the defendants in error, that damages be awarded, is denied.

Error from City Court of Floyd County; W. J. Nunnally, Judge.

ANDREWS v. SIMS. (No. 12124.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant  $\S$ 270(1/4, 10, 15) — Distress warrant is final process; the affidavit converts distress proceeding into ordinary action; distress warrant operative as final process, when counter affidavit dismissed, but otherwise landlord's remedy is on bond.

In November, 1918, the plaintiff in error sued out a distress warrant against his tenant, which was levied upon four bales of cotton, raised on the rented premises during the tenancy. The warrant was arrested by the giving of a counter affidavit and a replevy bond, and the property was released by the sheriff. Afterwards, during the pendency of the case, the tenant executed to another a deed and bill of sale to secure debt, covering certain real estate and personalty, which was duly recorded. Subsequently the landlord obtained a general judgment against the tenant and the surety on the replevy bond. The surety having become insolvent, the fi. fa. issued on the general judgment was levied upon certain of the personal property included in the bill of sale as property of the tenant. To this the defendant in error, the vendee under the bill of sale, interposed a claim. None of the property levied upon and so claimed was in fact included in the original levy of the distress warrant, but all of it was included in the bill of sale. The court, in the trial of the claim case, charged as follows: "A distress warrant levied for rent is a general lien on all property of the renter and takes effect from time of levy of distress warrant. If, subsequent to that, bond is given, and the property disposed of, the claimant gets no title against this levy which is regular in form." The jury having found the property subject, the claimant moved for a new trial on the general grounds, and on the ground that this charge was error (1) because the landlord's general lien was released by the filing of counter affidavit and the replevy bond; (2) because such general lien did not cover property not levied upon by the distress warrant; and (3) because the court should not have instructed the jury that the claimant got no title as against such levy. The judge granted a new trial, upon the ground that this portion of the charge was erroneous, and to this judgment the landlord excepted. Held, a distress warrant is final process until arrested by counter affidavit and replevy bond. Gober v. Barry, 4 Ga. App. 4, 6, 60 S. E. 807. But when the defendant replevies the property the levy becomes functus, and the proceeding is converted into an ordinary action for rent, with the bond standing as security in the event of a judgment for the plaintiff. Stephens v. McNaughton, 8 Ga. App. 42, 43, 68 S. E. 459. In such a proceeding the form of the verdict or judgment is general, and is for the amount found to be due. Hardy v. Poss, 120 Ga. 385, 47 S. E. 947. If the counter affidavit is dismissed, the distress warrant at once becomes again operative as final process.

Griggs v. Willbanks, 96 Ga. 744, 22 S. E. 327. But when it stands and the property is released under the affidavit and bond, the question of lien is not involved, and the plaintiff's recourse at the end of the suit will be upon his judgment on the bond. Rountree v. Rutherford, 65 Ga. 444(2), 448; Davis v. De Vaughn, 7 Ga. App. 324, 326, 68 S. E. 966.

2. Landlord and tenant  $\S$ 270(18)—Landlord's lien prior to levy covers no specific property, and after levy covers only that seized.

The general lien of landlord, which by section 3340 of the Civil Code (1910) is given "on the property of the debtor liable to levy and sale," dates "from the time of the levy of a distress warrant to enforce the same." Prior to levy it covers no specific property, and upon levy such general lien attaches only to the particular property seized under the distress warrant issued to enforce the lien. Henderson v. Mayer, 225 U. S. 631, 638, 32 Sup. Ct. 699, 56 L. Ed. 1233, 1236.

3. Execution  $\S$ 194(1)—Landlord and tenant  $\S$ 270(10)—Burden on claimant when property in defendant's possession; one to whom property pledged after release from distress warrant held to have good title.

Where property is in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. at the time of levy, the burden is upon the claimant to show that the property was not subject to sale under the plaintiff's execution at the date of the filing of the claim, and that at that time he had some title to or interest in the property, superior to the right of the plaintiff to proceed with the execution. Deariso & Co. v. Lawrence, 3 Ga. App. 580, 60 S. E. 330. See, also, Strickland v. Smith, 17 Ga. App. 505(3), 506, 87 S. E. 718. In the present case, the claimant showing superior title in himself under the bill of sale executed to him by the defendant in fi. fa. prior to the general judgment against the defendant on the replevy bond, and there being in the pleadings no allegation of fraud or other proper allegations and prayers attacking the conveyance to the claimant, the evidence demanded a verdict for the claimant, and the trial judge did not err in granting a new trial upon the error in the charge.

Error from Superior Court, Columbia County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Distress proceeding by T. B. Andrews, in which J. A. Sims interposed a claim to property levied on under the fi. fa. on the judgment on the replevy bond. After a verdict for plaintiff, a new trial was granted, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The conviction was unauthorized by the evidence, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County;
D. W. Blair, Judge.

Martha Richardson was convicted of larceny of money supposed to have gone with clothes taken by her to be washed, and she brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. T. W. Black testified that defendant did the witness' washing and would come after the clothes and take them to her house and wash them; that one Monday morning after she had come after the clothes the witness missed some money that she had been carrying on her person in a little tobacco sack pinned to her undershirt; that she pulled off the shirt Monday morning when defendant came for the clothes and did not see the money then, but threw the shirt in with the other clothes, tied them up, and gave them to defendant; that she did not notice that the money was gone until the next day; that the money had been given to her at different times, by her husband, and the last time she saw the tobacco sack with the money in it was when her husband gave her the last money; that she put in what he gave her, tied it up again, and pinned it back on her shirt; that she thought that was Sunday morning; that she did not see it when going to bed and had no recollection of seeing it after pinning it to the shirt; and that she did not know who got the money. Her husband testified that he turned the money over to his wife and she kept it in a little tobacco sack; that he was not at home and did not know what took place Monday morning; that after his wife told him about the money being gone he went to defendant's house and asked her about it, and she said she had not seen it and did not have it and knew nothing in the world about it; that the clothes had then been washed and were hanging on the line; that "she showed me where she said she hung it on the line, but it was gone; she said somebody had stolen it;" that he threatened to call the officers, but defendant still denied having seen the money; that he did call a deputy sheriff who searched the premises, but failed to find any money. The deputy sheriff testified that he searched the place, but did not find any money, and that defendant denied having it or knowing anything about it. Defendant in her statement denied having taken or seen the money, and said that if the shirt was in the washing at all she did not know it; that Mr. Black took all the clothes off the line and carried them home; and that she could not say for certain that the shirt was in the washing at all, but that if it was she never saw the money.—Statement by editor.

July 26, 1921.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)Drunkards ¶11—Evidence insufficient to show intoxication manifested by boisterousness, etc., on public highway.

On a trial for intoxication manifested by boisterousness, and indecent condition and acting, vulgar, profane, and unbecoming language, and loud and violent discourse on a public highway, evidence held insufficient to support a conviction.

Error from City Court of Dawson; M. C. Edwards, Judge.

Ed Anderson was convicted of drunkenness on a public highway, and he brings error. Reversed.

Will Rivers testified that defendant and two other negroes passed his house in a buggy; that defendant had a pistol in his hand and was waving it around and said he would shoot the witness' head off; that he was drunk, talking loud and cussing, and whipping the mule; that he drove on over towards the Dawson and Bronwood public road. On cross-examination he testified that where he saw defendant when he was cussing and waving the pistol was "on the little road on the place which runs about 80 feet from my house"; that it ran into the Dawson and Bronwood public road 300 or 400 yards from his house; that they drove to the public road; and that he did not know what they did when they got in that road.

His wife, Macedonia Rivers, testified in substance to the same effect, and likewise testified on cross-examination that the place where she saw defendant and his companions in the buggy was not on the Dawson and

Bronwood public road, but "in the little road in front of our house on Mr. Jennings' place"; and that they drove upon the public road mentioned, but that "I never saw what they were doing on the Dawson and Bronwood public road."

A deputy sheriff testified that on the same day he overtook the buggy and arrested defendant's companions "on the road that goes off from the Dawson and Bronwood public road and goes up by Mr. Kennedy's place, about a mile from Dawson"; that he did not arrest defendant, because he ran away; that they were on the public road when he first saw them, but he was several hundred yards behind and could not tell what they were doing, except that defendant was whipping a mule and standing up in the buggy and beating it with a stick, trying to make it go faster; that he did not see any of them waving any pistol; that he would say defendant was drunk, but not "plumb drunk"; that as defendant ran away he thought he saw something black, like the handle of a pistol, in his pocket, but would not swear that it was a pistol. On cross-examination he testified that the place where he overtook the buggy was not in the Dawson and Bronwood public road, but in the little side road; that he never heard defendant open his mouth then or any other time that afternoon; that the only thing he saw him doing while on the public road was to whip the mule; that he did not find any pistol in the buggy or on the other two negroes; that defendant did not use any obscene language, or in fact say anything, and was not boisterous, and that he did not see him do anything indecent; and that when he caught up with the buggy it had left the Dawson and Bronwood public road 50 or 100 yards.

LUKE, J. The defendant in this case was charged with being upon a certain highway in an intoxicated condition, which intoxication was "made manifest by boisterousness, by indecent condition and acting, and by vulgar, profane, and unbecoming language, and loud and violent discourse of the defendant while so intoxicated." The evidence did not authorize the defendant's conviction, since there was no proof that he comported himself upon the highway named in the manner alleged. It was therefore error to overrule the motion for a new trial. See Davis v. State, 14 Ga. App. 569, 81 S. E. 906, and cases cited.

OTIS v. COOPER.

(No. 10628.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1921.)

Constitutional law §300 — Highways §166
—Due process clause not violated by statute giving lien on stolen auto for injury from its negligent operation.

Acts 1912, p. 737, giving a lien on a motor vehicle for damages caused by its being operated in violation of law or negligently, excepting only one which has been stolen from under secure lock, does not deprive one of property without process where the car had been stolen under other conditions; it being considered the offender.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by J. C. Otis against N. B. Cooper, with attachment. Claim of the Maryland Motor Car Insurance Company to the car, contested by plaintiff, was decided against claimant, and it appeals. Appeal dismissed.

E. L. Craig, of Columbia, for appellant.

Nettles & Tobias, of Columbia, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record:

"James C. Otis commenced his action in the county court of Richland county, against N. B. Cooper, by the service of a summons dated October 18, 1920, together with a complaint, alleging that on June 20, 1920, he suffered damage by reason of the negligence of defendant in the operation of an automobile on the public highway in Richland county. The summons and complaint were filed October 20, 1920, together with an affidavit in attachment, whereupon a warrant of attachment issued directing the sheriff to seize the automobile referred to in the complaint and affidavit. Service was made October 20, 1920, and the sheriff took the automobile into his possession the same day. At the return of the writ Maryland Motor Car Insurance Company claimed the automobile as its property and made demand in writing on the sheriff that the car be delivered to it forthwith, whereupon the sheriff notified the plaintiff that the insurance company had claimed the car and unless the undertaking required by section 287 of the Code was given he would not keep the car. Plaintiff contested the insurance company's claim and gave the undertaking.

"Thereafter the insurance company served the plaintiff in attachment with notice that it would submit its petition and affidavits to the judge of the county court on the 8th day of November, 1920, and request that an issue be made up under his direction, pursuant to the provisions of section 287 of the Code, to try the question of whether the automobile was its property and was being unlawfully withheld from it.

"Claimant by its petition and affidavits alleged that the automobile had been stolen from a dealer in the city of Richland, Va., under circumstances more fully set forth in its petition and affidavits, and that claimant had become subrogated to the rights of that dealer and was the owner of the car by reason of having paid for the loss under a policy of insurance issued by it and by a written instrument assigning the right, title, and interest of the dealer to claimant, and that it was entitled to have the car delivered to it forthwith. The petition further alleged that claimant was being deprived of its property without due process of law in violation of the 'due process' clauses of the state and federal Constitutions.

"When the motion was called for a hearing counsel for the plaintiff in attachment admitted, for the sake of argument, that the car was the property of the insurance company, and that it had been stolen in the manner claimed, but contended that, as it did not appear that the car had been stolen by the breaking of a building under a secure lock or while the vehicle was securely locked, the plaintiff in attachment was entitled to have the car sold and the proceeds of the sale applied to the satisfaction of any judgment that might be recovered as the Acts of 1912, p. 787, authorized a proceeding in rem whereby the car was responsible in any event except in cases coming strictly within the exemptions set forth in the statute.

"The court below decided in favor of the plaintiff in attachment, and held there were no issues to submit, and, the order being final as to claimant, this appeal has been taken."

The question raised by the exceptions (which will be reported) is whether the statute adopted in 1912, entitled "An act to further regulate the running of motor vehicles in this state," is constitutional. The statute is as follows:

"When a motor vehicle is operated in violation of the provisions of law, or negligently and carelessly, and when any person receives personal injury thereby, or when a buggy or wagon or other property is damaged thereby, the damages done to such person or property shall be and constitute a lien next in priority to the lien for state and county taxes, upon such motor vehicle, recoverable in any court of competent jurisdiction, and the person sustaining such damages shall have a right to attach such motor vehicle in the manner provided by law for attachments in this state; provided, that this act shall not be effective in case the motor vehicle shall have been stolen by the breaking of a building under a secure lock, or when the vehicle is securely locked."

The question now before us was under consideration in the case of Merchants' & Planters' Bank v. Brigman et al., 106 S. C. 362, 91 S. E. 832, L. R. A. 1917E, 925, and the court held that the statute was constitutional. The principle therein announced was afterwards followed in the case of Stewart v. Collier, 112 S. C. 258, 99 S. E. 838.

The doctrine announced in those cases is reaffirmed in this case. We desire to call special attention to the proviso in the statute, which affords reasonable, if not ample, protection to the owner of the car against theft, in case he places his car in a building under a secure lock, or locks the car securely.

In the case of Grant Co. v. United States, 254 U. S. 505, 41 Sup. Ct. 189, 65 L. Ed. —, the court held that section 3450 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. St. § 6352), which provides for the forfeiture of any conveyance, etc., used in the removal of any goods or commodities with intent to defraud the United States of the tax thereon, applies to an automobile used in the unlawful removal of distilled spirits, though a seller of the automobile, who retained title for the unpaid purchase money, was without guilt, and that the statute so applied did not violate the Fifth Amendment of the federal Constitution relative to due process of law, as the thing forfeited was primarily considered the offender. In that case the court said:

"It is the illegal use that is the material consideration; it is that which works the forfeiture, the guilt or innocence of its owner being accidental."

Applying that language to the present case, it is the negligent operation of the motor vehicle, whereby any person receives injury to his person or property, that is the material consideration. It is that which gives rise to the lien on the offending automobile; the guilt or innocence of its owner being accidental.

Appeal dismissed.

Ex parte SWYGERT.

STATE v. SWYGERT.

(No. 10699.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

Criminal law § 100(3)—Assumption of jurisdiction in county of wound precludes its assumption in county of death.

Under Cr. Code 1912, § 147, providing that, where one is wounded in one county and dies in another, indictment in either of the person causing it shall be good, and he shall be tried in the county where the indictment is found, the court of the county where the wound was inflicted having first assumed exclusive jurisdiction of the case, accused cannot be proceeded against in the county where the person died.

Habeas corpus proceeding by Job C. Swygert, who, pending proceedings against him in the county in which he wounded a man, was proceeded against in the county in which the man died. Proceedings in second county annulled.

The statement referred to in the opinion is as follows:

Statement.

The petitioner and John C. Nicholson, now deceased, became involved in a difficulty in the town of Leesville, in the county of Lexington and state aforesaid, on the 3d day of April, 1921, in which said difficulty the said J. C. Nicholson received a mortal wound or wounds, from the effects of which he died in a hospital, in the city of Columbia, shortly after midnight on April 4, 1921. In the afternoon on the last-mentioned date an inquest was held in the town of Leesville over the dead body of the said J. C. Nicholson by the coroner and a jury of Lexington county. After the finding made by the coroner's jury, the coroner caused the petitioner, Job C. Swygert, to be committed to the common jail of Lexington county to await an indictment charging him with the murder of the said Nicholson. Thereafter, on the 12th day of April, 1921, Mr. Justice R. C. Watts, of the Supreme Court, admitted the petitioner, Swygert, to bail, and pursuant to the order allowing bail as aforesaid the petitioner, on the 18th day of April, 1921, entered into a recognizance, before the clerk of court for Lexington county, conditioned for his personal appearance before the court of general sessions of said county to answer to a bill of indictment to be preferred against him for murder, and to do and receive what should be enjoined by the court, and not to depart the court without license.

That on the 23d day of May, 1921, the grand jury made a presentment to the court of General sessions, which was then in session in said county, of the case against petitioner, called upon the prosecuting attorney to prepare a bill of indictment in the case for their action thereon, and demanded the production of the witnesses in the case. The prosecuting attorney declined to do this, assigning as the reason for his refusal a letter written by the Attorney General to the solicitor of the Fifth judicial circuit, directing him to hand out a bill of indictment in Richland county, where the deceased died. Later, on or about the 1st of June, after declining to do so, except on instructions from the court, the grand jury of Richland county returned a true bill against the petitioner, charging him with inflicting wounds on the body of the deceased in Lexington county, from the effects of which he died in Richland county. Thereafter, on the 9th day of June, the petitioner was rearrested, while his bond in Lexington county was still of force, on a bench warrant, issued out of the court of general sessions for Richland county, charging him with the murder of the said John C. Nicholson in Lexington county, and he was lodged in the common jail for Richland county, whereupon a writ of habeas corpus was issued out of the Supreme Court, upon the petition of the said Job C. Swygert, asking for his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Richland county and from the jurisdiction of the court of general sessions for said county.

Issues Stated.

There are two principal questions raised in this proceeding and both are jurisdictional in character. The first contention of the petitioner is that section 147 of the Criminal Code, under which jurisdiction is claimed in Richland county is unconstitutional, null, and void. The second contention of the petitioner is that, admitting, for the sake of argument, section 147 of the Criminal Code to be constitutional, the court of general sessions in Richland county could not acquire jurisdiction of either the person of petitioner or the subject-matter of the offense charged, because the court of general sessions for Lexington county had previously acquired such jurisdiction.

Timmerman & Graham, of Lexington, and E. L. Ashbill, of Leesville, for petitioner.

A. F. Spigner, Sol., of Columbia, C. M. Efrid, of Lexington, Cole L. Blease, of Columbia, and C. J. Ramage and B. W. Crouch, both of Saluda, for the State.

COTHRAN, J. The constitutionality of section 147 of the Criminal Code was directly in issue in the case of State v. McCoomer, 79 S. C. 63, 60 S. E. 287, and by the solemn adjudication of this court was unanimously sustained. We are not disposed to reopen the question, particularly as a decision upon the constitutionality of the section is not necessary to a determination of this matter.

The inquest was held in Lexington county; a warrant was issued for the arrest of the petitioner by the coroner of Lexington county; he was arrested under that warrant, and committed to the jail of Lexington county; a petition for a writ of habeas corpus was filed in Lexington county; it was opposed by the solicitor of the circuit of which Lexington county is a part; an order admitting the petitioner to bail and requiring him to give bond for his appearance at the next term of the court of general sessions for Lexington county was signed by a justice of this court; the bond was accordingly executed by the petitioner, and approved by and filed with the clerk of court of Lexington county. The court of Lexington county has therefore assumed exclusive jurisdiction of the case against the petitioner.

The entire proceedings by which it was sought to arrest the petitioner and hold him to trial in Richland county are annulled and the bond executed by the petitioner under a previous order of three of the justices of this court in the present proceeding is directed to be cancelled by the clerk of this court. The reporter will incorporate in the report of this proceeding the very clear and complete statement of the facts contained in the argument for the petitioner by Mr. Timmerman.

GARY, O. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

FRASER, J. (concurring in result). The petitioner had a difficulty with one John C.

Nicholson, in the town of Leesville, in Lexington county. In that difficulty the petitioner inflicted wounds upon Nicholson that were mortal. Nicholson was carried to a hospital in Columbia, in Richland county, where in a short time he died from the said wounds. The coroner of Lexington county held an inquest in Lexington county, in which they found that the deceased came to his death from wounds inflicted by the petitioner. Mr. Justice Watts, of this court, heard and granted an application for bail, and made the bond conditioned for the petitioner's appearance in the court of Lexington county. The grand jury for Lexington county presented the petitioner for murder, and called upon the solicitor to prepare a formal indictment. This the solicitor declined to do, under instructions from his superior officer, the Attorney General, as it was determined by the prosecuting officers to try the case in Richland county. The grand jury for Richland county took up the matter, and made a presentment to the court of general sessions for Richland county, in which they protested against the prosecution of the petitioner in Richland county. The presiding judge overruled their protest and ordered them to consider the bill. In obedience to this order they passed upon the bill and found a true bill. The presiding judge of the Richland court, on ascertaining that the petitioner would not appear at the Richland court, issued a bench warrant for him, and he was arrested and placed in the Richland jail to await his trial in Richland county.

The state did not appeal from the order of Mr. Justice Watts, and it is the law of this case. No court or judge had the right to order the rearrest of the petitioner until he has failed to comply with the order of Mr. Justice Watts. There is no intimation in the the record that the petitioner has in any way failed to comply with this order. The petitioner has made application to this court for his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Richland county. It is a serious thing to rearrest one, for the same offense, who has been admitted to bail under habeas corpus proceedings, before he has violated the terms of the order under which he was admitted to bail. There was an honest mistake and misapprehension as to the law, and no one is to blame.

The mistake arises from a misapprehension of the powers and duties of the grand jury. The duties of the grand jury are twofold: Without fear or favor they are first to present those who, in their untrammelled judgment, should be presented; and, second, they are to refrain from presenting those who in their judgment should not be presented. These two duties are of equal importance. When the grand jury of Lexington county presented the petitioner, he was by that fact indicted in Lexington. In the argument it was said the solicitor did not act upon the Lexington presentment. The grand jury indicts, not the solicitor.

It is the duty of the solicitor to put the indictment of the grand jury in proper legal form. It would doubtless be unsafe to go to trial upon such an informal indictment of a grand jury. The indictment is the official act of the grand jury and not of the solicitor. It lies in no man's mouth to tell the grand jury of the county that they shall not present one who, in their judgment, should be indicted. They may indict the solicitor himself, if in their judgment the public interest demanded his indictment.

The power and duty to refrain from indicting those who, in their judgment, should not be indicted, is equally absolute and of equal advantage to the people. The indictment by the Richland grand jury, after and over their protest, was void. We have before us a case in which the petitioner is held to bail in Lexington county, under valid proceedings. We have the petitioner rearrested in Richland county, under proceedings that are void. The result is inevitable to return the petitioner to the custody of his bail, and he shall remain in that custody until he has failed to obey those proceedings, or is surrendered by his bail.

We are asked to pass upon the constitutionality of the act that in a proper case would give Richland county jurisdiction to try the case. It is evident that the decision is not necessary, and the question in this case academic.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Brokers  $\S$ 71—Broker held entitled to commission on full purchase price, though purchaser fails to pay deferred payments.

Under a contract between the owner of property and a broker, by which the broker is to receive 4 per cent. of a stipulated sale price for the property if he finds and produces a purchaser ready, able, and willing to pay that price in cash; and such purchaser is found and produced by the broker, and a sale is made through further negotiations between the owner and such purchaser for part cash and deferred payments, without the knowledge or concurrence of the broker, the broker is entitled to his commission on the full purchase price, although the purchaser afterwards fails to pay the deferred payments, and the property is returned to the owner for such failure, under a clause in the sale agreement.

2. Corporations  $\S$ 426(10)—Acceptance by corporation of benefits of unauthorized contract by president a ratification.

Where the president of a private corporation, without authority from the corporation, makes a contract for the sale of corporate property, and the corporation afterwards accepts and retains the benefits of the contract, it thereby ratifies the contract, and will be bound to perform its obligations thereunder.

3. Principal and agent  $\S$ 70—When agent may act for two principals stated.

An agent may act for two principals in the same transaction where his duties do not require him to do incompatible acts; or, if the employment does not imply trust and confidence, as where he is a mere middleman who brings them together and then leaves them to bargain for themselves. In such cases he violates no duty in undertaking to perform such service for both, and may properly receive compensation from both.

4. Corporations  $\S$ 426(10)—Acts of corporation held a ratification of unauthorized sale of its property.

Where an unauthorized contract is made by a president of a private corporation with a broker for the production of a purchaser of the property of the corporation, for an agreed commission on the agreed sale price, and as a result thereof a sale is made to such purchaser so produced, and the benefits thereof accepted by the corporation, and after such sale a part of the commissions of the broker is paid by the treasurer of the corporation by direction of members of the executive committee of the directors, the contract is thereby ratified, and the corporation will be bound to perform its obligations thereunder.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Action by Joseph H. McDermott and others against Fairmont Gas & Light Company and others. From judgment for alleged insufficient amount, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Cox & Baker, David C. Reay, and Chas. A. Goodwin, all of Morgantown, for appellants.
Charles Powell, Osman E. Swartz, and Tusca Morris, all of Fairmont, for appellees.

LIVELY, J. Plaintiff instituted suit against Fairmont Gas & Light Company and its stockholders to recover the sum of $40,000, claimed by him as commissions on the sale of the company's property and assets to Russell Palmer, at the price of $1,000,000, brought about through his efforts and under a verbal contract made by plaintiff with S. L. Watson, president of the company, and recovered a decretal judgment for the sum of $7,275, from which he prosecutes this appeal.

The bill alleges, substantially, that McDermott made a verbal agreement with S. L. Watson, president of the defendant company, and claiming to represent its stockholders, at Fairmont, W. Va., in August, 1912, by which it was agreed that if plaintiff would present a purchaser of all the assets and properties of the company, who would pay therefor the sum of $1,000,000, and purchase, then plaintiff would be paid a commission of 4 per cent., or $40,000; that in pursuance of the agreement (having associated with himself one A. F. Gressler, in his efforts to procure a purchaser, and who, after this suit was begun, transferred all his claims to plaintiff) he did procure and produce and introduced Russell Palmer, of Mobile, Ala., who, after considerable negotiations, purchased the property, by written agreement for the sum of $1,000,000, on November 22, 1912, from certain of the stockholders then holding more than 80 per cent. of the capital stock of the company; and that afterwards, on December 20, 1912, the stockholders approved and ratified said sale and agreement, and directed and caused to be executed a deed therefor to a corporation, Fairmont Gas Company, formed by the purchaser, who made a down payment of $125,000, and on or about the 1st of February, 1913, a further payment of $125,000. The bill charges that the stockholders had full knowledge of the services rendered by plaintiff when they ratified and confirmed the sale to Palmer, and afterwards, on February 21, 1913, the defendant company paid to plaintiff $5,000 as part of the commissions due him; that afterwards the defendant company distributed the moneys received by it from Palmer among its stockholders, and then surrendered its charter, and went out of corporate existence, without paying, or making provision for the payment of, plaintiff's debt, amounting to $35,000. The bill prays for a discovery, and for recovery of the said sum, and for general relief.

The bill was filed at April rules, 1915, and in June, 1916, the defendant company, S. L. Watson, as president, and in his own right, Fairmont Gas Company, a corporation, and Frank B. Pryor, as secretary of the last-named corporation, and in his own right, filed their joint and several answers, giving the names of stockholders and the number of shares of stock held by them at the time of the dissolution of the defendant company, and distribution of moneys received from the sale, and detailing the transactions with McDermott leading up to the time of the agreement for payment of commissions. They deny that S. L. Watson claimed to represent the company in that agreement with McDermott, or that he represented any of the stockholders on that occasion; on that subject they say that Watson—

“simply stated to the said McDermott that if a purchaser was produced who desired to purchase the entire property at a price of $1,000,000, to be paid in cash, he, the said Watson, believed and felt that himself and other stockholders associated with him, holding together from 75 to 80 per cent. of the capital stock of said company, would feel disposed and willing to sell the property of said company, if the stockholders of the company should so decide, at the said price of $1,000,000, to be paid in cash; but the said Watson never, at any time, claimed to said McDermott, or otherwise, to have the right and power to sell and negotiate for the sale of said property; and on the question of commissions on any such sale, the said Watson, in any conversation which he had with the said McDermott, simply stated that, should a purchaser be presented who should purchase said property at the sum of $1,000,000, to be paid in cash, and who was willing, able, and anxious to purchase the same, and the sale and purchase thereof at said price should be negotiated, consummated, and completed, and the said purchase price so paid, he and those associated with him, holding together from 75 to 80 per cent. of the capital stock of said company, might feel disposed to pay a commission on the said purchase price if the stockholders of said company should so decide; but the said Watson never, at any time, to the said McDermott or otherwise, claimed to have the right to negotiate and contract for the services of the said McDermott, and for the payment of commissions or compensation to him therefor, on behalf of the said company or its stockholders.”

The answer then details in full the proceedings subsequent to the agreement for commissions with Watson; the meeting with Palmer at Atlantic City; the sale of the property to him for $1,000,000, if, upon examination by Palmer's engineers and auditors, the property was as represented; the examination and reports made by them; the conclusion of Palmer to buy at the stipulated price; further negotiations culminating in the sale to him for that price, but not for cash, but upon payment of $125,000 cash and the remainder at intervals; the formation by Palmer of a West Virginia company under the corporate name of Fairmont Gas Company, with authorized capital stock of $3,000,000, to which the property was deeded, and the entire stock of which, except five shares was issued to Palmer, and, with the deed held in escrow awaiting the liquidation of the deferred payments of purchase money; the failure of Palmer to pay the deferred payment of $250,000; the taking of the property by the defendants under the forfeiture clause of the agreement, together with the $250,000 paid by Palmer; the taking over of the stock and absolute control of the new corporation formed by Palmer, the Fairmont Gas Co., by defendants; the sale of the entire property and the said stock in the new corporation to J. H. Wheelright by the defendants on January 22, 1914, for $750,000.

The answer further details the efforts of McDermott to obtain payment of his commissions, and an explanation of the payment to McDermott of $5,000 on February 21, 1913, as a part of his commissions, in which it is stated that the same was paid out of a fund in bank to the credit of S. L. Watson, trustee, by check of Walton Miller, the treasurer of defendant company, while Watson was in the South, and which payment he, Watson, disapproved on his return. The answer further details the dissolution of the defendant company, the distribution of the assets to the stockholders, consisting of $750,000 derived from Wheelright and the $250,000 derived from Palmer. The answer denies any obligation to the plaintiff on his claim for commission; denies that Watson acted for the defendant company or any of the stockholders in his negotiations with McDermott; denies that any of the stockholders, except possibly a few, knew of such negotiations; denies ratification thereof by any act of the stockholders or directors; and explains the payment of $5,000 to plaintiff on his commission as unauthorized. Answers were filed by other defendants, which contain practically the same averments and denials.

The pleadings and evidence develop the salient facts that Watson, as president of the defendant company, and representing business associates, owing 75 or 80 per cent. of the stock, whom he thought would “join or act with him,” made an agreement with plaintiff for the production of a purchaser for the corporate property at a price of $1,000,000, and if, as a result thereof, a sale was made, then plaintiff should have a commission thereon fixed at 4 per cent. The main controversy exists over the nature and character of this agreement, made in the office of Watson, of Fairmont, in July, 1912. As a result of this agreement, Palmer purchased the property of the defendant for the price stipulated, from Watson and certain of his associates owning in excess of 80 per cent. of the entire stock, afterwards confirmed by legal corporate action, and paid $250,000, but failed to pay the remainder of the purchase money, and, after failure, the property was on December 3, 1913, taken back by the corporation and the money so paid by Palmer was retained by the stockholders without protest from Palmer; and McDermott was paid $5,000 on his claim for commission.

Defendants' main defenses may be summed up as follows:

1. Want of inherent power in Watson, as president, to employ or contract with plaintiff concerning a sale of its corporate property; or want of power express or implied in its president to act in its behalf in that regard.

2. Plaintiff did not produce a purchaser who could and did pay $1,000,000 in cash, thereby failing to perform his contract.

3. The stockholders, except a few, had no knowledge of plaintiff's contract or claim, and made no ratification. No corporate action thereon appears in the records of defendant company.

4. Even if the contract for commissions was binding on the corporation, the fact that plaintiff also participated in compensation paid by Palmer to Gessler would avoid the same because of dual agency.

5. Defendants are not estopped to deny liability for Watson's acts, or liability to plaintiff, because, after suit, they did not formally repudiate Watson's unauthorized act, and restore the benefits received thereby.

It is insisted on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant company and its stockholders held out Watson to those dealing with him as having authority to dispose of the corporate assets, and he having acted, and his acts having been confirmed, they are estopped from denying his power and authority to bind the corporation; that defendants made the sale to Palmer, and thus took the benefit of plaintiff's services in making the sale possible, and retained the benefits after full notice of plaintiff's services, and are hence estopped from denying the ultra vires act of their president in employing plaintiff to interest a purchaser in the property and effect a sale; that the institution of the suit in April, 1915, and service of process was conclusive notice of plaintiff's contract for commissions, and, having since that time continued to retain the benefits, defendants cannot now interpose want of knowledge; that division between plaintiff and Gessler of commissions on the sale received from the purchaser, Palmer, cannot bar plaintiff from the benefit of his contract with Watson; that because Palmer purchased on part cash and deferred payments, and failed to pay the delayed payments, did not defeat plaintiff's contract for commissions; and that, plaintiff having been the efficient cause of the sale, he is entitled to compensation on a quantum meruit, even if there had been no express contract.

The lower court came to the conclusion that McDermott and Watson agreed at the Fairmont conference, when Phillips was present, that the purchase price should be $1,000,000 cash, and that if McDermott did produce such a purchaser, who, in the judgment of the corporation's officials, and especially Watson, was considered as able and willing to pay that price in cash, then McDermott should, upon such sale, receive a commission of 4 per cent. The court further concluded that whatever contract was made by Watson with McDermott was made without previous authority from the stockholders or the corporation, that the president had no such inherent power, and that no mention was made of any such contract with McDermott on the records of the corporation at any of its meetings; but that whatever action Watson took, or whatever contract he made, would be binding only upon the corporation and its stockholders to the extent that it injured to their benefit; and that the only material benefit the corporation and its stockholders derived from the agency or efforts of McDermott was the sum of $250,000 paid by Palmer and distributed to the stockholders, and therefore they would be responsible to McDermott to the extent of 4 per cent. of this amount, or the sum of $10,000, and so decreed, giving the corporation credit for the $5,000 paid in 1913, and awarding interest on the remaining $5,000, making the sum decreed to be $7,275.

[1] It will be instantly perceived that the lower court has necessarily changed the terms of the contract, as ascertained by it from the evidence, and has made the plaintiff's compensation depend upon whatever amount in cash was paid by the purchaser. If the down payment had been $1,000 and nothing further paid, the compensation of McDermott would have been $40, irrespective of the services performed by him. His pay would depend upon the kind and terms of whatever contract the corporation might make with the purchaser, and the ultimate result thereof. Under that rule or holding, if the officers of a corporation should make a sale to the purchaser produced, resulting in greater loss than gain to the stockholders, the broker or agent would be entitled to no compensation. It would make the broker's commission dependent upon the beneficial outcome of the venture. For instance, if the money paid by the purchaser was $50,000, and the damage to the property under his management should be an equal or greater amount before it could be recovered by the seller, on what sum would commissions be computed if material benefits received are fixed as the basis of and governing the commission to be paid? The logical result of such a construction would be to allow the seller to repudiate commissions if no material benefit was derived from the sale into which he entered. It would be a dangerous rule to establish.

[2] If an unauthorized contract be made by an officer of a corporation, afterwards confirmed and approved by the acceptance of benefits arising therefrom by the corporation, it will not be permitted to annul, vary, or emasculate the contract by a change of its terms, based upon the amount of benefits received. If it accepts benefits, it must accept the terms of the contract. If the contract in terms, or reasonably interpreted, makes the commission dependent on the beneficial result of the sale to the vendor, and based on the benefits measured in terms of money, then such a holding would be clearly proper; it would be simply carrying out the contract, and making effective the intention of the parties. Was there such an agreement between Watson and McDermott? We cannot so interpret it. Watson insists that McDermott was to produce a purchaser who would buy at $1,000,000 and pay in cash, and that, because Palmer did not pay the total purchase price in cash, then McDermott was not entitled to any commissions. He does not even intimate, nor does counsel contend, that the commissions should be 4 per cent. on any sum less than the full sale price. The defense is that McDermott is entitled to no commissions, because he did not find and introduce the kind of purchaser stipulated in the contract. On the other hand, McDermott insists that he was to find a purchaser, then having one in mind, who would pay the price of $1,000,000, and that the terms of the sale were to be negotiated between the purchaser and Watson. He says that Watson told him to bring on his purchaser who would pay $1,000,000; "that is our price on this piece of property; we will sell it to him. We will make our own trade."

McDermott stated that all he was to do was interest and find the purchaser, and to have nothing to do with the terms of the trade, and was not present when the trade was made, and knew nothing about the terms agreed upon until after the sale was completed, and had nothing whatever to do with the subsequent modifications. He claimed that he was told by Watson, after Palmer had made the first payment, that his commissions would be taken care of "as soon as we get around to it"; but after the property had been taken back from Palmer and sold to Wheelright, Watson then said that they didn't think they owed him the $40,000, because Palmer had not completed paying for the property, but that they would pay something for his services. It is to be noted that the $5,000 which was paid to McDermott on his commission was paid on February 21, 1913, and that the property was not taken back from Palmer until December 3, 1913.

John F. Phillips, who was a director and a member of the executive committee of the defendant company, was present when the commission contract was made, and his understanding of the agreement was that, if McDermott furnished a purchaser who would take the property at $1,000,000, that a commission of 4 per cent. on that amount would be paid him, and that he was left under the impression "that if the party would make a substantial payment, everything would be right." The testimony of Phillips, although one of the defendants, and closely connected with the management of the defendant company, and possibly testifying against his own interests, strongly corroborates that of McDermott on this very important part of the controversy. Mr. Phillips also testified that, in contracting with McDermott for the commission of 4 per cent. on the sale, Mr. Watson was acting as agent of the corporation, but when pressed to state how he knew he was acting as such, and by what authority, he qualified his statement by saying "he (Watson) was president, member of the board of directors, member of the executive committee and chairman, and his word was final at all times," but that he (the witness) had never heard of any authority given Watson by the directors or executive committee to employ McDermott to find a purchaser for the property. This witness also stated that the executive committee knew of the existence of the McDermott contract with Watson for a commission before the sale agreement with Palmer was made on November 22, 1912.

So the controversy over the contract is whether McDermott is entitled to any commission whatever; and, from the divergent statements of the makers of the contract, we fail to find any basis for limiting the commission to any sum less than 4 per cent. on the purchase price, or on any sum to be ascertained or measured by the benefits derived by the corporation or its stockholders, if a sale should be made resulting therefrom. McDermott is entitled to full commissions, or to none.

The attitude of defendants is well stated by its counsel as follows:

"We insist that no other finding was possible than that the sale was to be for $1,000,000, to be paid in cash, and it was on this character of sale that the commission depends, and on no other;" and, "If he (Palmer) had had the money, and paid, Watson would have been obliged to pay the $40,000 to McDermott. Not having the money, and not paying, McDermott was entitled to nothing, for he had accomplished naught."

What principle of law governs, if we view the contract as claimed by the defendant? McDermott produced a purchaser, who met

Watson and some of his associates in Atlantic City, and who then agreed to purchase the property for $1,000,000 cash if, upon investigation and report, the property was what it was represented to be. Upon investigation, he became satisfied with the property, but advised that he had been disappointed in procuring the purchase money, and asked for terms, which were granted him by the defendant company's officers, culminating, after subsequent modifications, in the purchase, sale, and delivery of the property, by which $250,000 was actually paid to defendant company; but default was made in the remainder of the purchase price, whereupon the company took back the property, and kept the $250,000 paid to it. A short time after taking back its property, it sold the same to one of its stockholders, Wheelright, for $750,000. These changes from and modifications of the cash price originally agreed upon with Palmer were without the knowledge or consent of McDermott, so far as the record discloses. He was to have nothing to do with making the deal. That was to be done by the defendants with the purchaser. There was to be no middleman. Watson told McDermott to bring on his man, he wanted to look him over, and he would make his own deal with him.

Can it be said that McDermott had accomplished naught? Is it not conclusive that, by reason of his contract and his efforts, he has brought to the pockets of the defendants $250,000, which they yet retain? He was the efficient procuring cause. But defendants assert that the purchaser was to pay the full purchase price in cash before McDermott would be entitled to his commission. If a vendor would be permitted to defeat the commissions of a broker by changing the terms of purchase with the purchaser found and produced by the broker, it would open the door of fraud and collusion between the seller and buyer, and practically defeat recovery of a broker's commission. It was in the power of defendants to require full cash price from Palmer or refuse to sell. If they had refused to sell unless for cash, then McDermott would have no claim, presuming that his contract required a cash purchaser; but, having waived that right, and having made the sale for other than cash, they cannot defeat his commission, nor can they, by so doing, vary his contract without his consent, and limit his commission to the cash actually paid, be it great or small. 4 R. C. L. § 59.

"If a broker has brought the parties together, and, as a result, they conclude a contract, he is not deprived of his right to a commission by the fact that the contract so concluded differs in terms from the one which he was authorized to negotiate." 19 Cyc. 249; O'Toole v. Tucker, 17 Misc. Rep. 554, 40 N. Y. Supp. 606; Keys v. Johnson, 68 Pa. 42; Woods v. Stephens, 46 Mo. 555; Ice v. Maxwell, 61 W.

Va. 9, 55 S. E. 899; Reynolds v. Tompkins, 28 W. Va. 235.

Under the contract, as claimed by Watson and the defendants, they could not, by varying the terms of the sale to Palmer from cash to part cash and part delayed payments, defeat plaintiff's right to compensation. On the other hand, if the terms of the contract were as claimed by McDermott and Phillips, that is, that McDermott was to procure and present a purchaser who would purchase for the price of $1,000,000 the terms to be negotiated between Watson and his associates and the purchaser, then McDermott is entitled to his commission, notwithstanding the failure of the purchaser to pay the balance of purchase money, or to comply with some of the terms of his purchase. Linton v. Johnson, 81 W. Va. 569, 94 S. E. 945; Hugill v. Weekley, 64 W. Va. 210, 61 S. E. 860, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1262.

Watson had no inherent power, as president of the corporation, to make the contract with McDermott. Ordinarily a president of a corporation can make no binding contract looking to a sale of the corporate assets without first obtaining authority. It is claimed by counsel for plaintiff that the corporation and its stockholders held Watson out to the public as having authority to make such contracts as he might wish, and, by reason of this, his contract was binding on the corporation, and it and its stockholders are estopped from denying his authority, independent of subsequent ratification. There is considerable evidence to sustain this contention. Watson and his friends and associates owned or controlled about 75 per cent. of the stock, and whatever he did appears to have been sanctioned and approved by them. His word governed. He was president, director, member of the executive committee, and chairman thereof, and no important step in corporate affairs or management was taken without consultation with and approval by him. He appears to possess consummate executive ability, and was the central and commanding figure in the corporation. But it is not necessary to pass upon this contention of the plaintiff. It is quite evident, and is not disputed, that the property was sold to Palmer by reason of the contract with McDermott, and that the corporation and its stockholders realized $250,000 thereby, which they have distributed among themselves. They cannot, after taking the benefit of his services in their behalf, deny him compensation for his services. The principle of law applicable is stated by Judge Ritz, in Chafin v. Main Island Creek Coal Co., 85 W. Va. 459, 102 S. E. 291, as follows:

"Where a private corporation accepts the benefit of a contract made on its behalf by an unauthorized agent, it thereby ratifies the contract in its entirety, and will be bound to perform the obligations provided by the contract to be performed on its part."

Authorities sustaining this proposition are collated in that case, and it would serve no useful purpose to make additional citations or comment thereon. Some of the witnesses testified that McDermott's services were worth, on quantum meruit, more than the 4 per cent. contracted for.

It is insisted that Palmer was not able to pay the purchase price, and did not pay, and therefore McDermott is entitled to no compensation under his contract to produce a purchaser who could and would pay $1,000,000 cash. In addition to what we have said concerning the voluntary change in the terms of a sale by the vendor, without the consent of the agent or broker, it may be observed that there is no direct evidence to show that Palmer was not financially responsible to pay at the time of the purchase, or at the time of the taking back of the property, under the forfeiture clause of the sale agreement by the corporation. The record is replete with failures of Palmer to make his payments when due, and that he had difficulty in raising the $250,000 which he did pay. No effort appears to have been made to ascertain if the obligation of his purchase could have been successfully asserted; no judgment obtained. The corporation elected to take back its property and keep the money already paid. However, we think his failure to pay has little bearing on the right of McDermott to receive compensation for his services. Linton v. Johnson, supra; 19 Cyc. 271.

There is evidence to show that the officers of the corporation, and especially the executive committee of the board of directors, knew that the purchaser, Palmer, was procured by McDermott, and that McDermott was to receive a commission therefor, prior to the agreement of November 22, 1912, although the records of the corporation do not disclose that it was discussed at any of the official meetings. Phillips testified that the executive committee knew of it before that time, and Walton Miller, the treasurer of the company, and M. L. Hutchinson, the vice president, state that they had knowledge of McDermott's contract; and it would be most natural that the close business associates and friends of the president whom he said would "go along with him," and who owned 75 per cent. or 80 per cent. of the stock, would be advised of the full details, at least informally. Those who signed the agreement to sell, and which agreement was unanimously ratified at the stockholders' meeting, do not appear as witnesses to negative such information.

Strongly indicative of this knowledge is the payment of $5,000 to McDermott on his commission on February 21, 1913, out of the money paid by the purchaser, and then in bank to the credit of Watson, trustee, by Walton Miller, the treasurer of the corporation, after consulting with and receiving concurrence of members of the directorate. Would they pay out this sum without knowledge? Shrewd, successful business men, responsible to their stockholders, do not usually pay out such sums blindly. Watson disapproved of the payment, after returning from the South, but there was no demand made on McDermott for return of the money as an erroneous or unauthorized payment; neither was any action taken to recover it from him. This payment not only indicated knowledge of the contract and confirmation of it, but recognized that there was merit in the claim. McDermott never claimed less than his full commission agreed upon, and was in Fairmont insisting upon its payment when the check was drawn in his favor for the $5,000. The law imputes to a person knowledge of facts of which the exercise of common prudence and ordinary diligence must have apprized him. Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594. Knowledge of the acts of an agent and confirmation or acquiescence therein may be deduced from circumstances and facts of the case. Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 867.

[3] There was an agreement between McDermott and Gressler that the former should participate with the latter in whatever compensation the latter should receive from Palmer the purchaser, and this fact is interposed by the defense to defeat McDermott's compensation, on the theory of dual agency, or that he was representing principals whose interests were opposed. McDermott had no discretion in making the contract between the vendor and vendee. He did not participate therein, and was not present. All he contracted to do was to find and introduce the purchaser who would take the property at a stipulated price. He was what is termed a middleman. In such cases the doctrine of conflicting dual agency and bad faith does not apply.

"A middleman who acts as a broker in bringing together buyer and seller, and who does not act as the agent of either in making the contract of purchase, is entitled to compensation from both, on an agreement with each." Runnion v. Morrison, 71 W. Va. 254, 76 S. E. 457, and authorities there cited; Peters v. Riley, 73 W. Va. 785, 81 S. E. 530.

Where an agent is representing two or more principals of divergent and opposing interests, and from the nature of his employment they are entitled to his judgment, discretion or personal influence, he will not be permitted to act unless with their full knowledge and consent; but where neither principal relies upon the judgment or discretion of the agent in some transaction, he violates no duty in undertaking to perform the service for both, and therefore may properly have compensation from both. Montross v. Eddy, 94 Mich. 100, 53 N. W. 916. 34 Am. St. Rep. 323; Knauss v. Gottfried Brewing Co., 142 N. Y. 70, 36 N. E. 887; Green v. Robertson, 64 Cal. 76, 28 Pac. 448.

[4] Defendants further say that plaintiff is not entitled to the benefit of his commission contract because there never was a purchase of the assets of the corporation by Palmer. They construe the agreement by which he took over the property as an option contract, and hence plaintiff did not find or produce a purchaser as his contract required. An inspection of the agreement of November 22, 1912, afterwards approved and confirmed by the stockholders, impels the conclusion that there was a full and complete sale of the property of the corporation to Palmer. In carrying out that agreement, the stockholders, after reciting the terms thereof, resolved:

"That this company do grant, convey, assign, transfer, and set over unto said Fairmont Gas Company, for said Russell Palmer, the said property rights, privileges and franchises, at the price and upon the terms and conditions in said agreement set out"

—and directed its proper officers to make, execute, and deliver proper deeds." All parties considered a sale had been made, and the purchaser took charge of the property, deeds were made and placed in escrow, money to the amount of a quarter of a million dollars was paid over in pursuance of the purchase. The transaction had few earmarks of an option. An option generally is a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another that he shall have the right to purchase the same at a fixed price within a specified time. It is a contract to sell if the other party shall elect to purchase within the time given.

"An option contract to purchase is but a continuing offer to sell, and conveys no interest in the property." Caldwell v. Frazier, 65 Kan. 24, 68 Pac. 1076.

It is a privilege to purchase, and is unlike a contract of sale, which gives mutuality of remedy to both parties, which either can enforce by specific performance. See John v. Elkins, 63 W. Va. 158, 59 S. E. 961.

The decree of the circuit court of Marion county, entered on July 20, 1920, is reversed in so far as it adjudges the Fairmont Gas & Light Company to be indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $7,275; and proceeding to render such decree as should have been entered by said court, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff Joseph H. McDermott do recover of and from the Fairmont Gas & Light Company the sum of $35,000, with interest thereon from December 21, 1912, being the remainder of the commission or compensation due to said McDermott, in his own right, and as assignee of his coplaintiff, Gressler, at the rate of 4 per cent. on $1,000,000, less the sum of $5,000 heretofore paid to said McDermott by said company, and that the stockholders of said company, to whom distribution was made of the assets of said company, are, and each of them, is liable to account for and pay over to said McDermott such prorative part of the amounts received from said assets of said company as shall be necessary to pay off and satisfy said sum of $35,000 and interest found to be due and owing to said McDermott. And this cause is remanded to the circuit court of Marion county to ascertain and fix the amount to be paid by each stockholder, as herein ordered, and for such other proceedings as may be necessary to effect the relief herein awarded.

Reversed and remanded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Injunction  $\Leftrightarrow$  148(1)—Injunction bond may be made payable to state or to party entitled to its benefit.

In accordance with the provisions of section 5, c. 10, Code 1918 (Code 1913, sec. 255), an injunction bond, given to indemnify those against whom injunctive relief is sought, may be made payable, either to the state of West Virginia, or to the parties entitled to its benefit and protection.

2. Injunction  $\Leftrightarrow$  248—Party entitled to benefit of injunction bond payable to state may sue thereon without joining other beneficiaries.

Where an injunction bond is made payable to the state of West Virginia, one of the parties entitled to the benefit of its penalty may, after dissolution of the injunction, prosecute a suit on such bond in the name of the state, for his own use, without joining the other beneficiaries.

3. Injunction  $\Leftrightarrow$  248—Declaration in suit on injunction bond held not subject to demurrer for nonjoinder of parties plaintiff.

A declaration disclosing such facts is not subject to successful challenge by demurrer on the ground of nonjoinder of parties plaintiff.

Error to Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Action by the State, on the relation of the A. L. Black Coal Company, against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, demurrer overruled, and case remanded.

Moreland & Guy, of Morgantown, for plaintiff in error.

Glasscock & Glasscock, of Morgantown, for defendant in error.

LYNCH, J. In a suit begun in the circuit court of Monongalia county George E. Warren Company obtained an injunction mandatory in form and effect against A. L. Black Coal Company and Serepi Coal Company, whereby the court required defendants to furnish plaintiff monthly 4,550 tons of coal mined from Serepi mine No. 1, and the appointment of a receiver with authority to take into custody their property and fully execute its order. Plaintiff secured but did not join in the execution of the necessary bond required by the order before it should become effective, though in every other particular it conformed with the terms and conditions prescribed by statute. The United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company was the sole obligor. This order this court reversed upon appeal by A. L. Black Coal Company, the Serepi Coal Company not joining in the petition for the writ, dissolved the injunction, remanded the cause, and directed a settlement of the accounts of the receiver. 85 W. Va. 684, 102 S. E. 672.

The A. L. Black Coal Company then instituted this action to recover, under the provisions of the bond so executed, the costs incurred by it in defending its interests in the chancery cause and the damages suffered by it in consequence of the injunction order while in force and effect. This restraint it endeavored to remove more than once during the pendency of the suit. The declaration and each of its two counts the circuit court held insufficient on demurrer, both as originally presented and filed and as amended. This the court did chiefly on the ground of the nonjoinder of Serepi Coal Company as coplaintiff. As these were the two principal defendants in the Warren Company's suit and the object of the bond was to indemnify both, they should have united in the action, is the argument of the surety company.

Although not material or decisive, it is interesting and instructive to note that prior to the date of the Warren Company suit there was a reorganization of the Serepi Coal Company, by virtue of which the A. L. Black Coal Company, by purchase at a judicial sale, took over the property and the control and management of the reorganized corporation, as it theretofore had demonstrated its incapacity to operate the property so as to maintain its credit and meet its obligations. If Serepi Coal Company did not in this manner lose its corporate identity, it did divest itself of all its assets, and therefore ceased to be susceptible of injury growing out of anything done in the Warren suit. Its status at that time and now is of no consequence in so far as the merits of the present case are concerned.

[1-3] But wholly apart from this consideration and independent of it, the misconception of the legal necessity for the joinder as plaintiffs in one action of all persons who are within the terms of the indemnity, whatever their capacity to sue may be, is reasonably apparent, considering the nature and characteristics of the instrument. It purports to be a bond, payable to the state of West Virginia, to indemnify the defendants in the preceding suit against loss or damages sustained by them or either of them as a result of the restraint imposed by the court's order, and each of them may sue thereon for the injury sustained without joining the other as plaintiff; the only limitation of the recovery, or recoveries being that fixed by section 2, c. 10, Code (sec. 252), which provides that no amount in excess of the penalty of the bond is recoverable, except for the necessary costs and expenses of the several actions on the instrument. Besides, in statutory bonds, that is, those specifically required by law, and an injunction bond is so required, there is generally but one obligee and therefore there cannot be more than one plaintiff, however many may be the persons who are entitled to invoke the remedy so provided for the redress of grievances occasioned by the abuse of the rights of the persons concerned. A person to be affected may, according to section 5, c. 10, Code (sec. 255), accept an injunction bond payable to him or to him and others to suit the emergencies of the case. That, however, is unusual, and was not the mode adopted in this instance. The bond sued on is payable to the state, and that is the ordinary practice.

The declaration, read as a whole, seems plainly to indicate a defense based upon the activity of A. L. Black Coal Company from the beginning to the end of the suit brought against it and Serepi Coal Company, and the latter, though a necessary party, remained practically inactive in the meantime and was not an appellant in this court. The former alone employed counsel who prepared the argument and otherwise assisted in the defense of its rights.

Had the bond specifically named as formal obligees the two companies who were the real beneficiaries of the bond, as section 5, c. 10, Code, permitted, doubtless, according to general rules applicable to joint parties to a contract, one could not have maintained a suit without joining the other. But here the state of West Virginia is the only formal obligee, and section 2 expressly authorizes it to prosecute a suit "for the benefit of * * * any * * * person injured by a breach of the condition of any such bond." As already noted, the only limit placed upon such suits is that damages are recoverable upon the instrument only until in the aggregate they equal the penalty thereof. Hence, in view of the express statutory authority to sue, considered in connection with the mere formal status of the Serepi Coal Company, we are of opinion that the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration and dismissing it upon plaintiff's failure to amend. Harrington v. Gordon, 42 Wash. 692, 80 Pac. 187; Kitsap County Bank v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 90 Wash. 12, 20, 155 Pac. 411.

From what has been said, it necessarily follows that the judgment complained of must be reversed, the demurrer overruled, and the case remanded for further proceedings therein.

GEORGIA SOUTHERN & F. RY. CO. v. SMILEY. (No. 2302.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 11, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Provisions of statute of limitations.

Under Civ. Code 1910, § 4497, all actions to recover damages for personal injuries must be brought within two years after the right of action accrues.

2. Act of Congress authorizes actions against carriers under federal control.

Under Federal Control Act, § 10 (Fed. Stat. Ann. Supp. 1918, p. 757 [U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 8115½]), all actions at law or suits in equity can be brought against common carriers under federal control as theretofore provided by law, and no defense can be made thereto on the ground that the carrier was an instrumentality or agency of the federal government.

3. Evidence — 22(1)—Railroads — 5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal act suspending limitations inapplicable to state courts; service of process during federal control permissible; judicial notice taken that corporation is domestic one.

Section 206 (f) of the act of Congress passed February 28, 1920 (Fed. Stat. Ann. Supp. 1920, p. 79), which provides that "the period of federal control shall not be computed as a part of the periods of limitations in actions against carriers or in claims for reparation to the Commission for causes of action arising prior to federal control," applies only to federal courts.

4. Demurrer erroneously overruled.

The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by Cora Smiley against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. E. Hall and C. J. Bloch, both of Macon, and Patterson, Copeland & Slater, of Valdosta, for plaintiff in error.

F. S. Harrell, of Valdosta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. Cora Smiley brought suit against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company, in the city court of Valdosta, to recover damages in the sum of $5,000, on account of alleged personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff. The material portions of the petition were in substance as follows:

On December 11, 1917, plaintiff purchased from the agent of the defendant at Valdosta a ticket to Lake City, Fla., and was wrongfully directed to a train of the defendant going to Jacksonville, instead of to Lake City. By reason of being directed to the wrong train the plaintiff was ejected by the conductor, and in alighting from the train she sustained certain personal injuries. The petition was filed on June 23, 1920, more than two years after the alleged tort. On the date of the injuries complained of, and until November 11, 1918, the United States of America was actively engaged in war with Germany; and on account of the war the physical properties of the defendant were, on January 1, 1918, taken possession of by the United States government, and were operated by the government through its Director General of Railroads from that date until March 1, 1920, and the agents of the defendant became the agents of the United States government, and no service could be perfected upon the defendant during that period. It was further alleged that under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1920 (41 Stat. 456), the statute of limitations was suspended as to the cause of action herein alleged, for and during the period of federal control of the defendant's properties. Certain acts of negligence which contributed to the injury were alleged; and judgment was prayed against the defendant for the amount of damages set out above.

The defendant filed its demurrer to the petition, setting out, among other grounds, that the petition showed on its face that the claim set up by the plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations of the state of Georgia. The defendant demurred specially to paragraph 12 of the petition, on the ground that the Congress of the United States did not have, at the time of the passage of the Transportation Act, which was approved February 28, 1920, and has not now, the constitutional authority to toll or change the statute of limitations of the state of Georgia, as related to the cause of action attempted to be set up in the petition. The demurrer was overruled by the trial court upon each and every ground, both general and special, and the defendant excepted.

[1-3] The petition alleged that the cause of action arose on December 11, 1917. The petition was filed on June 22, 1920, more than two years after the date of the alleged injury. Civil Code (1910) § 4497, declares that actions for injuries done to the person shall be brought within two years after the right of action accrues. The suit is therefore barred, unless the above statute is tolled by the Transportation Act of Congress passed in 1920. That act provides that—

"The period of federal control shall not be computed as a part of the periods of limitation in actions against carriers, or in claims for reparation to the Commission for causes of action arising prior to federal control." Fed. Stat. Ann. 1920 Supp. p. 79 (f).

The question arises, therefore, whether the above act of Congress, declaring the suspension of the statute of limitations, is binding on the state courts. On March 21, 1918, Congress passed an act (Fed. Stat. Ann. 1918 Supp. p. 757) known as the federal Control Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115 $\frac{1}{4}$ a-3115 $\frac{1}{4}$ p). In section 10 (section 3115 $\frac{1}{4}$ j) it is provided:

"That carriers while under federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such federal control or with any order of the President. Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the federal government. Nor shall any such carrier be entitled to have transferred to a federal court any action heretofore or hereafter instituted by or against it, which action was not so transferable prior to the federal control of such carrier; and any action which has heretofore been so transferred because of such federal control or of any act of Congress or official order or proclamation relating thereto shall, upon motion of either party, be transferred to the court in which it was originally instituted. But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such federal control."

From reading the above section of the act of Congress of 1918 it will be seen that actions at law or suits in equity might be brought by and against common carriers, and judgments rendered, as then provided by law; and it was also provided that no defense should be made to such suits upon the ground that the carrier was an instrumentality or agency of the federal government. It seems, therefore, that the plaintiff in the present case could have brought and maintained her suit in the state courts, even under the federal statute, at any time within the period fixed by the state statute. Not having brought the suit within the period fixed by the state statute, can the state statute be tolled by the federal statute of 1920? There is nothing in the federal act of 1920 which expressly, or by necessary implication, repeals the authority conferred by the act of 1918 to bring the suit in the state courts according to law. The federal Control Act specifically preserves the right of parties who had causes of action to bring them against the carriers during the period of federal control and to prosecute such suits to judgment. The act also provides that executions based on judgments so obtained should not be levied upon the property of the carriers in the hands of the federal government. See section 10 of the Federal Control Act, supra. But the act expressly conferred the right to sue and to prosecute the suit to judgment. And see McGregor v. Great Northern (N. D.) 172 N. W. 841, 845 (4 A. L. R. 1635), where it was said that—

"Both the President in his original proclamation and Congress in the act of March 21, 1918, clearly contemplated that the liability of the carrier should continue. * * * Since the liability continued, it is competent for the suitor to resort to the ordinary legal remedies to establish it," etc.

It is argued here that suit could not have been brought, because service could not be perfected on the defendant during the period of federal control. As has been pointed out, the plaintiff had the right to sue within the period fixed by the statute, and also under the Federal Control Act; and if she had the right to sue, she would have the right to perfect service on the defendant if a resident of the state of Georgia, and it had its principal office located within the state where service could have been perfected. This court will take judicial cognizance of the fact that the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company is a corporation existing under the laws of this state. See A. & W. P. R. Co. v. A. B. & A. R. Co., 124 Ga. 125, 52 S. E. 320.

In Small v. Slocumb, 112 Ga. 279, 281, 37 S. E. 481, 53 L. R. A. 180, 81 Am. St. Rep. 50, this court held:

"Congress has power to levy and collect taxes by requiring revenue stamps to be placed upon certain written instruments, and has power to prescribe a punishment for the failure or refusal to comply with that requirement, and to provide that such instruments shall not, unless stamped, be admissible * * * in the federal courts. It has, however, no power to prescribe rules of evidence for a state court, and therefore the act of Congress, which declares that certain written instruments shall not be received in evidence in any court until stamped as required by the act, is to be understood as applicable to the federal courts only."

In delivering the opinion of the court Chief Justice Simmons said:

"Under our system of government, the states retain all powers of sovereignty which were not granted to the general government by the Constitution. They had the power to create and establish their own courts, and to regulate the practice and procedure, and to prescribe rules of evidence therein. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which expressly or by implication gives to Congress the power to prescribe rules of evidence for the courts of the states. Of course Congress, having the power to impose stamp duties, has the power to provide for the enforcement of their payment by any necessary and proper means. But while to make unstamped instruments inadmissible in evidence in state courts would doubtless aid in compelling the payment of the tax, we think that such a method of collection is neither necessary nor proper, and is therefore not within the power of Congress. The act of 1898 subjects to a penalty any one who fails or refuses to comply with the provisions as to stamping written instruments, and the federal courts have ample machinery for the enforcement of this penalty. No other method of enforcement would seem to be necessary; but, even if it were, Congress has power to provide that no unstamped instruments shall be received in evidence in any of the federal courts. Any attempt to extend this provision, so as to make it applicable to the courts of the several states cannot, therefore, be defended upon the ground that it is necessary. Nor do we think it a proper means of enforcing the stamp act to interfere with the courts peculiarly within the control of the several states, by declaring what shall or shall not be used as evidence in them, or to seek to make the state courts punish a failure to comply with the federal stamp act by refusing to allow unstamped documents to be used as evidence in them. This, however, is no new question. It has been dealt with by the courts of many of the states. We have searched diligently in the reports of the decisions of the various state courts, and have found but one state court of last resort which has made and adhered to a decision that Congress had the right to prescribe that an unstamped instrument should not be received in evidence in a state court."

The Chief Justice (after citing and discussing the case just referred to—Chartiers, etc., Co. v. McNamara, 72 Pa. St. 278, 13 Am. Rep. 673) further said:

"In the cases of Clemens v. Conrad, 19 Mich. 170, and Sammons v. Halloway, 21 Mich. 162, Judge Cooley, the great expounder of constitutional law in this country, shows by his reasoning that Congress has no power to prescribe a rule of evidence for state courts, and that the act should therefore be construed as intended to apply to federal courts only. In the former case he said, in part: 'To make an instrument inadmissible in evidence because not sufficiently stamped is, however, quite a different thing from imposing penalties for a breach of the revenue laws. The latter punishes the guilty party or compels him to perform his duty to the government; the former imposes what may sometimes be equivalent to a forfeiture of rights upon any party, guilty or innocent, who chances to be so circumstanced that he cannot make a showing of his rights in court without the production of the unstamped instrument. * * * A law so highly penal, it is to be presumed, has been so framed as clearly to point out all the cases to which it was designed to apply, so as to leave nothing to inference. In attempting properly to construe it, it is proper to bear in mind the position of the body which enacted it, relatively to the different legal tribunals of the country. Congress creates the courts which operate within the sphere of federal sovereignty and administer the judicial power conferred by the Constitution of the United States. For them it prescribes rules of evidence and may establish a course of practice. It has no such general power as regards the state courts. Those courts have another origin, and their rules of evidence and courses of proceeding are prescribed by a different legislative body. Waiving, in the present case, any discussion of the question whether the state courts are not agencies of state government, which are beyond the sphere of the taxing power of the nation and fully at liberty to investigate in their own modes, under the laws of the state, the questions of fact which are put in issue before them, we think it a just and reasonable interpretation of the law of Congress that the courts which are precluded from receiving unstamped instruments in evidence are only the federal courts. * * * We think that a rule of evidence laid down in general terms is to be understood as applicable to those courts only for which the Legislature prescribing it has general power to make rules, and not to other courts, not expressly named, over which it has no such general power and with whose proceedings it could interfere, if at all, only in exceptional cases.' See also Cooley, Const. Llm. (8th Ed.) 592 and note."

And see other authorities cited in the Small Case, supra.

We think that the reasoning in that case, and the other authorities cited in support of it, as to the want of authority of Congress under the Constitution of the United States to prescribe rules of evidence and a course of practice in state courts, is applicable to the facts of the instant case. But the act of Congress of 1920, cited supra, is general in its terms, and does not attempt, expressly or by implication, to make it apply to the state courts; and we must conclude, therefore, that Congress in passing that act had no intention to toll the statute of the states with reference to the time in which damage suits for personal injuries should be brought. And even if Congress had attempted to do so, we do not think that it was within its power, under the Constitution of the United States, to so toll the statute of this state as to authorize the plaintiff in the present case to bring her suit after it was barred by the state statute quoted in the beginning of this opinion. We think the act of Congress of 1920, being general in its terms, applies to federal courts only, for which Congress alone can prescribe rules for their guidance.

[4] This ruling being controlling of the right of the plaintiff to bring her action at all, it appearing upon the face of the petition that the plaintiff's cause of action, which is a suit for personal injuries, is barred by the statute of this state, it is unnecessary to decide the other question raised, as to whether the petition sets forth a cause of action. From what has been said above, it follows that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LOWTHER v. OHIO VALLEY OIL & GAS CO. (No. 4018.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 19, 1921. Rehearing Denied
September 7, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$ 176—Judgment on instruction stating agreed facts binding though one was mistaken as to verity of facts.

An instruction given to the jury and stating facts agreed upon by the parties is binding and conclusive upon the parties so agreeing, and a verdict and judgment based thereon will not be disturbed by the appellate court although the evidence tends to show that one of the parties to the agreed instruction was mistaken as to the verity of the facts agreed upon, where such instruction is given at the conclusion of the evidence without objection or exception, and no motion for continuance is made, nor evidence that the party was misled or taken by surprise submitted to the court upon a motion to set aside the verdict.

2. Detinue  $\S$ 7, 22—Formal demand not necessary except to convert lawful possession into unlawful detention; whether demand made held for jury.

It is not necessary in an action of detinue to make a formal demand for the delivery of property; but in order to convert a lawful possession into an unlawful detention a demand must be made, and from the date of the demand damages for the detention will begin to accrue. Whether such demand was made is a question of fact for the jury.

3. Stipulations  $\S$ 14(4)—Question as to unlawful detention of property may be eliminated by agreement.

Where the parties in a suit in detinue have agreed in open court in writing that the defendant unlawfully detains the property which is the subject of the litigation, and by such agreement limits the issue to the time when such unlawful detention began, the question as to whether or not the detention was lawful is eliminated, and the verdict will not be disturbed because unlawful detention by the defendant was not clearly proven.

4. Detinue  $\S$ 19—Measure of damages for unlawful detention is value of use of property during detention.

The measure of damages for unlawful detention of property is ordinarily the value of the use of the property during the detention, and an instruction to this effect in a detinue suit is proper where there are no special circumstances or damages to change the ordinary rule.

5. New trial  $\S$ 143(1)—Verdict cannot be impeached by testimony of jurors.

The testimony of jurors will not be received to impeach their verdict.

6. Detinue  $\S$ 24—Verdict for detention of property held sufficient in form.

A verdict in an action of detinue which finds for the plaintiff, gives the items, and values of the items, of the property unlawfully detained by the defendant, and further finds as follows: "And we assess two thousand two hundred and eighty-eight $2,288.00 dollars for the detention of said property"—is good, and is sufficient to show that the said sum of $2,288 is the amount assessed as damages for the unlawful detention.

7. Trial  $\S$ 340(5)—Judge may write down amount found by jury in words and may correct clerical errors in so doing.

It is not error for the judge, upon receiving a verdict, to write therein the amount of damages in words, which the jury have found in figures, in the presence of the jury, and if in so doing he has made a clerical error, so that the words do not correspond with the figures and state the true amount, to then correct the clerical error in the presence of the jury, and with their assent, before they are discharged.

Error to Circuit Court, Ritchie County.

Detinue by C. F. Lowther against the Ohio Valley Oil & Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Thos. J. Davis, of Harrisville, for plaintiff in error.

Adams & Cooper, of Harrisville, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. This writ of error brings for review a judgment of the circuit court of Ritchie county in which C. F. Lowther, in an action of detinue against the Ohio Valley Oil & Gas Company, was adjudged the possession of a No. 24 Star drilling machine and certain other personal property, or if the specific property could not be had, the alternative value thereof as ascertained by a jury, and $2,288 damages for the detention thereof.

[1] An agreed instruction was given the jury which is as follows:

"The jury are instructed that by agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, entered into at the bar of the court at the beginning of the trial of this case, it is admitted that the plaintiff was and is the owner of the property sued for and mentioned in the declaration and is entitled to a verdict therefor, or for the value thereof in case the same cannot be had, and the issues are confined to the question when the unlawful detention from the plaintiff of the property mentioned in the declaration or any part thereof began, the value of the property detained and the damages, if any, sustained by the plaintiff on account of such unlawful detention; and all questions as to the rent, if anything, to which the plaintiff may be entitled for the use of said property by the defendant prior to the beginning of the unlawful detention and the question of compensation to which the defendant may be entitled for repairs on said property are reserved for future adjudication in the action of assumpsit of the plaintiff against the defendant, now pending in this court.

"You are further instructed that the values to be found by you of the several articles detained, for the purpose of this case, are as set forth in the prepared form of verdict agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendant, and submitted to you, but such values are not to be binding upon the parties or to affect their rights in said action of assumpsit."

In the progress of the trial it appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that the drilling machine and other equipment was on certain leases which had been transferred to the defendant by plaintiff, and the defendant then claimed that all of the property on the leases at the time of the transfer was sold to it by the plaintiff, and attempted to substantiate this claim by the testimony of its president, Mr. Banta, that its contract of purchase included all of the property of every kind on the leases at the time of the purchase and transfer, but not having the contract and not then being able to produce it, the testimony concerning the contents of the contract was not permitted to go to any further length. The defendant claimed that it did not know that the property sued for was on the leases at the time of the transfer, nor until the plaintiff had so stated in the trial, and until that moment was not advised that it had any interest in or claim to the property in litigation. However, it made no effort to obtain a continuance on account of surprise, proceeded with the trial of the case, and made no exception or objection to giving to the jury the agreed instruction, which admitted that the plaintiff was then the owner of the property sued for and entitled to a verdict therefor. Generally a litigant who is surprised in a trial must then protect his interests by non-suit or continuance, or some other appropriate motion or proceeding. He cannot take the chance of an adverse verdict, and, when such a verdict is rendered, ask to have it set aside in order to correct his mistake. Frymier v. Railroad Co., 76 W. Va. 96, 85 S. E. 26. Moreover, the motion to set aside the verdict was not predicated on surprise or newly discovered evidence of defendant's ownership of the property. Presumptively it had abandoned this claim of ownership in the court below. Defendant's third assignment of error, to the effect that the trial court should have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial because of its possible and undeveloped claim of ownership, is not well taken. It is asserted for the first time in this court. Henderson v. Hazlett, 75 W. Va. 255, 83 S. E. 907.

[2] The agreed instruction confined the issues to the date when the unlawful detention of the property by the defendant began, the value of the property (which was also agreed upon and given to the jury as agreed values), and the damages, if any, sustained by the plaintiff on account of such unlawful detention. It would serve no purpose to consider the assignments of error upon matters which have been eliminated by this agreed instruction. Facts agreed upon by the parties in open court are binding, and a decree or judgment based thereon will not be reversed. McCoy v. McCoy, 74 W. Va. 64, 81 S. E. 562, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 367. When did the unlawful detention begin? After considerable negotiations for the delivery of the property to plaintiff it was agreed by the president of the defendant company with plaintiff, on February 19, 1918, that the property would be delivered forthwith to plaintiff, and that the adjustment of rent therefor and of the bill for repairs made on the machine would be made later. Before this agreement was carried out defendant learned that the Bruce heirs claimed the ownership of the property, and learning that the plaintiff was not financially responsible, as it claimed, or fearing that he was not financially responsible, refused to carry out the agreement for delivery of the property made by its president, but stated in a letter to the plaintiff dated February 23, 1918, that as soon as he sent the company satisfactory evidence of his title, and would arrange for a settlement of the moneys expended by it in rebuilding the machine, it would then deliver the property. On March 4, 1918, the Bruce heirs wrote to defendant, formally relinquishing all claim to the property, which letter defendant admitted it received on the 6th or 7th of March, 1918. The amount of expenditures in rebuilding the machine claimed by the defendant was not furnished the plaintiff, although urged by him, and at one time, in order to get it out of the way he proposed to "guess it off." A bailee's lien may be waived by agreement, or by implication arising from the bailee's acts. Under the agreement of February 19, 1918, this item was to be left open for adjustment together with the rent for the machine then owing to the plaintiff; and by the agreed instruction these two items are eliminated from this case and reserved for settlement in an assumpsit suit pending for that purpose. The plaintiff testified that after the Bruce heirs had relinquished all claim to the property, the defendant refused to deliver it to him or permit him to take any part of it. There is no substantial controversy about these facts. On this evidence the jury found that the unlawful detention began on April 1, 1918. We think this evidence warranted the jury in fixing this date, and that a sufficient demand had been made for delivery of the property before that time,

After the defendant notified plaintiff that it had no further use for the property, all of which it had been using in its business, and that it would pay no further rental thereon, all of the efforts of the plaintiff to get possession were implied demands, finally terminating in an agreement to deliver, which was afterwards repudiated. Under such circumstances no formal specific demand was necessary. Refusal had been sufficiently made to obviate the necessity thereof.

After April 1, 1918, there were frequent letters and telegrams between the parties in an effort to effect an adjustment out of court, and evidencing an intention on the part of the plaintiff to resort to the courts if the property was not promptly delivered.

[3] There were two interrogatories propounded to the jury on motion of the plaintiff and objected to by defendant:

First. "Did the defendant unlawfully detain from the plaintiff the property in controversy prior to the date of the institution of this suit?"

Second. "If so, when did the unlawful detention begin?"

The submission of these interrogatories is assigned as error. It will be again observed that one of the issues submitted by the agreed instruction was as to when the unlawful detention began. The fact that the detention was unlawful seems to have been agreed upon, and therefore it was unnecessary and improper; but we can see no harm in thus bringing that question to the special attention and finding of the jury. It was harmless error. The plaintiff claimed the detention was unlawful and began on the 19th day of February, 1918, and the defendant claimed it to have begun on May 9, 1918. It was very material for the jury to determine when the unlawful detention began in order to ascertain from what date the damages should accrue. Where interrogatories tend to ascertain and separate one or more facts controlling the judgment, such interrogatories should be encouraged and promoted. Peninsular v. Franklin Ins. Co., 35 W. Va. 666, 14 S. E. 237.

[4] The following instruction given for the plaintiff is claimed as erroneous:

"The jury are further instructed that the measure of damages if any sustained by the plaintiff is the value of the use or hire of the property detained from the time the unlawful detention began to the date of the verdict."

This instruction correctly propounds the true measure of damages in an ordinary case of detention, and there are no special items of damages claimed here. Wayne v. Cyphers, 80 W. Va. 336, 92 S. E. 590; 18 O. J. P. 1024; 4 Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) 4317. But it is insisted that the instruction assumes, or would lead the jury to believe, that the detention of the property was unlawful, thus invading the province of the jury upon the determination of a material fact at issue. As heretofore shown, the parties had agreed that the detention was unlawful, and limited the issue to when the unlawful detention began.

[5] The only other question left open by the agreed instruction was the amount of damages to be assessed. Complaint is made that the jury ascertained and fixed the damages at $4 per day from April 1, 1918, to the date of the verdict. The complaint is not based on the amount of the damages, but on the method by which the basis of $4 per day was fixed, as disclosed by the affidavits of two jurors. There was evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, which does not appear to have been controverted, that the use of the machine and equipment sued for was worth $12 per day, and hence the damages assessed, by whatever calculation or method arrived at by the jury, are much less than they might have been under the evidence. Had the sum been greater, we do not perceive how the verdict could have been disturbed under this evidence. After judgment on the verdict had been entered and the court had adjourned, but before completion of the bills of exception, two jurors made affidavits to the effect that some members of the jury were in favor of assessing $12 per day as damages, and others at less sums, while possibly four were not in favor of allowing any damages, but that in order to arrive at a verdict it was agreed that each juror should state the amount of damages per day he would assess, and the total divided by 11 (one of the jurors having been excused for cause) should be the verdict, which method was adopted, resulting in a composition verdict of $4 per day, and that Sundays and holidays were excluded from the number of days between April 1, 1918 (which date they had agreed upon as the day when the unlawful detention began), and the day of the verdict. The judge of the lower court, being of the opinion that he had no authority to consider the affidavits or then grant the defendant a new trial, gave the defendant the benefit of exceptions to his ruling in that regard and signed bill of exception No. 4, which incorporated the two affidavits. The refusal of the court to set aside the verdict and judgment because of the facts disclosed by these two affidavits is assigned as error. The judgment had been entered on the verdict, and the term of court had ended, and the defendant had given bond for suspension of the judgment while perfecting an appeal to this court. The court very properly refused to consider these affidavits at the time presented; and even if they had been presented before judgment and before the end of the term, they could not have been considered. A juror cannot impeach the verdict. Pickens v. Boom

Co., 58 W. Va. 11, 50 S. E. 872, 6 Ann. Cás. 285; Probst v. Braeunlich, 24 W. Va. 356; Reynolds v. Tompkins, 23 W. Va. 229.

[7] Bill of exceptions No. 3 complains of the action of the court in writing in the verdict when returned, in words, the amount of damages fixed by the verdict in figures. The jury had fixed the damages at $2,288 (in figures), and the court in writing the amount in words made a mistake and wrote "two thousand two hundred and eight"; but when his clerical mistake was discovered it was immediately corrected so as to correspond with the figures, before the jury left the court room, and to which correction the jury assented. We perceive no error in this action of the judge in correcting his clerical error. How has the defendant been prejudiced? The exception is extremely technical and without merit.

[8] Exception is made to the form of the verdict because it does not state that the sum of $2,288 was given as damages for the detention of the property. The verdict reads:

"We the jury find for the plaintiff, and fix the value of the property sued for in this action as follows (then each item of property and value is given). And we assess two thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, $2,288.00, dollars for the detention of said property."

It is clear and conclusive that the sum named for the detention was assessed as damages. It could have been given for no other purpose and under no other hypothesis and is responsive to the evidence and instructions. Peters v. Johnson, 50 W. Va. 644, 41 S. E. 190, 57 L. R. A. 428, 88 Am. St. Rep. 909; Lewis v. Childers, 13 W. Va. 1.

Exception is made to the judgment entered as enlarging the verdict and not responsive thereto. The judgment is for the possession of the property described in the verdict, and if any article cannot be had, then the value of such item of property as fixed and ascertained by the jury; and if none of the property can be had, then the aggregate value of the various items as so fixed, amounting to $5,973. The fact that a correct addition is made of the value of the various items, thus arriving at the total value, is not enlarging the judgment to the detriment of the defendant. The judgment is entirely consistent with the verdict.

It is claimed that the court improperly overruled a demurrer to the declaration. We cannot find from the record that a demurrer thereto was interposed.

There are many assignments of error which we do not consider as important and others which are rendered unimportant by the agreed instruction.

We can find no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

STATE v. LONG. (No. 4022.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 10, 1921. Rehearing Denied
September 7, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §789(4)—Instruction to acquit if reasonable doubt raised by evidence itself or by ingenuity of counsel erroneous.

An instruction in a trial for felony, which tells the jury that if a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused is raised in their minds by the evidence itself, or by the ingenuity of counsel, they should find the accused not guilty, is erroneous, and should be refused.

2. Arrest §63(3)—Police officer may arrest without warrant one committing breach of peace in his presence.

A police officer, within his jurisdiction, may lawfully arrest, without warrant, one who commits a breach of the peace in his presence or view.

3. Homicide §300(3)—Instruction as to right of person arrested without warrant to kill policeman erroneous.

Where a police officer, in attempting to arrest without warrant a person who is intoxicated, disorderly, loudly swearing and disturbing the peace, is shot and killed by that person, who, to excuse his act, relies on the defense of accidental discharge of the revolver in his hand caused by muscular reflex action superinduced by a blow on his cheek bone from the policeman's mace, and not upon self-defense or the unlawfulness of the attempted arrest, an instruction, which tells the jury that, if they believe the attempted arrest was unlawful, then the defendant was justified in repelling it with force, and to kill the policeman if such was necessary to protect himself from death or great bodily harm, is not properly drawn, and should be refused.

4. Criminal law §813, 1172(6)—Instructions propounding abstract propositions of law improper, but not reversible error, unless misleading.

Instructions, propounding abstract propositions of law, should not be given; but, if given, and there be evidence to which they are applicable, the appellate court will not reverse for that cause, unless it is clear that the jury has been misled or confused thereby.

5. Criminal law §806(2), 822(1)—Instructions for prosecution need not embody theory of defense if given in defendant's instructions; instructions must be considered as whole.

If the law applicable to and governing the theory of the defense is fully and fairly propounded in the instructions given for the defense, it is not necessary that those given for the prosecution should contain propositions of law relied upon by the defense, or that there should be incorporated therein the theory of the defense. Instructions must be considered together as a whole; an instruction based on one theory, unless binding, does not ignore another theory on which other instructions are given.

6. Criminal law §1172(1)—If context shows that word mistakenly used was not misleading it is not prejudicial.

Instructions must be considered in the light of the evidence; and if the context of an instruction and the evidence clearly show that one word therein was used for another, and that the jury could not have been misled by a mistake so clear and palpable, the error will not be considered as prejudicial.

7. Breach of the peace §1—“Breach of peace” defined.

A “breach of the peace” includes all violations of the public peace, order, or decorum, such as to make an affray; threaten to beat, wound, or kill another, or commit violence against his person or property; contend with angry words to the disturbance of the peace; appear in a state of gross intoxication in a public place; recklessly flourish a loaded pistol in a public place while intoxicated; and the like.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Breach of the Peace.]

8. Case approved.

Fourth point of the syllabus in State v. Weisengoff, 85 W. Va. 271, 101 S. E. 450, is approved and applied.

9. Criminal law §785(3)—Instruction as to extent to which jury are judges of evidence held erroneous.

An instruction which tells the jury that they are the sole judges of the evidence, and of the weight to be given thereto, and that they may believe or refuse to believe the testimony of any witness or any part of his evidence, is erroneous, prejudicial, and reversible error.

10. Criminal law §1153(3)—Order and time of introduction of evidence in discretion of trial court.

The order and time in which evidence shall be introduced is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and a verdict will rarely be reversed for that reason, unless clearly prejudicial.

11. Arrest §68—Known peace officer arresting without warrant need not disclose authority until request made therefor.

In making an arrest without a warrant, a known peace officer is not bound to disclose his character or authority, or give notice of his intention, until the party has submitted, or has demanded by what authority the arrest is made, as his known official character is sufficient in the first instance to require submission, unless a demand for disclosure of his authority is first made.

12. Criminal law §485(1) — Hypothetical question as to muscular reflex action causing discharge of pistol need not give remote details.

Where a violent blow on the cheek bone is struck with a policeman's mace, and it is designed to prove by expert testimony that the blow would cause muscular reflex action sufficient to immediately cause the discharge of an automatic pistol, then in the hand of the recipient of the blow, it is not necessary to incorporate in the hypothetical question, propounded to the expert witness, all the details of the evidence in the case, remote from the time when the blow was given; they could shed no light upon whether the blow given, as fully described and set out in the question propounded, would cause muscular reflex action.

13. Homicide §20—De facto officer entitled to same protection as if title undisputed and in prosecution for murder of de facto officer appointment and qualification need not be shown.

A de facto officer while engaged in the execution of his duties is entitled to the same protection from assault, obstruction, or interference, as if his title was undisputed, and in a prosecution for the murder of an officer de facto it is not necessary to prove that he was duly appointed or elected, or had duly qualified.

14. Homicide §165—Evidence of friendly relations between defendant and victim admissible to rebut element of malice.

Evidence tending to show friendly relations existing between one charged with homicide and his victim is admissible to rebut the element of malice, and it is error to refuse to allow it to go to the jury.

15. Witnesses §388(2)—Impeaching evidence inadmissible in absence of proper foundation.

Evidence of a witness, called solely for the purpose of impeaching another witness by contradicting his testimony on some particular point, but showing he had on other occasions made conflicting statements, should be refused, where no proper basis has been laid for the contradiction.

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County.

Charles Amos Long was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

T. M. McIntire, of New Martinsville, T. A. Brown, of Parkersburg, and Wm. T. George and J. Blackburn Ware, both of Philippi, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., Charles Ritchie, Asst. Atty. Gen., and G. W. Coffield, Pros. Atty., of New Martinsville, for the State.

LIVELY, J. Charles Amos Long was convicted of murder in the second degree in the circuit court of Wetzel county and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for a term of 12 years, and prosecutes this writ.

The defendant was a merchant and real estate dealer residing in the town of Pine Grove in Wetzel county and the evidence tended to show that in the late afternoon and evening of April 16, 1919, he became intoxicated, and was recklessly operating his automobile over the streets of that town, and was told that he must be arrested by Clem Long, a policeman of the town, for that offense. But while walking along the street, apparently in charge of the policeman, he drew his revolver and presented it at the policeman, with the statement that he would not be arrested, accompanying the act with words indicative of an intention of inflicting upon the policeman serious bodily harm. The arrest was thus successfully resisted, and the policeman afterwards went to the mayor's office and reported that the defendant had "bluffed" him, but did not ask for nor secure a warrant with which to apprehend him. The mayor advised the policeman not to attempt to arrest the defendant while intoxicated, but to wait until he was sober. A short time afterwards, and about an hour or three-quarters before the fatal shooting, the defendant again began speeding his car and acting generally in such a boisterous and reckless way as to attract the attention of a considerable crowd of the citizens who gathered together evidently to observe his acts. He went into a store on the main street of the town, where a shoe drummer was exhibiting to the merchant a line of sample shoes, and threw one or more of the shoes and some other articles of merchandise out of the store onto the sidewalk, one of the shoes striking a pedestrian. He then came out of the store and offered an apology to the person hit by the shoe, which apology not being accepted very readily, he became incensed, and wanted to have a fight with the supposed offender. At another store he became dissatisfied with some cigars which he had purchased from the merchant, and tore them up and threw them on the floor until he obtained one which was satisfactory, and then threw the money to pay for the same on the floor. At another time he approached the same policeman near defendant's store, and began quarreling with him and again threatened to shoot him with the same revolver, and called him a vile name in the presence of defendant's wife and various other persons. Shortly before the fatal shooting he got out of his car in front of his office, which was a short distance from his store, and attempted to unlock the office and enter, but, being unable to find the proper key or possibly to fit it in the lock, he again drew his pistol and asked a boy, of about 14 years of age, to take the pistol and shoot the lock off. By this time quite a crowd of the citizens had gathered on the street near by, evidently with the purpose of observing what would happen, and the defendant, perceiving Clem Long, the policeman, standing near the office and in the crowd, immediately approached him and began an altercation with him, swearing and abusing the policeman and making assertions that he could not and would not be arrested, and contending with the policeman with loud words and in a threatening manner. At this time defendant had placed his pistol in his right-hand coat pocket and was grasping it with his right hand. As a result of the altercation the policeman struck defendant a violent blow on the cheek bone with his mace, and about the time of the blow the pistol was discharged, the bullet entering the abdomen of the policeman above the hip bone, and passing through the body and out on the opposite side about four inches lower than the point of entrance, causing the death of the policeman some hours afterwards. The evidence is conflicting as to whether the shot was fired before the blow was struck, some of the witnesses so testifying, or whether the blow was struck first and the pistol fired afterwards. A large crowd had gathered and witnessed the difficulty, variously estimated at from 35 to 75 persons. All of the numerous witness agreed that there was not much difference in time between the firing of the shot and the blow. They were almost simultaneous. Defendant was either knocked down by the blow from the mace, or some other person hit him from behind, thus causing his fall. He was then disarmed with considerable difficulty and force by some of the bystanders, and immediately taken to jail.

This statement of the evidence is taken largely from the testimony of the witnesses for the state, and may be inaccurate in unimportant details, but it is sufficient to give the main facts out of which the difficulty arose.

Numerous alleged errors occurring in the trial are insisted upon by the defendant as cause for reversal of the judgment.

It is unnecessary to consider the first six assignments of error, in view of the disposition we have concluded to make of the case. They relate: (1) To refusal to continue the trial on the showing made, (a) because of absence and illness of counsel, (b) prejudice and ill feeling against the defendant in the county, and (c) absence of alleged material witnesses; (2) refusal to furnish defendant with a list of the jurors promptly upon request made by him; (3) entering of an order, in the absence of the defendant, refusing the request of the prosecuting attorney for a list of the jurors; (4) refusal to quash the entire panel of jurors because of the failure of the court to appoint jury commissioners under chapter 124, Acts 1919; (5) failure of the record to show that the sheriff was instructed to keep the jury together without communication with any one; and (6) failure of the record to show that the jury returned into court on October 9, a day of the trial, in custody of the sheriff. A cursory examination of these assignments leaves us under the impression that they are without merit; but it would serve no useful purpose to consider them critically, as none of them will likely arise upon a new trial.

[1] Instruction No. 6, offered by the defendant, was refused. It relates to reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. It tells the jury if a reasonable doubt is raised by the evidence itself, or by the ingenuity of counsel, upon any hypothesis reasonably consistent with the evidence, that doubt is decisive of the defendant's innocence. It is argued that the ingenuity of counsel means argument of counsel. The right of a prisoner to be heard at the bar through counsel is firmly established everywhere. It is conserved in our Bill of Rights, where it is expressly provided that the accused "shall have the assistance of counsel." Wide latitude is given to counsel in making their arguments to the jury, and it is their privilege to make such deductions as the evidence will justify. It has been held to be error to instruct the jury entirely to disregard argument of counsel. Garrison v. Wilcoxson, 11 Ga. 154; People v. Ambach, 247 Ill. 451, 93 N. E. 310. But instructions cautioning the jury not to regard statements of counsel in argument as evidence, and to disregard counsel's expressed belief that his client was innocent, have been held proper, as not destroying the effect of the argument. Smith v. State, 95 Ga. 472, 20 S. E. 291; State v. Heath, 237 Mo. 255, 141 S. W. 26. But the instruction here is not confined to argument of counsel, and can only be considered as relating to the argument by implication. The instruction relates to the ingenuity of counsel. Counsel in conducting trials often ingenuously propound questions and present improper evidence, and, although ruled out, it leaves its impression, which is sometimes difficult for a jury to discard. Counsel in argument will often ingenuously and disingenuously make statements of fact not warranted by the testimony. It would be traveling afar from the beaten paths to instruct jurors that they may base a reasonable doubt upon ingenuity of counsel in the conduct of the trial. There were other instructions for the defendant, notably Nos. 4, 5, 7, and 8, which fully covered the doctrine of reasonable doubt.

[2] Defendant's instruction No. 14, refused, told the jury that if they believed the deceased was a police officer, and, acting as such, without a warrant commanding the arrest of the defendant made an attack upon the defendant while on the streets of Pine Grove, and struck him a severe blow on the cheek bone with his mace, and thereby caused the pistol in the defendant's hand to be discharged from reflex muscular action, causing the death of the deceased, then they should find for the defendant, was properly refused. It is predicated on the assumption that a police officer cannot make an arrest without a warrant, which is not the law. A police officer may make arrests without warrant for offenses committed in his presence, and which amount to a breach of the peace. The defense relies on the decision in State v. Lutz, 101 S. E. 434, but that decision does not hold that an arrest by a policeman cannot be made without warrant. It expressly says that such an arrest may not be made, unless an offense, which is being committed in the presence of the officer, amounts to a breach of the peace. Besides the instruction leaves out the important element as to whether or not the policeman was acting unlawfully or without just cause. An arrest without a warrant is not per se unlawful. The instruction was an incomplete statement of the law, and would tend to mislead the jury.

Defendant's instructions Nos. 15, 25, and 25a, refused, are not insisted upon as error here, and will not be considered.

Defendant's instruction No. 30, refused, told the jury that the policeman's mace, introduced in evidence, was a dangerous and deadly weapon. The mace was inspected and handled by the jury, they could ascertain its weight, length, and diameter, and its deadly and dangerous character was a question of fact which they had the right to determine. We do not find in the record such a description of the mace as would justify a court in pronouncing it a dangerous and deadly weapon as a conclusion of law. The instruction was properly refused.

[3] Defendant's instruction No. 33, refused, in effect told the jury that the policeman had no authority to make the arrest of the defendant for an offense less than a felony not committed in his presence, without a warrant, and if they believed from the evidence that the policeman was at the time of the shooting attempting to arrest the defendant for an offense committed earlier in the evening, and for which he had no warrant, and for which he had had ample time to obtain a warrant, then the attempt to arrest was unlawful, and the defendant was justified in the use of such force as was reasonably necessary to preserve his liberty and to repel force with force, and to kill the policeman if such killing was reasonably necessary to protect himself from death or great bodily harm at the hands of the policeman, and under such facts the killing would be justified, and they should find the defendant not guilty. There are several reasons which would justify the refusal of this instruction, the most cogent of which is that the instruction tells the jury that if they believed the arrest unlawful because for an offense not committed in the presence of the officer, then the defendant could repel force with force, and kill the policeman if such killing was necessary, etc. In resisting an unlawful arrest one cannot go to the extent of killing the officer in order to preserve his liberty only. The only justification for killing in such instance would be where self-defense is relied upon, or where self-defense enters, and then the defendant must believe, and have reasonable grounds to believe, that it is necessary for him to do so to save his own life or to protect himself from great bodily harm. State v. Lutz, 85 W. Va. 330, 101 S. E. 434. The instruction is misleading. Moreover, the theory of the state was, and there is much evidence to support it, that defendant was intoxicated and disorderly, operating his automobile over the streets of the town at a dangerous speed, and generally creating a disturbance of the peace of the town, and having successfully resisted arrest by the deceased a short time before the fatal shooting, by threatening to shoot him with a pistol then in his hand, and, perceiving the officer in the street near the office of defendant, approached him for the purpose of provoking a quarrel, and again "bluffing" him. The fatal shooting resulted. On the other hand, the defendant does not claim nor rely upon self-defense. His version of the shooting is that he was going from his office or from his car to his storeroom for the purpose of removing money left in the cash register by his wife, and perceived and approached the deceased, and said to him, "You ain't going to arrest me, are you?" The policeman replied, "No, I am not going to arrest you to-night, Amos. I told you that." "I said, 'I didn't think you was going to arrest me, and I know you hadn't ought to,' or words to that effect. He said, 'No, sir; I am not going to do it to-night, but I am to-morrow,' or 'I will,' something to that effect. That is as near as I can remember the conversation, every word of it."

He then testified that he did not know that deceased was going to arrest him, or that deceased was going to strike him with the mace, but suddenly the policeman struck him with the mace so quickly that he scarcely knew what it meant, and involuntarily threw up his right hand, which was in his coat pocket, grasping a revolver, to ward off the blow from his head, and without taking his hand out of his coat pocket. He did not know whether the blow knocked him down, or whether he was hit from behind. He was asked the question:

"Tell the jury what you remember, if anything, about how you came to fire the shot that struck the deceased, Clem Long? A. I don't know. Somebody told me, after I had been taken to jail some time, that I had shot a man—that is the first I knew, the first that I really knew that the gun had went off."

What application or relevancy does an instruction on self-defense for the defendant have under this evidence? Or what application has the law of repelling an unlawful arrest? The instruction is inconsistent with the defense. However, there was some appreciable evidence coupled with the blow of the mace, and the uncertainty of whether the shot preceded the blow, which would give color to the claim of self-defense, and the jury would have the right to say whether self-defense prompted the firing of the shot, and that the defendant had reason to believe, and did believe, he was in imminent danger of his life or great bodily harm. But, as above suggested, the instruction is not so framed, and is faulty.

Instructions 34 and 36, offered by defendant, were properly refused for the same reason.

Defendant's instruction No. 35, refused, but modified and given as No. 35a, sets out the defense relied upon, that is, that the firing of the fatal shot was caused by reflex action of the muscles of the defendant, induced by the blow from the policeman's mace, and without any intent on the part of the defendant to fire the shot; and it told the jury that, if such was their belief from all the evidence, then they must find the defendant not guilty. The modification made by the court is so slight and inconsequential that it is difficult to understand why it was made. The only change is the substitution of the word "then" for the word "yet," and the difference in the meaning of the two words in that connection and with the context of the instruction is so little that there is no substantial ground for objection to the change.

[4] We now come to consideration of the instructions given for the state over the objection of the defendant. Instructions 1 to 15, inclusive (excepting Nos. 7, 9, 10, 11, which were refused), all correctly propound propositions of law applicable to the case, but are objected to because they are in the abstract. It is well settled that abstract propositions of law should not be given when there is no evidence on which they can be predicated; but where they are given, and there is evidence in the case to which they are applicable, but no particular reference is made to the evidence in such instructions, it will be presumed that the jury made the proper application. Blashfield's Inst. to Juries, § 432, p. 973.

"That an instruction presents merely an abstract proposition is certainly a very sufficient reason why a court may refuse to give it; but, if given, and it state the law correctly, I am not aware that it has ever been held a sufficient cause for reversing a judgment." Koerner v. Rankin's Heirs, 11 Grat. (Va.) 420.

Unless the appellate court can see that the jury might have been misled, or confused, by an instruction in the abstract, it will not reverse. Sheppard v. Ins. Co., 21 W. Va. 370.

Instruction No. 1, which defines murder, and which says that murder perpetrated by poison, lying in wait, or any other willful, deliberate, or premeditated killing, is murder in the first degree, seems to have been approved in State v. Abbott, 64 W. Va. 411, 62 S. E. 693, which was a case of murder arising out of a sudden brawl. There was no evidence of poisoning or lying in wait in the case under consideration, but it may have been proper for the purpose of showing the deliberation and premeditation necessary as an element of murder in the first degree. It could not have misled the jury in this case. The verdict is not for first degree murder. Was not this instruction rather for the benefit of the prisoner? How has he been prejudiced?

Instruction No. 2 was given and approved in the celebrated case of State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679.

[5] Instructions 3, 5, 12, 15, and 17 are claimed to be erroneous, because the theory of the discharge of the pistol by involuntary reflex muscular action of defendant was not incorporated therein; because they ignore that defense. The law applicable to the facts, as deduced from the evidence and interpreted by the prosecution, is usually embodied in the state's instruction, and it is not necessary, and it would be impracticable, to incorporate in each instruction the theories, limitations, and conditions which go to make up the instructions as a whole. State v. Dodds, 54 W. Va. 289, 46 S. E. 228. The court gave 27 instructions at the instance of the defense, fully covering its theories and its conclusions of fact from the evidence, and we find that its claim of accidental and unintentional shooting caused by reflex muscular action was included therein, and the jury directed to find the defendant not guilty if they believed the fatal shot was fired as claimed by the defendant. The instructions must be considered as a whole. State v. Cottrill, 52 W. Va. 363, 43 S. E. 244; Gray's Case, 92 Va. 772, 22 S. E. 858. An instruction based on one theory, unless binding, is not to ignore another theory on which another instruction is given, even though the theories be totally inconsistent. Even where an instruction is incomplete, but states the law correctly so far as it goes, and another or other instructions remedy the incompleteness, the error is cured. State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 43 S. E. 230.

[6] State's instruction No. 17 is also claimed as erroneous because it uses the word "blow" instead of "shot." That instruction reads:

"The court instructs the jury that voluntary manslaughter is where the act causing death is committed in the heat of sudden passion caused by provocation; and they are further instructed that if they believe beyond a reasonable doubt, from the evidence in this case, that the defendant, Charles Amos Long, in the heat of sudden passion, caused by provocation, killed Clement Jefferson Long at the time and place alleged in the indictment, they should find the defendant, Charles Amos Long, guilty of voluntary manslaughter, unless they further believe from the evidence that the defendant believed, and had reason to believe, that the shot which resulted in Clement Jefferson Long's death was necessary to protect his own life, or protect himself from great bodily harm, and that the necessity of inflicting said blow was not brought about by the defendant, Charles Amos Long's own conduct."

There was no evidence whatever of the deceased being killed by a blow. It is conclusive that he was killed by the pistol shot wound inflicted by defendant, and the context of the instruction is so clear and convincing that "shot" was meant instead of "blow," and the evidence is so clear on that point, that the jury could not have been misled. Instructions must be interpreted in the light of the evidence, and not in the abstract. State v. Dodds, 54 W. Va. 289, 46 S. E. 228. The instruction is further criticized because it tells the jury that the defendant cannot justify himself on the plea of self-defense, if the necessity of inflicting said blow (shot) was brought about by his own conduct. Counsel insists that the word "conduct" is misleading; that it should have been "misconduct" or "bad conduct" or "wrongful act." While this instruction is loosely drawn and justly subject to criticism, we do not think the jury could have been misled either by the use of the phrase "said blow" or the word "conduct," in the light of the other instructions and the evidence and the evident meaning of the instruction itself. Kimball v. Borden, 97 Va. 477, 34 S. E. 45.

The state's instruction No. 19 is confidently claimed as erroneous. It reads:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in the case beyond a reasonable doubt that, at the time of the shooting of Clement Jefferson Long by the prisoner, Charles Amos Long, the said Clement Jefferson Long was then and there a policeman of the town of Pine Grove, Wetzel county, W. Va., and shortly before or at the time of said shooting the accused, Charles Amos Long, was in the presence of said Clement Jefferson Long in the street of said town drunk, and guilty of contending with angry words and swearing to the disturbance of the peace of said town, that such acts and conduct was an offense under the laws of this state, which, if committed in the presence of such policeman, was just legal cause for the arrest of the accused by said policeman without a warrant, and in such a case the accused had no right to resist."

[7] The objection to this instruction is that it does not correctly state the law. It is contended that a policeman does not have authority to arrest, without warrant, a person drunk or guilty of contending with angry words and swearing to the disturbance of the peace of the town in the presence of the officer; that such authority could only be given a policeman by town ordinance, duly passed by the proper municipal authorities and recorded in the manner prescribed by law; and that no such ordinance of the town of Pine Grove was properly introduced in evidence. Without considering at this time whether the ordinance of the town giving the right of its police officers to make arrests without warrant in certain cases, and which went to the jury, was properly admitted, we hold that a police officer, irrespective of town ordinance, has the authority under the common law to make arrests, without warrant, for misdemeanors committed in his presence, which are a breach of the peace. State v. Lutz, 101 S. E. 434. What is a breach of the peace?

"The term 'breach of the peace' is generic, and includes all violations of the public peace or order, or decorum; in other words, it signifies the offense of disturbing the public peace or tranquillity enjoyed by the citizens of a community; a disturbance of the public tranquillity by an act or conduct inciting to violence or tending to provoke or excite others to break the peace; a disturbance of the public order by an act of violence, or by any act likely to produce violence, or which, by causing consternation and alarm, disturbs the peace and quiet of the community. By 'peace' as used in this connection is meant the tranquillity enjoyed by the citizens of a municipality or a community where good order reigns among its members. Breach of the peace is a common-law offense." 9 C. J. p. 386.

There was abundant evidence to show that for some time prior to, and up to the time of the shooting, the defendant had been intoxicated, and that he had been driving his car recklessly through the streets, had drawn his pistol on the police officer and threatened to shoot him, and had entered a store and thrown out sample shoes on display, and immediately before the shooting cursed the policeman and called him vile names in a loud and angry voice. It is true that all this was denied by the defendant, but the evidence was quite sufficient on which to base the instruction. If the jury believed that such acts were thus committed by the defendant, then they were justified in finding that the defendant was committing a breach of the peace, and the attempted arrest was lawful. We find no reversible error in this instruction.

Instruction No. 22 for the state was to the effect that if they believed the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, being armed, approached the policeman in such a manner as to give him reasonable cause to apprehend a design on the part of defendant to do him great bodily harm or take his life, and that he, the policeman, had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that such design was about to be accomplished, and that the danger was imminent, he, the policeman, had a right to strike the defendant with his mace. The objection to this instruction is that there was no evidence on which to base it. An inspection of the evidence for the state shows that when the defendant saw the policeman standing near the sidewalk he immediately approached him and began an altercation. His right hand was in his coat pocket, in which he had just placed his pistol, which he had exhibited a few moments before, when he asked the boy to shoot the lock off of his office door. That afternoon he had threatened to shoot the policeman rather than be arrested for recklessly speeding his automobile on the streets, and had then drawn his pistol; he admits having the pistol in his grasp in his coat pocket when he approached the officer. Undoubtedly the policeman was apprehensive of danger. The evidence was sufficient for the giving of this instruction; in fact it was strong enough to sustain a verdict of murder in the first degree.

The state's instruction No. 24 reads:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner, Charles Amos Long, armed with a revolver, sought the deceased, Clement Jefferson Long, with a view of provoking a difficulty with him, or with intent of having an affray with him, for the purpose of killing him, and a difficulty ensued, he cannot, without some proof of a voluntary change of conduct or action on his part, excuse the killing of the deceased, Clement Jefferson Long, upon the ground that the deceased, Clement Jefferson Long, struck him first with his mace, and that the revolver in the hands of the said Charles Amos Long was accidentally discharged; for the law will not hold him guiltless, who by seeking a combat and continuing therein, brings upon himself the very thing out of which the accident grew; accidental killing wholly to be excused from all guilt must be caused in the doing by some lawful act."

[8] The objection is that, even if the jury believed that the defendant sought out the policeman with the intent of provoking an affray, or with the intent to kill, if, while engaged in the affray, he accidentally fired the fatal shot as the result of reflex muscular action superinduced by the blow of the mace, then he would be innocent. Such is not the law. Malice is an essential element of first or second degree murder, but if the jury believed that defendant brought about the affray by an unlawful act, and as a result thereof the accidental shooting occurred, resulting in the homicide, it would be manslaughter only. The instruction tells the jury that under such circumstances the defendant would not be guiltless, and would not be wholly excused. This question arose in the case of State v. Weisengoff, 85 W. Va. 271, 101 S. E. 450, where it was one of the main contentions, and is fully discussed there with citation to many authorities. Weisengoff was unlawfully resisting an arrest for a misdemeanor, and while doing so and attempting to escape from the sheriff who had boarded Weisengoff's automobile recklessly or unintentionally drove the car against an iron bridge which he was attempting to cross, injuring the sheriff so badly that he died in about two hours thereafter. This instruction is fully justified under the principles announced in that case.

[9] Instruction 25 for the state is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that they are the sole judges of the evidence and of the weight to be given thereto, and that they may believe, or refuse to believe, any witness or any part of his evidence, and that when passing upon the credibility of any witness they may take into consideration his interest in the matter in controversy, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of his statements, his bias or prejudice in the matter, if any appear, and his demeanor upon the witness stand."

This instruction was given in State v. Dickey, 48 W. Va. 326, 37 S. E. 695, and also in State v. Bickel, 53 W. Va. 597, 45 S. E. 917. However, the recent case of State v. McCausland, 82 W. Va. 525, 96 S. E. 938, disapproved it, holding that the instruction would permit the jury to reject the testimony of a witness arbitrarily. A somewhat similar instruction was given in Siever v. Coffman, 80 W. Va. 425, 92 S. E. 671, and disapproved, Judge Miller saying therein:

"The jury being the sole judges of the credibility and weight to be given to the testimony of witnesses, the court cannot by an instruction directly or impliedly tell them they should disregard any evidence."

In the more recent case of State v. Ringer, 100 S. E. 413, this same instruction was held to be erroneous, and was one of the reasons "or reversing the conviction in that case. But the Attorney General insists that the addition of the words, "and of the weight to be given thereto" (after the words "sole judges of the evidence"), and the addition of the words "or any part of his evidence" (after the words in the instruction "refuse to believe any witness"), would cure the instruction. We cannot see that these words add to or take from the meaning of the instruction. The viciousness of the instruction remains, in that it tells the jury they are at liberty to arbitrarily believe or disbelieve any witness or any part of his testimony. We hold that the giving of this instruction is reversible error. Whether or not it was aimed at the testimony of the defendant, which was contradicted in many instances by other witnesses, we need not say.

Various bills of exception were taken by the defendant to the introduction and refusal of evidence. Many are without merit, and relate to matters immaterial, and will not be reviewed.

Perry Edgar was introduced as a witness for the defense, and permitted to state that he had heard Harry Roome, a witness for the state, tell the policeman, Clem Long, while standing in front of Stone's store a short time before the shooting:

"If I was in your place I would go over and knock his head off with that mace, or words to that effect."

The state objected to the question, but the court permitted the witness to answer, stating that it could go in for the purpose of showing the feeling of witness Roome toward the defendant, but not for impeachment. This is the ground of the exception. Upon examination of the evidence of Roome we do not find that a proper foundation for impeachment was laid, but the witness was permitted to answer, and the defendant got the full benefit of the evidence, even if the foundation for impeachment was not properly laid.

[10, 13] Dr. Fulton, a witness for the state, who did not see the shooting, was asked on examination if a shot fired from the coat pocket of the defendant, who was practically the same height as the deceased, would have taken the downward course in the body of the deceased, as described by the doctor, unless the deceased was leaning forward at the time, or unless he was on a lower level, and the court refused to permit an answer. All of the witnesses for the state who saw the shooting, and the defendant himself, testified that the defendant threw his hand up, and the shot was fired through the pocket of the coat while above its ordinary position. The doctor's answer to the question as propounded would have shed no light on the relative position of the defendant and his victim. He was also asked on cross-examination to describe the condition of the defendant's wound received from the policeman's mace. The court held that this was not proper cross-examination, but that the defense could recall the doctor and make him their witness for that purpose when the defense put in its testimony. The order and time in which evidence shall be introduced is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and a verdict will rarely be disturbed for that reason. Goodwin v. Tony Pocahontas Coal Co., 106 S. E. 76. The witness could have been summoned by the defense, and this evidence offered at the proper time. However, the evidence was for the purpose of showing the force and seriousness of the blow, which was fully described by other witnesses and admitted by the state. Its probative force would have been largely cumulative. Many of the errors assigned relate to the evidence and instructions on the question of the right of the policeman to arrest the defendant; whether or not he should have had a warrant; whether the attempted arrest was lawful or unlawful. H. C. Young, the town recorder, was introduced, and the municipal minutes and records were introduced and admitted over defendant's objection, showing ordinances making it an offense to operate automobiles over the streets at a rate exceeding 12 miles per hour, making it an offense for any one to engage in riotous tumults, profanity, obscene language, etc.; and an order, tending to show the employment of Clem Long (the deceased) as night policeman at $1 per day. In our view we do not consider the introduction or rejection of these ordinances and minutes as very material.

"If one kills an officer de facto, while resisting or obstructing him in the discharge of his official duties, he is guilty of murder. Hence upon an indictment of this nature it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the officer killed was duly appointed or elected, or had duly qualified. It is sufficient to prove that he was an officer de facto." Constantineau De Facto Doctrine, § 215.

[11] Clem Long was a de facto officer. He was recognized as a policeman by the municipal authorities and the citizens generally, had been sworn in as such, wore the badge of a policeman, and carried a mace. He was known and recognized as such by the defendant. Nor do we think that because he had no warrant it would materially affect his status as an officer, or his right and duty to make the arrest. It was not because he did not have a warrant that the homicide occurred. He was not asked by the defendant to exhibit a warrant. It would have been of no assistance or protection to him. His authority was not questioned. The defendant, according to the state's witnesses, stated that no one could arrest him, accompanying the assertion by profanity and by calling the policeman a vile name. From the defendant's testimony of the shooting above set out in detail it will be seen that he had no idea that an arrest would be made, or that the deceased was attempting to make an arrest. He was not resisting arrest. He did not attempt to justify the homicide on the theory of an unlawful arrest, and for that reason that he had a right to resist. His defense is accidental shooting pure and simple. The law of resistance to an unlawful arrest has no application here under the theory of the defense. What relevancy then can there be in the lack of a warrant? Moreover, if the defendant at the time of the attempted arrest or immediately before, and in the view and presence of the officer, was committing a breach or a disturbance of the peace (and there was ample evidence to that effect), no warrant was necessary in order to justify the attempted arrest.

"In making an arrest a sworn peace officer, commonly known as such and acting within the limits of his jurisdiction, is not bound to show his warrant, even though it is demanded of him, as every one is bound to know the character of such an officer when acting within his proper jurisdiction, and is bound to submit peacefully to the arrest before he can demand that the cause thereof be made known to him." 5 C. J. p. 392, § 16.

"In making an arrest without a warrant it is usually held that a known peace officer is not bound to disclose his character or authority, or give notice of his intention, until the party has submitted, as his known official character is sufficient in the first instance to require submission until formal notice of authority and intention to make an arrest, and the cause for it, can be given." Id. p. 419.

M. L. Long, the father of the deceased, was introduced by the state to prove a dying declaration made by the deceased, and his examination for laying the foundation was conducted in the presence of the jury. He was permitted to testify that the deceased told him that "Amos shot him, and he struck him," and thereupon the defense moved to strike out the question and answer, and the court then on his own motion excluded all the testimony of the witness, and instructed the jury not to consider any of it. Both the state and the defense excepted to the court's action, and the defendant insists here that the court erred in permitting any of the witness' testimony to be introduced and then striking it out, because of the impression it would make on the minds of the jury, and which they could not eradicate by being told to do so. The claim is that the court should have known, before admitting the evidence to the jury, whether or not it was properly admissible. The general rule is that preliminary questions to determine the admissibility of such evidence may be conducted in the presence and hearing of the jury, or otherwise at the discretion of the trial court; but if had in the absence of the jury and the evidence is decided to be admissible, then all of the preliminary evidence must be again given to the jury, because ultimately it is for the jury to determine, in weighing the declaration, whether or not it was made when the deceased was in extremis and conscious of his condition; it is error to remove these questions from their consideration. 21 Cyc. p. 985. No motion was made by the defense to have the preliminary examination made out of the hearing of the jury. The evidence of the declaration was excluded on motion of the defendant, and we fail to see wherein complaint can be made because the motion was sustained. Error will often creep into jury trials, and it is usual and proper for the court, upon perceiving it, to instruct the jury to disregard the error. Often it is accomplished by written instruction. A verbal instruction at the time of the happening is more effective. The judge should not have permitted the dying declaration to go to the jury until he concluded that the proper foundation had been laid. If it was error, the error has been cured by the instruction to disregard it.

[12] Error is predicated on the refusal of the court to permit the medical expert, Dr. C. A. Wingerter, to answer some of the hypothetical questions propounded to him by the defense on the theory that the shot was fired by the defendant as a result of reflex muscular action, caused by the blow from the policeman's mace. The claim is made that the full probative value of the evidence was destroyed because the court did not permit the questions to contain a full statement of all the facts and circumstances, as interpreted by the defense, which led up to what occurred when the fatal shot was fired, and the blow from the mace given. An inspection of the record discloses that the various questions which the witness was allowed to answer, considered together, detailed all of the essentials necessary for a full presentation of the theory of the defense. The questions took a wider range than necessary. It was not necessary to state in detail in the hypothetical questions all of the evidence leading up to the time when the blow was struck in order for the witness to determine whether reflex action of the muscles caused the firing of the pistol when the blow was struck. These details could shed no light upon whether the blow would produce that physical result. It was in the discretion of the court to require irrelevant facts to be omitted. That irrelevant facts should be excluded from such questions is an obvious, not to say instinctive, exercise of administrative power. Ruschenberg v. Railway Co., 161 Mo. 70, 61 S. W. 626.

[14] The defendant was asked if he and the deceased did not take a drink of liquor together the day before the shooting in defendant's office, and the court refused to permit the witness to answer. We can see no reason why this question should not have been answered. It was admissible to show a friendly feeling between them. The question of enmity or friendship existing between the parties prior to a homicide is admissible to show the mental attitude of each toward the other. The element of malice in this, as in all other cases of like character, is one of the essential matters of inquiry, and evidence tending to show a friendly relation between the slayer and his victim is relevant to rebut any presumption of malice. O'Boyle v. Com., 100 Va. 785, 40 S. E. 121.

Another assignment of error is that the court would not permit the defendant to show that his intoxication was the result of the use of liquor taken as a preventative of the influenza—a malady then prevalent in the community—an excuse for his intoxicated condition. Voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, a rule of law so well settled and approved by reason and experience that to permit one to give excuses for drinking to intoxication, and hence to excuse his acts while in that condition, would destroy its efficacy. Excuses for the use of liquor as a medicine for existing or contemplated sickness would then be the rule, without much exception, in cases of this character.

[15] We have examined defendant's assignment of error contained in bill of exceptions E. 46. Luther Connor was introduced to contradict the evidence of Pat Taylor, who had stated that he had accompanied the policeman to the scene of the shooting, and that he accompanied him there for the purpose of watching defendant, who was intoxicated, to see that he did no harm to any one, and for no other purpose. Connor, who was a stranger in the town, had heard some man who was accompanying the policeman that night, both going in the direction of the place where the affray occurred, say, "By God, I will help arrest him." When asked if he recognized Pat Taylor as the man who made the remark, he replied, "I couldn't swear he was, or who was who, that night. I was a perfect stranger in Pine Grove." He was then asked if Taylor had not told him he was with the policeman that night, and the court refused to permit the witness to answer. No foundation for a contradiction had been laid. The evidence was uncertain and remote. It was not error to refuse it.

There are other assignments of error to the action of the court in refusing to allow witnesses called for the purpose of contradiction to give evidence, because proper foundations for contradiction had not been laid, which we do not deem important to pass upon. If the points upon which they were called to contradict are material, proper foundations can be laid and the evidence permitted on a new trial.

The judgment of the circuit court of Wetzel county will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Reversed and remanded.

SEACOAST PACKING CO. v. SCHEIN.
(No. 10705.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Pleading  $\S$  354(2)—Defense that stock subscription made on faith of representations full amount of stock subscribed properly stricken where based on mere rumor.

In an action for the unpaid balance of a stock subscription, there was no error in striking out a defense that such subscription was made on the faith of the representation that the full amount of the capital stock had been subscribed for by bona fide subscribers, where such defense was based on mere rumor, and not connected with plaintiff or its duly authorized agents.

2. Pleading  $\S$  359—Defense that stock subscription became binding only after full amount of capital stock subscribed erroneously stricken.

In an action for the balance of a stock subscription, a defense that such subscription, by its terms, became binding only after the full amount of the capital stock had been subscribed was not subject to being stricken out as sham; it setting up a violation of the terms of the subscription.

3. Pleading  $\S$  359—Defense subscription made on agent's assurance person objectionable to subscriber would not be made director erroneously stricken.

In an action for the balance of a stock subscription, a defense that such subscription was made on the assurance of the corporation's agent that a certain person objectionable to defendant would not be made a director cannot be stricken out as sham, being based on a violation of the conditions of the subscription.

Cothran, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, of Beaufort County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by the Seacoast Packing Company against D. Schein. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Moffatt & Marion, of Columbia, and C. M. Aman, of Beaufort, for appellant.

W. J. Thomas, of Beaufort, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is a case similar to the case of Seacoast Packing Co. v. Long, filed herewith, 108 S. E. 159.

The complaint alleges that the defendant subscribed in writing for 10 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation, and had failed to comply with the terms of his contract. An order was made on motion of the plaintiff striking out the second, third, and fourth defenses. From this order the defendant appealed.

[1] I. There was no error in striking out the second defense. This defense was based on mere rumor, not connected in any way with the plaintiff or its duly authorized agents.

[2] II. The third defense sets up a violation of the terms of his subscription, and is not subject to being stricken out as sham.

[3] III. The fourth defense is based upon the violation of the conditions of defendant's subscription and cannot be stricken out as sham.

The judgment appealed from is modified.

GARY, C. J., and WATTS, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (dissenting). Action to recover a balance of $800 upon a subscription of $1,000 to the capital stock of a proposed corporation. The defendant admitted making the subscription, but alleged as defenses to the action: (1) A general denial; (2) that his subscription was made upon the faith of the representation that the full amount of the capital stock, $150,000, had been subscribed for by bona fide subscribers; (3) that his subscription by its terms became binding only after the full amount of the capital stock had been subscribed; (4) that his subscription was made upon the assurance of the agent of the corporation that a certain person objectionable to him would not be made a director in the corporation; (5) that the whole amount of the capital stock had not been subscribed for; that the assurance as to the election of the undesirable citizen had not been kept; (6) other matters not material to the present inquiry; (7) that his subscription and the payment made thereon were made and obtained by false statements and representations of the plaintiff's representative, relied upon by the defendant; (8) counterclaim for the $200 paid in.

Upon motion of plaintiff's attorney the circuit judge passed an order striking out as frivolous, sham, and irrelevant the second, third, and fourth defenses epitomized, "except any allegations of fraud that may be contained therein."

Should there be any merit in the defenses, the order should be reversed as utterly incapable of execution. To strike out all of the allegations of fact constituting the alleged fraud and leave only the bald allegations of fraud would render that which was left without supporting allegations. Should there be no merit in them, the whole of them, including the allegations of fraud, should have been stricken. The several defenses above outlined as (2), (3), and (4) will therefore be now considered.

The first defense is based upon the alleged false representation that the entire capital stock of $150,000 had been subscribed for by bona fide subscribers. This, if made, was the representation of a fact, material to the defendant, upon which he relied, and, if false and fraudulent, avoided his subscription.

"Any false statement by the authorized agents of a corporation, in regard to the past or present status of the corporate enterprise, or material matters connected therewith, whereby subscriptions are obtained, is a fraudulent representation. Thus a false statement that a certain amount of stock had been subscribed for * * * has been held to constitute a fraudulent representation, entitling the subscriber induced thereby to subscribe, to the remedies provided for him by law in such cases. In all these cases, however, the distinction between statements relative to the prospects and capabilities of the enterprise and statements specifically specifying what does or does not exist must be carefully borne in mind. The former are matters of opinion; the latter are material representations, and are fraudulent if false." 1 Cook, Corp. (6th Ed.) § 145.

Such representations by promoters or solicitors of stock are binding upon the corporation when it adopts the subscription as shown by suit thereon. See opinion of the writer hereof in the case of Seacoast Co. v. Long, filed herewith, 108 S. E. 159.

The third defense is based upon the allegation that the defendant's subscription by its terms became binding only after the full amount of the capital stock had been subscribed. It must be assumed from the allegations of the answer that this condition was contained in the contract of subscription, as a part of it. If so, the defendant has the right to stand upon the condition which was entirely reasonable. Whether or not he may be able to establish it upon the trial is another question.

The fourth defense is based upon the breach of the assurance that a certain person would not be elected a director. This is not the representation of a fact, but an assurance or promise, of which the defendant is not entitled to avail himself, unless it is shown to have been a part of his contract of subscription, as indicated in the Long Case.

The judgment of this court should be that the order appealed from be reversed.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Abbeville County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Kenneth Gossett was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Judgment reversed, and case remanded.

Bonham & Price, of Greenville, and M. L. Bonham, of Anderson, for appellant.

H. S. Blackwell, Sol., of Laurens, George Bell Timmerman, of Lexington, and J. Howard Moore, of Abbeville, for the State.

COTHRAN, J. The defendant, Kenneth Gossett, was indicted, with his cousin, John Gossett, at a special term of the court of general sessions for Abbeville county, upon the charge of rape. The crime was alleged to have been committed upon the person of a young woman of that county, near Abbeville, on March 14, 1920. A true bill was rendered on April 5, 1920. The trial was entered upon, after the usual three days allowed, on April 8th. After the testimony was concluded the presiding judge directed a verdict of not guilty in favor of defendant John Gossett, and he was discharged. The jury rendered a verdict of guilty, with recommendation to mercy, as to the defendant Kenneth Gossett, and, after the refusal of a motion for a new trial, he was sentenced to imprisonment for 40 years. He has appealed to this court from said judgment.

Upon the threshold of this appeal we are confronted with the objection of the appellant to the legality of the court which condemned him. It is contended that section 3841, vol. 1, Code of Laws A. D. 1912, under which the special court was ordered and held, is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

"Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"

—and of article 1, section 5, of the Constitution of South Carolina, which provides:

"Nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor shall any person be denied the equal protection of the laws."

A determination of the issue thus raised requires a statement of the proceedings leading up to the ordering of the special term and the appointment of the presiding judge, and a consideration of the constitutional and statute law which controls the matter.

On March 18, 1920, four days after the commission of the alleged crime, the solicitor of the circuit made application in writing to the Governor of the state, stating that the public interest demanded that a special term of the court of general sessions for Abbeville county be held, and petitioning that it be called to be held at Abbeville on April 5th. Acting upon that application and petition, the Governor issued an order, dated March 18th, which, after reciting the fact of said application and petition, directed that such special term be held as requested.

Thereupon the Chief Justice of this court issued an order, which, after reciting the fact that the Governor had ordered the special term as stated, assigned the Honorable Thomas S. Sease, judge of the Seventh circuit, as a disengaged circuit judge, to hold the court. Accordingly Judge Sease appeared at the appointed time, opened the court, organized and charged the grand jury, and submitted to them the indictment against the defendants. The grand jury promptly returned a true bill against both of the defendants, and the other proceedings above narrated followed in due course.

Section 3841, vol. 1, Code of Laws A. D. 1912, reads thus:

"Upon the application to the Governor by the solicitor of any circuit, stating that the public interest demands an extra term of the court of general sessions in any county of the state, or upon the application of the majority of the members of the bar of any county, stating that the civil business demands an extra term of the court of common pleas, it shall be the duty of the Governor to appoint some man, learned in the law, and to be suggested by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the state, to hold an extra term of said court or courts in said county, and notify the clerk of said court of said appointment."

Prior to the enactment of this statute the process for ordering special terms of court was as follows:

Section 33 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided (and still provides):

"Special sessions of the courts of common pleas or general sessions may be held whenever so ordered, either by the Chief Justice or by the circuit judge at the time holding the circuit court of the county for which the extra term may be ordered, of which extra term such notice shall be given as the Chief Justice or the circuit judge so ordering the same may direct. If such extra term of either or both the courts aforesaid be ordered by the Chief Justice, he may order any one of the circuit judges to hold the same; but if such extra term be ordered by a circuit judge, as hereinbefore provided, then such extra term shall be held only by the circuit judge so ordering the same."

Section 3840 of volume 1 is as follows:

"Whenever any circuit judge, pending his assignment to hold the courts of any circuit, shall die, resign, be disabled by illness, or be absent from the state, or in any case of a vacancy in the office of circuit judge of any circuit, or in case the Chief Justice or presiding Associate Justice of the Supreme Court shall order a special court of common pleas and general sessions, or common pleas or general sessions, in any county in this state, upon a satisfactory showing that such special court is needed, the Chief Justice or presiding Associate Justice may assign any other circuit judge disengaged to hold the courts of such circuits, or to fill any appointment made necessary by such vacancy, or to hold such special court; and in the event that there be no other circuit judge disengaged, then the Governor, upon the recommendation of the Supreme Court, or the Chief Justice thereof if the Supreme Court be not in session, shall immediately commission as special judge such person learned in the law as shall be recommended to hold courts of such circuit or to hold such special court for that term only."

The Constitution (article 5, § 6) provides:

"The General Assembly shall provide by law for the temporary appointment of men learned in the law to hold either special or regular terms of the circuit courts, whenever there may be necessity for such appointment."

From these provisions, it is apparent that at the time of the passage of the act of 1900 (section 3841) the following processes were ordained (and are still of force) with reference to the ordering of special terms:

(1) A special term might be ordered by the Chief Justice or presiding Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, upon a satisfactory showing that such court was needed.

(2) A special term might be ordered by the circuit judge at the time holding the circuit court of the county for which the special term was to be ordered.

(3) When the special term should be ordered by the Chief Justice or by the presiding Associate Justice, he was authorized to assign any disengaged circuit judge to hold the court, or if there be none so disengaged, the Supreme Court, if in session, or the Chief Justice, if not, should recommend for appointment as special judge to hold the court some person learned in the law, whom the Governor should immediately commission as special judge for the purpose.

(4) When the special term should be ordered by the circuit judge at the time holding court, it could be held only by the circuit judge who may have ordered it.

Thus, under the legislation as it stood then, the power to order a special term was vested exclusively in the Chief Justice, the presiding Associate Justice, and the circuit judge holding court at the time for the county in which the special term was to be ordered. The persons authorized to preside as judge of such special court were limited to (1) a disengaged circuit judge, to be assigned by the Chief Justice or the presiding Associate Justice; (2) a person learned in the law, in the event that there should be no circuit judge disengaged, to be commissioned by the Governor as special judge, upon the recommendation of the Supreme Court, if in session, or of the Chief Justice, if not; (3) the circuit judge who may have ordered the court.

[1, 2] The power thus conferred by section 33 of the Civil Code and 3840 of the Code of Laws, is easily sustainable under the provisions of the Constitution (article 5, section 6) quoted above, as necessarily implied therein, or referable to the general legislative powers of the General Assembly, which are ample, except where limited by the Constitution.

[3] It is not an absolute power, but is controlled by considerations which safeguard the rights and interests of those whose rights and interests will be determined by such tribunal. In the first place, the discretion to be exercised in ordering the special term is vested in the Chief Justice, the supreme custodian of the judicial interests of the state absolutely impartial, non-partisan, unmoved by the clamor of the mob. "Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife," equally solicitous that harm may not come from the "law's delays" or from impetuous haste; a calm discretion to be exercised. In the next place, it is a discretion to be exercised as a judicial function: "Upon a satisfactory showing that such special court is needed." The Chief Justice hears and determines.

There cannot be a question but that the power thus conferred is directed to be exercised in a fair, just, and reasonable manner, affording, in the judicial exercise of discretion by a supreme, impartial, judicial officer, a sure guaranty of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. The law has been broken and demands prompt punishment of the offender; the law guarantees to the accused a fair trial; the public interest is as much involved in the sanctity of this guaranty as in the swift retribution which should follow crime. A fair trial means a trial before an impartial judge, an honest jury, and in an atmosphere of judicial calm. It requires a wise, fearless, and impartial mind to harmonize these elements of the public interest, lest in its haste to deal a blow the law may perpetrate a judicial wrong. Happily the law had provided for the just resolution of this difficulty.

[4] Then followed the act of 1900 (section 3841), which has thrown to the winds the sensible and just guaranties afforded by the then existing law. It makes no provision for a showing, a hearing, or a determination of the fact that the public interest, which, as we have seen, includes the guaranty of a fair trial to the accused, demands a special court. It makes no provision for the determination of this question, so vital to the rights of the accused, by an impartial authority. Unlimited, except by his conception of what the public interest demands, which is no limitation at all, the absolute power to set in motion the machinery which inevitably must result in the ordering of a special court is vested in the solicitor of the circuit, the paid prosecutor, representing an adverse interest, necessarily a partisan, a political and not a judicial officer. Upon his application to the Governor, stating, without showing, that the public interest demands an extra term, the Governor has no discretion:

"It shall be the duty of the Governor to appoint some man learned in the law and to be suggested by the Chief Justice * * * to hold an extra term. * * *"

The Chief Justice has no discretion in the matter, except the naming of the special judge. The momentum of the solicitor's ipse dixit is irresistible. A startling difference between the two procedures—the one, providing for due application, a presentation of reasons, and a judicial determination by a judicial officer; the other, a statement by a partisan official, without showing or determination of facts, and without the exercise of discretion by any one. It enables him, without the slightest consideration for the rights of the accused, to select his own time for the sacrifice, close on the heels of the crime, when righteous indignation has degenerated into a rabble cry of "Crucify him!" Into that atmosphere he invites the accused to a "fair trial"; it would be indeed "committere agnum lupo."

The defendant, however guilty in point of fact he may be, is entitled to be tried in an orderly manner; not only by an impartial judge and a jury representative of the law-abiding intelligence of the county, but in a calm judicial atmosphere where the serene deliberations of those arbiters of the law and the facts may not be affected by that subtle psychological influence of the mob, which, though silent and unseen, is sometimes tremendously felt. It was the influence of the mob that provoked the unrighteous and cowardly judgment of Pilate, who sought to wash his hands of his own blood-guiltiness, and yet delivered the Nazarene for crucifixion. The time of the trial, the circumstances surrounding the court, the inflamed condition of the public mind, the nature of the crime, are matters of the gravest concern to the defendant and bear heavily upon the opportunity for a fair trial guaranteed to him by the Constitution. Should the public prosecutor, the active, interested adversary of the defendant, be clothed with the absolute authority to prepare the altar for the sacrifice at a time and under circumstances which practically guarantee a sacrifice? Is that due process of law, and affording to the defendant the equal protection of the laws?

Under the section being discussed, the solicitor is not required to give the grounds of his opinion that the public interest demands a special court; he is not even required to have such an opinion, except what might be implied from the simple statement to that effect; he has shown no grounds suggesting that the public interest demanded such impetuous haste. The public interest is greater in securing the constitutional rights of the accused than in responding to public clamor for a victim. What was the reason, therefore, for ordering a special court? It could not have been the crowded condition of the docket, for the Gossett case was the only one contemplated to be tried, and when that trial was over the court was functus officio. It could not have been that the business of the court could not wait the regular term, soon to be held, for the reason that no other case was called. We are constrained to believe that it was called at the initiation of the able and zealous solicitor, for the purpose of securing the prompt punishment of the perpetrators of an abominable crime, under circumstances which would warrant that expectation, without consideration for the constitutional rights of the accused.

We do not intend the slightest criticism of his conduct in the matter; he had the right under that statute, if it was a valid statute, to do exactly as he did; the criticism is directed against the statute, which permits the occasion for and the selection of the time for holding the court to be fixed at the arbitrary suggestion of the state's prosecuting officer, without the slightest consideration for the interests of the accused, or of the necessarily prejudicial atmosphere which may, and in this case certainly did, surround the trial. This court has declared:

"It is greatly to be regretted that it should be necessary to hold a trial in any other than calm and judicial atmosphere." State v. Bethune, 93 S. C. 195, 200, 75 S. E. 281.

If that be true, it is a right of the accused, as near as may be, that he be tried in such an atmosphere. Should that right be annihilated at the arbitrary will of the prosecuting officer, the representative of the adversary interest? We use the word "arbitrary," not in an offensive sense, but in the sense of the uncontrolled exercise of will, responsible to no one, and operative without even the exercise of discretion. That such a procedure does not conform to the requirements of the Constitution is perfectly clear, from the following definitions of "due process of law":

"Due process of law requires judicial investigation and determination of the rights." Ex parte Tillman, 84 S. C. 552, 562, 66 S. E. 1049, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 781.

"In the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 490, 23 L. Ed. 478.

"They then mean a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our systems of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights. To give such proceedings any validity, there must be a tribunal competent by its Constitution—that is, by the law of its creation—to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit." Pennoy v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565.

"In all cases, that kind of procedure is due process of law which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case, and sanctioned by the established customs and usages of the courts." Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 L. Ed. 552.

"The clause in question means, therefore, that there can be no proceeding against life, liberty, or property, which may result in the deprivation of either, without the observance of these general rules established in our system of jurisprudence for the security of private rights." Hagar v. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569.

"Law, in its regular course of administration through courts of justice, is due process, and, when secured by the law of the state, the constitutional requisition is satisfied." Caldwell v. Texas, 137 U. S. 692, 11 Sup. Ct. 224, 34 L. Ed. 816.

And due process is so secured by laws operating on all alike, and not subjecting "the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice." Bank v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 235, 4 L. Ed. 559.

"It follows that any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power, in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law." Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 23 Sup. Ct. 390, 47 L. Ed. 563.

The circumstances of this trial demonstrate beyond a doubt that the defendant, under the operations of this section which we are considering, was not convicted by due process of law and was denied the equal protection of the laws. We refer to them, not so much for the purpose of granting the defendant a new trial upon that ground, but for the purpose of demonstrating the operation of the procedure under section 3841, and to sustain our conclusion that, at least so far as the criminal court is concerned, it is violative of the constitutional provisions that have been quoted.

The crime is alleged to have been committed on March 14th; on March 16th, two other young men, not the defendants, were arrested at Greenwood, charged with the crime; they were not carried to the Abbeville jail, but were rushed to the state penitentiary in Columbia for safe-keeping; on March 16th, the young women involved went to Columbia to identify the prisoners; they stated that the young men arrested were not the guilty parties; on March 17th the defendants were arrested, one at his home in Honea Path, Anderson county, and the other in Greenville; they were taken to Anderson, not Abbeville, and were identified by the young women; thence they were taken, not to Abbeville, but by way of Greenville and Spartanburg, to the state penitentiary; on March 18th the solicitor made application for a special court, himself fixing the date, and on the same day the Governor ordered a special court to be held at Abbeville on April 5th; on March 20th the Chief Justice designated Judge Sease to hold the court. The defendants were detained in the penitentiary for about a week, and were then transferred, not to Abbeville, but to Greenville jail, for convenient access by their counsel, attorneys of Greenville; there they were kept until the morning of the opening of the special court at Abbeville, when they were transferred to the Abbeville jail. The foreman of the grand jury of Abbeville county made affidavit to the effect that the defendants could not safely be brought to Abbeville county on account of prevailing hot sentiment; the sheriff of the county recommended to the Governor military protection during the trial that was approaching; more than 100 affidavits were submitted by the defendants upon their motion for a change of venue on the ground that a fair trial could not be had; the motion was refused. The defendants moved for a continuance of the case upon the ground that defendants had not had sufficient time to prepare their defense, their counsel residing in another county, and the defendants being a part of the time in the state penitentiary, and that every member of the bar of Abbeville had been approached for the purpose of assistance, but without avail; the motion was refused. The failure to employ local assistance in the defense among the members of the bar at Abbeville is a striking index of the condition of public sentiment.

Notwithstanding the fact that section 4020 of the Code of Laws requires that ten days' notice of the drawing of the jury shall be given, only five days had been given. A motion to quash the venue was made upon this ground and refused. If the statutory notice had been given, the court could not have been held at the appointed time. But it had to be held, and the slight matter of a statutory regulation must not stand in the way. If the special court had been legally ordered, of course every other case upon the calendar could have been tried. The trial of no other case than the Gossett case was suggested. The court was ordered to try the Gossetts. A side light on the drawing of the jury clearly shows this. The names of two jurors drawn were discarded—the one upon the ground that he was related to the prosecutrix in the Gossett case; the other upon the ground that he was related to the young woman who was a companion of the prosecutrix upon the occasion of the alleged crime. This may have presented a ground for objection to the competency of these jurors upon the trial of the case, but it presented no ground for excluding them from the panel, which in contemplation of law was drawn to try every case then on the docket. Their exclusion is conclusive of the purpose which was in the minds of all concerned, of the ordering of the special court—to try the Gossetts.

A striking circumstance occurred during the trial which reflects the fully appreciated temper of the spectators and their sullen determination that justice as they conceive it should not be balked. At the close of the testimony the circuit judge directed a verdict in favor of one of the defendants, John Gossett; the record contains this statement:

"As soon as this motion was granted, under arrangement of the court and court officials, John Gossett was handcuffed as though he were being carried back to jail and quietly slipped out the rear entrance of the courthouse and placed in an automobile and sent out of the county with all possible speed."

We are convinced that the procedure provided in this section is a bald concession to the spirit of mob law, and presents the spectacle of the law, strong and mighty, bowing to the despotism of the mob, which has been declared to be greater than the tyranny of a despot. It provides a miserable compromise with lynch law, enabling the law to bargain with the mob to stay its hand, and allow the court, under the forms of law, to accomplish what is equally as reprehensible, a judicial lynching. It is notorious that such bargains have been made; the angry mob has been appeased by the promise of a quick special court to try the offender, under circumstances that render his conviction inevitable.

There can be no compromise with the spirit of lynching for any crime. Those who compose such a mob are themselves without the pale of law, and commit a crime, not only against the victim of their vengeance, but against the majesty of the law. They are not entitled to recognition as legitimate parties to a compact. They trample under their dusty feet the pandects of our civilization and spit upon the sacred rights of the individual. The law ought to be, and is, strong enough to treat them as criminals. It seems hardly necessary to say that, in the discussion and decision of this question, the court is entirely impersonal, without the slightest purpose to reflect upon the character or conduct of the solicitor of the Eighth circuit, whose ability and character render such reflection impossible.

The court deems it unnecessary to consider the other questions raised by the exceptions.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the court of general sessions for Abbeville county for proceedings conformable to law.

BLACKWELL v. FAUCETT. (No. 10708.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 28, 1921.)

1. Judgment  $\S$ 250—No recovery on cause of action not pleaded.

Where plaintiff's cause of action for conversion of certain shingles and cement was based on a contract for the purchase of the land on which the shingles and cement were placed, plaintiff cannot recover for the conversion on any theory of annexation of the material to the land.

2. Justices of the peace  $\S$ 141(2)—Equitable relief improperly granted in circuit court on appeal from magistrate.

Where the case was before the circuit court on appeal from a magistrate, it should have been decided on the jurisdictional facts as they existed in the magistrate's court, and an equitable remedy, not enforceable in the magistrate's court, was improperly granted.

3. Justices of the peace  $\S$ 47—Where reformation of contract for sale of land essential to recovery, magistrate was without jurisdiction.

Where plaintiff sued for conversion of shingles and cement, claiming title because they were sold to him with the tract of land on which they were placed, and were included in the trade evidenced by the written contract for the sale of the land, which contract did not in fact refer to them, reformation of such contract to include them was essential to plaintiff's recovery, and therefore a magistrate was without jurisdiction.

4. Evidence  $\S$ 397(1)—Court can look only to terms of written contract.

When the parties have reduced their contract to writing, the court can look only to the terms in which the parties have expressed their intention in such writing.

Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; Ernest Moore, Judge.

Action by Joe Blackwell against W. T. Faucett. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed.

Dobson & Vassy, of Gaffney, for appellant.
G. W. Speer, of Gaffney, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action in magistrate court for $100, the value of certain shingles and cement alleged to be the property of the plaintiff, and wrongfully converted to his own use by the defendant. Judgment for the plaintiff; appeal to circuit court; judgment of magistrate affirmed; defendant appeals.

These are the facts of this controversy, as we gather them from the record:

In the fall of 1919, the plaintiff, Blackwell, bargained with the defendant, Faucett, for a tract of land at the price of $3,500, payable $100 cash, the assumption of an outstanding mortgage of $600, and $2,800 on January 2, 1920; they entered into a written contract expressing these terms; on January 2, 1920, Blackwell complied with the terms of the sale, received from Faucett a deed conveying the premises, and on January 5th moved in and took possession. It appears that there was a lot of cement and shingles upon the premises when Blackwell bargained for the place, worth $89, which Faucett carried away with him when he moved out. Blackwell, upon finding that out, demanded the cement and shingles from Faucett, claiming that they were specifically included in the trade for the land, all covered by the agreed price. Faucett refused to deliver them, and this suit, in magistrate's court, resulted. The cement and shingles are not mentioned either in the written contract or in the deed.

Upon the trial in magistrate's court the plaintiff was allowed over the defendant's objection to testify that he had bought the land, cement, and shingles, for $3,500; two witnesses for him were allowed to state the terms of the trade to have been as plaintiff testified. The ground of the defendant's objection to all of this testimony was that it tended to vary and add to the terms of the written contract referred to, and of the deed. The objection was overruled by the magistrate, who, after taking the defendant's testimony, denying that the cement and shingles were included, rendered judgment in favor of Blackwell for their value, $89. On appeal to the circuit court the presiding judge affirmed the judgment of the magistrate, intimating, without expressly deciding, that the parol testimony may have been admissible upon the theory that the material was placed upon the premises for annexation, and therefore passed with the land, but really basing his decision upon the fact of mistake in the written contract not expressing the oral agreement. He realized the difficulty of giving effect to this conclusion without a reformation of the contract, which, being an equitable remedy, could not be enforced in the magistrate's court; he evaded the difficulty by holding that, as the case was then in the court of common pleas, which did have equitable jurisdiction, the plaintiff might invoke its unlimited power to accomplish the reformation.

[1] It is a sufficient answer to the suggestion relating to the annexation of the material to say that no such claim was made by the plaintiff, whose cause of action was distinctly upon the contract.

[2] As to the other position taken by the circuit judge, it cannot be sustained, for the reason that the case was before him on appeal, not originally, and of course should have been decided upon the jurisdictional facts as they existed in the magistrate's court. It might with equal propriety be contended that, if the action had been for the recovery of real estate in the magistrate's court, on appeal the court of common pleas would have had the power to "give judgment according to the justice of the case."

[3] The real question for determination by this court is whether, under the circumstances, a reformation of the written contract was essential to the plaintiff's recovery. If it was, the magistrate's court was clearly without jurisdiction. That it was essential appears too apparent for argument. The plaintiff's cause of action was upon the contract; he claimed title to the cement and shingles by reason of the fact that they were sold to him with the tract of land—that they were included in the trade evidenced by the written contract. As a matter of fact, no reference is made to them in the written contract, and if they can be said to have been included in the written contract that result can only be accomplished by showing that they were included in the oral agreement which preceded the written contract, and by mistake were omitted. This would present a clear case for reformation of the written contract, and for recovery upon it when so reformed. Until it has been reformed the plaintiff suing upon it is met with the rule forbidding parol evidence under the circumstances.

[4] There is no more wholesome rule of law, in my opinion, than that announced in Lagrone v. Timmerman, 48 S. C. 411:

"When the parties have reduced their contract to writing, the court can only look to the terms in which the parties have expressed their intention in such writing."

And quoting from 1 Greenl. Ev. § 275:

"When parties have deliberately put their engagements into writing, in such terms as import a legal obligation, without any uncertainty as to the object or extent of such engagement, it is conclusively presumed that the whole engagement of the parties, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, was reduced to writing; and all oral testimony of a previous colloquium between the parties, or a conversation or declaration at the time when it was completed or afterwards, as it would tend in many instances to substitute a new and different contract for the one which was really agreed upon, to the prejudice, possibly, of one of the parties, is rejected."

"When a writing, upon its face, imports to be a complete expression of the whole agreement, and contains thereon all that is necessary to constitute a contract, it is presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term, and parol evidence is not admissible to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular item to which the parol evidence is directed." 10 R. C. L. 1030.

The "primary right," as Mr. Pomeroy terms it (volume 2, § 911), of the plaintiff is legal, the right to recover the value of the cement and shingles which, under the contract, belonged to him, and which has been unlawfully converted to his own use by the defendant; the plaintiff's remedy is not upon the written contract for it makes no mention of these commodities, but it is a reformation of the written contract that it may correctly express the agreement of the parties by including these commodities which were through mistake omitted from the contract. His primary right being legal, and his remedy purely equitable, the jurisdiction of the court of equity is exclusive.

The magistrate's court, under the Constitution, having no equitable jurisdiction, it was impossible for the plaintiff to obtain in that court the essential relief to recovery. He was inexorably confined to his legal action upon the contract, which by its failure to establish the right to the commodities for which he sued rendered parol testimony of that element inadmissible. If the plaintiff in a law case upon a written contract can, without notice to the defendant, recover upon an element in the preceding parol agreement which, by mistake, was omitted from the written contract, there is no necessity in any case for the reformation of the contract.

It is declared in Moore v. Edwards' Ex'rs, 1 Ball. 23, that while "mistake" is a branch of equity jurisdiction, it is not exclusively so, except where a discovery is indispensable, or "the nature of the relief is such as to require the extraordinary aid of a court of equity." Without a reformation of the written contract the plaintiff cannot prove the omitted element upon which he relies, for he would thereby violate the rule against parol evidence; the law court could not reform a contract so as to render this testimony admissible; the equity court could; the plaintiff's ability, therefore, to introduce such testimony depended upon the relief which required, and could only be obtained by, "the extraordinary aid of a court of equity"; which demonstrates that the plaintiff's relief upon the ground of mistake could only be obtained in a court of equity. That case involved the simple correction of an error, a "mistake," in the application of a certain credit upon an execution, just as a law court could correct a similar error in a credit upon a note; it involved no feature of equitable cognizance; no reformation of the instrument, or other relief which required "the extraordinary aid of a court of equity"; and very properly the court held that the error could be corrected in a court of law. But here the plaintiff, in order to recover upon the omitted element, is obliged to invoke the extraordinary aid. So in the case of Griffin v. Ry. Co., 66 S. C. 77, 44 S. E. 562, it was held that in a law case the question of fraud in the execution of a release, signed by the plaintiff, could be determined by the law court. It was simply the establishment of a fact which nullified the release, and no aid of the equity court was required. Other cases might be cited illustrative of the distinction between cases where a fact is allowed to be proved in a law case which defeats the adversary's contention, although it may be a matter of equitable jurisdiction, and cases where the extraordinary aid of a court of equity is invoked to afford certain relief upon the proof of such fact.

The very recent case of Gill v. Ruggles, 104 S. C. 461, 89 S. E. 503, is instructive. There parol evidence was held inadmissible to establish an agreement which was not included in the subsequent written agreement. No effort was made to reform the written agreement, and until it was reformed the evidence was not admissible.

The judgment should be reversed and the case remanded to the magistrate for a new trial. That being the opinion of a majority of the court, it is so ordered.

Judgment reversed.

Statement of Facts.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). The facts as found by his honor the circuit judge are as follows:

"This cause came on to be heard upon appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the court of Magistrate J. B. Bell, in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $89, the value of certain shingles and cement belonging to the plaintiff and wrongfully taken and converted to his own use by the defendant. The facts established by the evidence are as follows:

"Plaintiff and defendant were negotiating for the sale by the latter and the purchase by the former of a certain tract of land and certain cement and shingles then upon the lands and intended by the owner for use in the repair of buildings thereon. The final conclusion reached by the parties was that the defendant would sell and the plaintiff would buy the lands in question, including the shingles and cement, at and for the price of $3,500, whereupon $100 of the purchase price was paid by the plaintiff and a contract in writing was signed by the defendant for the execution by him of a deed of conveyance of the premises to the plaintiff upon the payment by the latter of the remaining purchase money upon a then future day therein specified. By a mutual mistake of the parties, there was no mention of the shingles and cement in this contract; but the fact that these chattels were intended by the parties to be conveyed along with the land is established by the evidence, although controverted by the defendant.

"The plaintiff having subsequently paid the credit portion of the purchase money, in pursuance of the contract, a deed of conveyance to him of the lands in fee simple was duly executed and delivered by the defendant; but, by reason of a continuance of the mutual mistake, this deed contained no direct reference to the shingles and cement now in controversy. It is established by the evidence, however, that it was the purpose and intention of the parties at the time that the title to the shingles and cement should pass by this conveyance.

"Upon taking possession of the land, in pursuance of this deed, the plaintiff discovered that the shingles and cement had been removed from the premises and converted to his own use by the defendant, and, thereupon, this action was brought in the court of magistrate for the recovery of the property so converted or the value thereof. The evidence has been taken, and there is no suggestion that any other testimony is available.

"There is very respectable authority for the proposition that chattels placed upon the premises by the owner, with the intention of annexing the same to the realty, thereby become a part of the freehold, and will pass by a deed of the premises as fixtures under the doctrine of constructive annexation. See 19 Cyc. 1042-1044. Certainly, this should be the effect of such a deed when such was the intention of the parties, as was the fact in the case at bar. The proof of such an intention by parol does not vary or contradict the writing in the contract or deed, as it merely serves to establish the status of the chattel as being a fixture, and passing by the deed.

"Even, however, if the shingles and cement here in controversy did not become fixtures by constructive annexation to the realty, under the contract between the parties plaintiff and defendant for the sale by the latter and the purchase by the former of the lands, including the shingles and cement, and the deed made in pursuance thereof, so as to pass the legal title to these chattels as fixtures, it still does not follow that the complaint in this case should be dismissed merely on account of the fact that the action was originally commenced in the court of magistrate."

The exceptions are as follows:

(1) "That his honor erred in finding and holding that the cement and shingles were intended by the owner for use in the repair of buildings on the premises. It is respectfully submitted that there is no testimony in the case to support such finding."

(2) "That his honor erred in finding as follows: 'The final conclusion reached by the parties was that the defendant would sell and the plaintiff would buy the land in question, including the shingles and cement, at and for the price of $3,500.'"

(3) "That his honor erred in finding as follows: 'By a mutual mistake of the parties, there was no mention of the shingles and cement in this (written) contract, and that, by reason of a continuance of the mutual mistake, this deed contained no direct reference to the shingles and cement now in controversy.' It is submitted that there is no testimony, nor even a suggestion in the case, that the cement and shingles were omitted from the written contract and the deed, by mutual mistake, or by mistake of either of the parties."

(4) "That his honor erred in finding as follows: 'It is established by the evidence, however, that it was the purpose and intention of the parties, at the time, that the title to the shingles and cement should pass by this conveyance.' The contract for the purchase of the premises by the plaintiff and the deed of conveyance by the defendant to the plaintiff both being in writing and being conclusively presumed to contain the whole contract, it is respectfully submitted that there is no competent testimony to support the said finding."

(5) "That his honor erred in holding that title to the shingles and cement would pass with a conveyance of the real estate by reason of their being placed upon the premises with the purpose and intention of repairing buildings thereon, in that: First, there is no testimony that the cement and shingles were placed upon the premises for that purpose; and, second, that the cement and shingles, not being attached or annexed to the realty, became no part thereof, and will not pass with the land."

(6) "That his honor erred as a matter of law in holding that the circuit court should grant equitable relief in this case under section 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure or any other provision of law. That the case having been commenced in the magistrate's court, and there being no proper allegations for the granting of equitable relief, and the defendant having been put on no notice that such relief would be sought, his honor erred in granting conceived equitable relief."

(7) "That even if the court had authority and power to grant equitable relief in this case, there is no testimony in the case entitling the plaintiff to equitable relief, for the reason that there is no testimony that the shingles and cement were omitted from the written contracts by fraud, duress, undue influence, or mutual mistake of the parties, and his honor erred in holding that the contract should be reformed, and in not reversing the judgment of the magistrate's court."

(8) "That his honor erred in affirming the judgment of the magistrate's court, and in not reversing said judgment upon each of the several and separate grounds contained in the defendant's appeal to the circuit court, each of which grounds is hereby made the basis of this exception."

Opinion.

The exceptions will be considered in their regular order.

First Exception.—This exception cannot be sustained, for the reason, that there was testimony tending to sustain the finding of fact by his honor the circuit judge; therefore such finding is not subject to review by this court. Gossett v. Gladden, 112 S. C. 144, 99 S. E. 752.

Second Exception.—For the reason just mentioned, and for the additional reason that this exception fails to specify the ground of error, it is also overruled.

Third Exception.—What was said in considering the first exception is conclusive of the question presented by this exception.

Fourth Exception.—The appellant's attorneys rely upon the rule thus announced in 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 275:

"When parties have deliberately put their engagements into writing, in such terms as impart a legal obligation, without any uncertainty as to the object or extent of such engagement, it is conclusively presumed, that the whole engagement of the parties, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, was reduced to writing; and all oral testimony of a previous colloquium between the parties, or of conversation or declaration at the time when it was completed or afterwards, as it would tend, in many instances, to substitute a new and different contract for the one which was really agreed upon, to the prejudice, possibly, of one of the parties, is rejected."

The court after quoting the foregoing with approval, in the case of Lagrone v. Timmerman, 46 S. C. 372, 24 S. E. 290, says:

"In other words—as the rule is now more briefly expressed—parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument."

This case is cited by the appellant's attorneys, together with numerous other authorities sustaining this doctrine. There are, however, two exceptions to this general rule, as distinct and well recognized as the rule itself, to wit, fraud and mistake. In Lee v. Lee, 11 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 574, it is said:

"If an instrument * * * absolute on its face can be converted by parol into a defeasible ble instrument, except where the omission to reduce the defeasance to writing was occasioned by fraud or mistake, the evidence must be very clear and convincing. * * * But if there be fraud, whether it consist in not executing a defeasance, or in misrepresenting the character of the instrument, or in any other way, it would be a reproach to the administration of justice if the perpetrator of the fraud could shield himself from detection and exposure by the abuse of rules instituted to prevent fraud. * * * In the language of the Supreme Court, 'the oral evidence is admissible in such cases upon the general principles of equity jurisprudence,' and to prevent the successful practice of such frauds under the shelter of any written papers, however precise and formal. The defendant's principal ground of appeal is because his agreement to reconvey the lands was a parol trust, and void under statute of frauds. But Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Eq. 421, and Kinard v. Heirs, 3 Rich. Eq. 423, 55 Am. Dec. 643, establish that the statute cannot be used as an instrument of fraud."

The case of Lee v. Lee, 11 Rich. Eq. 574, is cited with approval in Welborn v. Dixon, 70 S. C. 108, 49 S. E. 232, 3 Ann. Cas. 407. The jurisdiction of the court in the exercise of its chancery powers is not exclusive in cases of fraud or mistake.

"Accidents and mistakes certainly constitute one branch of equity jurisprudence; but it is not peculiar, except when a discovery is indispensable, or the nature of the relief such as to require the extraordinary aid of chancery. Actions at law to recover back money paid by mistake constitute, in all the books of practice, a conspicuous class of causes, for which the action of assumpsit may be maintained at law; and there is no question that, in general, when the facts can be proved according to the rules of the common law, and the remedy is such as a court of law can administer, consistently, with the prescribed modes of proceeding, mistakes may be inquired into in a court of law. In the case under consideration, the plaintiff sued out a sci. fa. to revive a judgment against the defendant, and as evidence of payment, the defendant produces an execution, on which is indorsed the word 'satisfied;' the plaintiff replies it was so indorsed by mistake. There is nothing magical in the term itself. The evidence offered was admissible according to the rules of the common law, the relief such as a court of common law was competent to give, and the court, therefore, clearly had jurisdiction." Moore v. Edwards' Ex'rs, 1 Bail. 28.

This language is quoted with approval in the following cases: Griffin v. Ry., 66 S. C. 77, 44 S. E. 562; Hodges v. Kohn, 67 S. C. 69, 45 S. E. 102; Harris v. Harris, 104 S. C. 33, 88 S. E. 276; and Military Co. v. Fayonsky, 113 S. C. 470, 101 S. E. 818. See, also, Fass v. Ins. Co., 105 S. C. 364, 89 S. E. 1040.

Nor is it necessary, under certain circumstances, for the facts upon which a party relies to show fraud or mistake to be stated in the pleadings.

"Under the practice prevailing in this state, before the adoption of the Code of Procedure, even in a law case, the court had the right, when an instrument of writing was introduced in evidence, although it was not mentioned in the pleadings, to declare it null and void, in so far as that action was concerned. In the case of Maddox v. Williamson, 1 Strob. L. 23, the court says: 'An assignment, no more than a deed, can, in a court of law, be set aside and canceled; but when either deed or assignment comes in question in an issue here, it will, if fraudulent and void, be, for the purposes of that issue, regarded as a nullity. Section 3, art. 5, of the Constitution of South Carolina, provides: 'That justice may be administered in a uniform mode of pleading, without distinction between law and equity, they (the General Assembly) shall provide for abolishing the distinct forms of action, and for that purpose shall appoint some suitable person or persons, whose duty it shall be to revise, modify, and abridge the rules, practice, pleadings, and forms of the courts now in use in this state.' In pursuance of this constitutional requirement, the Legislature adopted the Code of Procedure, under whose liberal provisions both legal and equitable issues may be decided in one action. We do not see, therefore, why the court below did not have the right to declare the indenture null and void." McKenzie v. Sifford, 45 S. C. 496, 23 S. E. 622; Griffin v. Southern Ry., 66 S. C. 85, 44 S. E. 562; Hodges v. Kohn, 67 S. C. 69, 45 S. E. 102; Railway v. Devlin, 85 S. C. 128, 67 S. E. 149; Stack v. Haigler, 90 S. C. 319, 73 S. E. 364.

It must be remembered that it was the defendant, and not the plaintiff, that set up the deed in his answer, and introduced it in evidence. It would therefore be a fraud on the rights of the plaintiff, and would allow the defendant to take advantage of his own wrong, if the plaintiff was denied the right to show the mistake in question. This exception is overruled.

Fifth Exception.—In the first place, there was testimony tending to sustain the finding of his honor the circuit judge; and, in the second place, it does not necessarily follow that the cement and shingles were not to be regarded as fixtures, by reason of the fact that they may not have been physically attached to the freehold. The rule in such cases is thus stated in Hurst v. Furniture Co., 95 S. C. 221, 78 S. E. 960:

"The great confusion in regard to the law of fixtures, has arisen from the effort to construe that as a fixture in one case, because it was so regarded in other cases. A fixture involves a mixed question of law and fact. It is incumbent on the court to define a fixture, but whether it is such in a particular instance, depends upon the facts of that case, unless the facts are susceptible of but one inference. In modern times, the question whether the article is to be regarded as a fixture depends generally upon the intention of the parties in the particular case."

This exception cannot be sustained.

Sixth Exception.—This exception is taken under a misapprehension. It is true his honor the circuit judge discussed the question mentioned in the exception, but he did not rest his conclusion thereon. After discussing such question, he thus states the ground upon which he rested his decision: "For the reason hereinabove stated, however, it is conceived that the plaintiff is entitled to such recovery even at law." The reasons hereinbefore set out are those to which he had reference. Furthermore, as said by Mr. Justice Watts, in Rowell v. Hines, 114 S. C. 339, 103 S. E. 545: "This court will sustain an order of the circuit court, if its conclusions are right and its reasons wrong." This exception is overruled.

Seventh Exception.—What has already been said is conclusive of the question presented by this exception.

Eighth Exception.—Rule 5, § 6, of this court (90 S. E. vii) provides, that each exception must contain a concise statement of one proposition of law, and that each exception must contain within itself a complete assignment of error, and a mere reference therein to any other exception then or previously taken, or request to charge, will not be considered. This exception violates the said rule. Hayes v. McGill, 108 S. E. 150.

For these reasons I dissent.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

Appeal and error ⇐105—No appeal from refusal to dismiss.

No appeal lies from a refusal to dismiss.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by E. B. Capps, administrator of I. M. Williamson, against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Motion to dismiss overruled, and defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

F. S. Spruill, of Rocky Mount, and Carl H. Davis, of Wilmington, for appellants.

O. P. Dickinson, of Wilson, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The judgment appealed from is as follows:

"The motion to dismiss made by the defendant in his answer is hereby overruled; and the other matters and things set up in the pleadings are hereby continued for further consideration by the court."

The uniform decisions of this court have always been that "no appeal lies from a refusal to dismiss." McBryde v. Patterson, 78 N. C. 412, down to date, see cases cited under C. S. § 638, at page 278 of volume 1. If it were otherwise, the defendant in every case could always get from 6 to 12 months' delay by simply moving to dismiss and appealing from a refusal to do so.

It is useless to cite cases, for they are very numerous and without any exception. As this court has said (as to another point):

"There are some matters at least, which should be deemed settled and this is one of them." Burrell v. Hughes, 120 N. C. 279, 28 S. E. 782.

Appeal dismissed.

ARMSTRONG v. SPRUILL et ux. (No. 10.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

Waters and water courses ⇐126(3)—Whether lower proprietor damaged by upper proprietors' enlargement of drainage canal held for jury.

In an action for the overflowing of the lands of a lower proprietor, alleged to have been caused by the enlargement of a drainage canal by the upper proprietors, without pursuing their remedy under C. S. § 5260 et seq., and section 5274, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether such enlargement caused damage to plaintiff, the question should have been submitted to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Jesse Armstrong against C. T. Spruill and wife. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, and Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

T. H. Woodley, of Columbia, and Aydlott & Simpson, of Elizabeth City, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. It appears by the uncontradicted testimony that more than 60 years ago the canal was cut which drained the lands now owned by plaintiff and defendants and all other parties along its line; that they all drained into this canal and helped maintain it until 1915. The plaintiff alleges that the defendants, finding the old canal, to use which they have shown a prescriptive right, had become insufficient, enlarged the same and placed water upon plaintiff, to his damage. If the defendants, upper proprietors, desired to enlarge the canal, their remedy was under C. S. § 5260 et seq. Under C. S. § 5274, they could in a proper proceeding have had said canal enlarged or deepened, with a just apportionment of the costs. Instead of pursuing this remedy, there is evidence that the defendants enlarged the canal according to their own views, and increased the flow of water upon the land of plaintiff; he being the lower proprietor.

There is a clear conflict of evidence as to whether as a matter of fact the enlargement of the canal by the defendant has caused damage to the plaintiff. The case, therefore, should have been submitted to the jury upon the evidence, and the judgment of nonsuit is reversed.

JENETTE et al. v. HOVEY & CO. et al.
(No. 21.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error  $\S$  91(5)—Appeal may be taken from overruling of motion to dismiss attachment.

On the overruling of defendant's motion to dismiss an attachment for lack of sufficient publication of notice, a substantial right is affected, and a present appeal will lie.

2. Attachment  $\S$  206—Summons unnecessary in attachment suit.

In proper instances, where civil actions are commenced, and service is obtained by attachment on defendant's property, and publication of a notice based on the jurisdiction thus acquired, the issuance of a summons is unnecessary.

3. Attachment  $\S$  209(4) — Court may in its discretion permit publication to continue after a delay.

Under C. S.  $\S$  802, providing that in attachment suits, where plaintiff relies on service by publication, publication must be commenced within 30 days after granting the attachment, and section 806, providing that publication must be for 4 successive weeks, the court may in its discretion permit the publication to continue, on an affidavit filed nearly a year after the institution of the action, and after defendant has appeared specially and moved to dismiss for want of publication.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Allen, Judge.

Action by W. H. Jenette and others against Hovey & Co. and the First & Citizens' National Bank of Elizabeth City, N. C. The Mars Hill Trust Company intervened. From an order of the court overruling the motion to dismiss the action and vacate the attachment, defendant Hovey & Co. appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs, citizens of this state, having a cause of action against Hovey & Co., a foreign resident corporation, for an alleged breach of contract, instituted this suit in the superior court of Pasquotank county and sought to obtain service upon the defendant by attaching the proceeds of a certain draft in the hands of the First & Citizens' National Bank, of Elizabeth City, N. C.; said funds presumably belonging to the defendant. Summons was issued January 28, 1920, and duly served on the garnishee bank, but returned, on the day of its issuance, as to Hovey & Co., "Not to be found in North Carolina." On the same day, plaintiffs secured from the clerk of the superior court a warrant of attachment, after filing proper affidavit and giving bond as required by statute, and the sheriff duly levied upon the above-mentioned funds, said to be the property of the defendant. The warrant of attachment was served immediately, and made returnable on the 17th day of February, 1920.

Thereafter, on October 30, 1920, the Mars Hill Trust Company, a Maine corporation, was allowed to intervene and set up its claim of title to the proceeds of said draft. The funds were turned over to the intervener by order of court, upon the execution and filing of a good and sufficient bond "for the protection of all parties to this cause." The plaintiffs' complaint and answer of the intervener, Mars Hill Trust Company, were filed on December 27, 1920. The defendant Hovey & Co. has not answered.

At the January term, 1921, this cause being on the docket for trial, Hovey & Co., through its attorney, entered a special appearance and moved to dismiss the action and to vacate the attachment, alleging that no valid service of the summons or warrant of attachment had been made, by publication or otherwise, as required by law. While this motion was being heard before his honor in the superior court, plaintiffs filed with the clerk an affidavit and obtained from him an order of publication, to which reference is made in the judgment of the court, as follows:

"Pending the determination of the motion of Hovey & Co. on its special appearance, said motion not being determined the day it was made, an affidavit for publication was filed by plaintiffs, and an order of publication was signed by the clerk of the superior court—said affidavit being also filed before the clerk—which affidavit and order appear in the record, to which reference is made, and publication was commenced as set forth in copy of notice appearing in the record. The said affidavit and order of the clerk and publication were made without the knowledge or approval of any parties to the action, other than plaintiffs, and without the knowledge of the judge before whom the motion to dismiss was pending. It appearing to the court that at the time of the institution of the action an affidavit as set out in the record was filed in this cause, though no order of publication was actually signed, the court in its discretion orders and permits the plaintiffs to proceed with the publication pending the determination of this motion, in accordance with the order of the clerk made herein. It is further ordered that the motion of the defendant Hovey & Co., upon its special appearance, to dismiss the action and vacate the attachment, be and the same is hereby overruled."

The defendant Hovey & Co. noted an exception and appealed.

W. A. Worth, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellees.

STACY, J. (after stating the facts as above). This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract growing out of an agreement on the part of the defendant Hovey & Co. to deliver a certain quantity of seed Irish potatoes to the plaintiffs at Elizabeth City, N. C., during the month of January, 1920. The defendant being a nonresident corporation and having no process agent in this state, could not be served personally with summons; hence service was sought to be obtained by issuing a warrant of attachment and levying upon the proceeds of a draft in the hands of the First & Citizens' National Bank, of Elizabeth City, N. C., it being alleged that said funds belonged to Hovey & Co. The defendant through its counsel, entered a special appearance, and upon the facts as above stated moved to dismiss the attachment for want of any service of process, alleging that none had been made, either personally or by publication.

[1] From an adverse ruling on this motion, the defendant Hovey & Co. excepted and immediately appealed, which it had a right to do under a number of decisions of this court. Finch v. Slater, 152 N. C. 155, 67 S. E. 264, and Warlick v. Reynolds, 151 N. C. 606, 66 S. E. 657. The motion to dismiss the attachment affects a substantial right, and from the court's refusal to grant the same a present appeal will lie. Sheldon v. Kivett, 110 N. C. 408, 14 S. E. 970; Rouilhac v. Brown, 87 N. C. 1; Judd v. Mining Co., 120 N. C. 397, 27 S. E. 81.

[2] The appellant rests its case upon the ground that plaintiffs have failed to meet the requirements of the statute with respect to service of process as asked for and issued in this case. In the first place, it should be noted that, in proper instances, where civil actions are commenced and service is obtained by attachment of defendant's property and publication of a notice based upon the jurisdiction thus acquired, the issuance of a summons is unnecessary. Mills v. Hansel, 168 N. C. 651, 85 S. E. 17; Armstrong v. Kinsell, 164 N. C. 125, 80 S. E. 235; Currie v. Mining Co., 157 N. C. 217, 72 S. E. 980; Grocery Co. v. Bag Co., 142 N. C. 174, 55 S. E. 90; Best v. Mortgage Co., 128 N. C. 351, 38 S. E. 923.

But it is urged that the law in this respect was declared to be otherwise in Ditmore v. Goins, 128 N. C. 325, 39 S. E. 61, and McClure v. Fellows, 131 N. C. 509, 42 S. E. 951, and so it was. It may be observed, however, that these cases were in direct conflict with the decision of the court in Best v. Mortgage Co., 128 N. C. 351, 38 S. E. 923, and, besides, McClure's Case was expressly overruled in Grocery Co. v. Bag Co., 142 N. C.

174, 55 S. E. 90, which of necessity overruled Ditmore's Case, though not specifically mentioned therein. Therefore both of these cases must now be considered, or understood, as having been overruled and no longer as precedents. They have never been approved in any subsequent opinion; but, on the contrary, a different ruling has been announced and consistently followed.

[3] We then come to consider whether plaintiffs have brought themselves within the statute providing for service by attachment and publication. The affidavit filed at the institution of the action would have justified the clerk in signing an order of publication (Luttrell v. Martin, 112 N. C. 593, 17 S. E. 573, and Branch v. Frank, 81 N. C. 180), and his failure to do so, at the time, doubtless was due to an oversight or inadvertence on the part of plaintiffs. Nevertheless the necessary order was not made until an additional affidavit was filed, nearly a year later, and after the defendant had entered a special appearance and moved to dismiss for want of publication, etc. The defendant contends that under C. S. § 802, and the decision of this court in Bowman v. Ward, 152 N. C. 602, 68 S. E. 2, the warrant of attachment in the instant case should have been vacated. While it is true the delay in obtaining the order of publication might well be characterized as unusual, and his honor probably would have been justified in so holding, yet we think it was within his discretion to permit the publication to continue. The rights of all parties have been preserved, and none destroyed, by this ruling. A similar question was presented in the case of Mills v. Hansel, supra, where the present Chief Justice, speaking for a unanimous court, said:

"The court acquired jurisdiction of the action by the service of the attachment upon the property of the defendant. If the notice was not duly served by the publication, it was 'error to discharge an attachment granted as ancillary to an action because of the insufficiency of the affidavit to obtain service of the summons by publication, for it is possible that the defect may be cured by amendments.' Branch v. Frank, 81 N. C. 180. The remedy is not to dismiss the attachment, but by ordering a republication, for, as the defendant is a nonresident, to dismiss the attachment may deprive the plaintiff of all remedy by the removal of the property before a new proceeding and attachment can be had"—citing Price v. Cox, 83 N. C. 261; Penniman v. Daniel, 90 N. C. 159; Id., 98 N. C. 332.

C. S. § 806, which bears more directly upon the question at issue, requires publication of the issuance of the attachment, unless the defendant can personally be served with process; and it has been held with us that a failure to make such service, either personally or by publication, entitles the defendant to have the attachment dismissed. But it has also been decided that the court, in its discretion, may extend the time for ordering publication and service of such process. Finch v. Slater, supra, Mills v. Hansel, supra, and Price v. Cox, 83 N. C. 261. Hence, upon authority, we think the ruling of his honor, made in the exercise of his discretion, must be upheld. It is so ordered.

Affirmed.

(182 N. C. 757)

LEROY v. SALIBA. (No. 22.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14. 1921.)

Appeal and error ¶107, 792—Appeal from order of reference before judgment on report held premature and subject to dismissal on court's own motion.

In an action to recover misappropriated partnership funds, where the jury found that the partnership existed, and the court ordered a reference to take an account of the partnership receipts and expenses, an appeal from such order before judgment on the report thereon is premature, and must be dismissed ex mero motu, the proper procedure being for defendant to note his exception, and, on the coming in of the report and exceptions thereto, appeal from the final judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Allen, Judge.

Action by J. H. Leroy against Dr. John Saliba. From an order of reference, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

See, also, 180 N. C. 15, 103 S. E. 921.

Upon the issue whether the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract of partnership, as alleged in the complaint, the jury answered "Yes"; and, it appearing to the court that the taking of an account of the partnership receipts and expenses was necessary for the information of the court, such reference is ordered, and the defendant appealed.

T. J. Markham and Aydlott & Simpson, all of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Ehringhaus & Small, Thompson & Wilson and Meekins & McMullan, all of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The jury having found that the partnership existed, an appeal from the order of reference before judgment upon the report thereon is premature and fragmentary, and must be dismissed by the court ex mero motu. The defendant should have noted his exception, and, upon the coming in of the report and exceptions thereto, should have brought up his appeal from the final judgment. No appeal lay at this stage. C. S. 573 (2), and cases there cited.

In Blackwell v. McCaine, 105 N. C. 460, 11 S. E. 360, the court said:

"Many cases decide that an appeal does not lie at once from an interlocutory judgment or order, unless it puts an end to the action, or may destroy or impair a substantial right of the complaining party to delay his appeal until the final judgment. He must assign error, or except, and have the same noted in the record, and bring the whole up by an appeal from the final judgment."

See, also, citations to that case in the Anno. Ed., especially Shankle v. Whitley, 131 N. C. 168, 42 S. E. 574.

The practice is thus stated nowhere more clearly than by Hoke, J., in Jones v. Wooten, 137 N. C. 425, 49 S. E. 917:

"Where a plea in bar is overruled or sustained, as a matter of law, by the judge, it is optional with the party to take an appeal at once or preserve his right by having an exception noted. Where, however, the issues are tried by a jury, and the right to an account is established by a verdict, and an order of reference made, it is proper to proceed with the reference, and an appeal can be taken only from a final judgment after report."

Appeal dismissed.

1. Carriers ¶158(1)—Cannot limit liability by arbitrary agreement as to value.

While a common carrier may charge a rate for transporting a shipment of freight, to be determined according to the value of the article shipped, the carrier cannot, by an arbitrary agreement as to the value of the article, limit its liability for its loss or damage through the fault of the carrier.

2. Carriers ¶166—Arbitrary fixing of value held not bona fide as matter of law.

Where the agent of the shipper, when delivering to the carrier for transportation an article of freight, states to the agent of the carrier that he does not know the value of the contents of the shipment, but at the suggestion of the agent of the carrier receiving the shipment the value is arbitrarily fixed at a sum far below the true value of the shipment, and a rate is made on the basis of such fixed value, such an arrangement cannot as a matter of law be held to be a bona fide effort between the carrier and shipper to fix the value of the article for the purpose of determining the rate.

3. Direction of verdict held error.

In a suit by the shipper against the carrier to recover for the loss of the shipment at its true value, which, as appears from the evidence, amounted to several hundred dollars, it was error to hold that the plaintiff could not recover a sum in excess of $50, the amount agreed upon, and the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff, upon motion of the defendant, for the sum of $50, was error.

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; Jno. R. Wilson, Judge.

Suit by Sarah A. Hudspeth against Mitchell County, and others. A general demurrer and all grounds of the special demurrer but one were overruled, and defendants bring error, and plaintiff files a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment affirmed on the main bill and reversed on the cross-bill.

Mrs. Sarah A. Hudspeth filed a petition against Mitchell county and Baker county, having for its purpose the recovery of damages, and for injunction. The petition alleged, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land on both sides of Flint river at Newton, Ga. The river is the dividing line between the counties of Mitchell and Baker. As the owner of the lands the plaintiff, and those under whom she claims title, have maintained and continuously operated a public toll ferry across the river at Newton in connection with the ferry road, which during said period of time connected with the public roads in Mitchell and Baker counties, which were worked and maintained by the counties for over 30 years. No bridge or other ferry has been operated over the river within three miles during any of said time, except that a ferry was established at a point about 200 yards down the stream from plaintiff's ferry about 20-odd years ago, and the same was operated from time to time for about 3 years, but has not been operated since that time. The ferry and franchise owned by plaintiff has a value of $20,000, and yields to plaintiff an annual income of $1,200 over and above the cost of operation.

In 1919 Mitchell county and Baker county, acting through their duly constituted authorities, having charge of the roads and revenues of those counties, respectively, agreed to establish and maintain over the Flint river at Newton a county-line bridge, including approaches thereto on each side of the river, the approaches to connect with the public roads of the counties on each side of the river. It was arranged between those counties and the State Highway Board of Georgia that state aid should be given to the counties in the construction of the bridge and its approaches, and that the same would then become a part of the system of state-aid roads of Georgia, with all the rights and liabilities of the counties and the State Highway Board as fixed by the laws of Georgia. On February —, 1920, each of the defendants issued and published in the official gazette of each county advertisements for bids for the building of the bridge and its approaches, as set out in the notice to bridge contractors, copy of which was attached to the petition. Pursuant to the foregoing it was arranged that the bridge and its approaches should be built by a bridge contractor, and the contract was duly entered into by the counties and the contractor acting for both of the counties.

Pursuant to the contract the defendants, on May 1, 1920, by and through the contractor (the St. Louis Structural Steel Company, Inc.) entered upon the lands of the plaintiff for the purpose of building thereon the bridge and its approaches, and took exclusive possession of certain described portions of the plaintiff's lands. The defendants, through the contractor, continued to hold exclusive possession of the lands described, and cleared from the same all trees and underbrush, and have been placing thereon the bridge and its approaches, a great part of the foundation of the bridge and its approaches having been completed. Plaintiff did not consent, but objected to the taking of her land without being compensated therefor; but she made no effort to prevent the taking of the lands by force or legal proceedings, because she knew that both of the defendants were solvent and liable to respond in damages to the plaintiff for the amount of damages done her by the taking of her lands. She has been injured and damaged in the amount of the value of the land taken, which, considering its value as a bridge site and ferry site and for other purposes, is and was at the time of the taking of the value of $25,000; and, excluding from consideration its value as a bridge site and ferry site, it is and was at the time of the taking of the value of $500. The establishment of the public bridge and approaches will entirely destroy the value of her ferry and its franchise; and she sues for the damage thereby inflicted on her, as well as for the value of the land taken from plaintiff. She therefore prays for judgment against the counties jointly for the sum of $24,500, being the damage done to her by the taking of the land and the establishment and operation of the bridge, considering the value of the land as a bridge site and ferry site exclusive of its other value, and for the further sum of $500 as the value of the land exclusive of its value as a bridge site and ferry site. On July 27, 1920, plaintiff was served with notice by the State Highway Board, pursuant to section 5206 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910, of its determination to construct and maintain a state-aid road from Camilla in Mitchell county to Newton in Baker county, the road to extend over the lands owned by plaintiff, and that the State Highway Board proposed to acquire title by condemnation proceedings "in accordance with the laws of Georgia."

It is alleged that the attempted condemnation proceedings are illegal and improper for a number of reasons, one of which is that, the defendants having already taken possession of the land of plaintiff, sought to be condemned by the exercise of eminent domain, the power to proceed and have the damages assessed as provided in the laws of Georgia with reference to the exercise of the power of eminent domain has been waived and lost by the counties, and therefore no longer exists in their agent, the State Highway Board. The law in reference to the exercise of the power of eminent domain provides apparently that the proceedings for the assessment of damages, including the appeals to the superior court, shall be, as to each piece of property sought to be condemned in different counties, had in the separate counties where the separate pieces of property are located; and this would result, if the condemnation proceedings were allowed to continue, in harassing the plaintiff with a multiplicity of suits, viz., a suit in Baker county for damages done by the taking of her property there, and a separate and independent suit in Mitchell county for the taking of her property in that county; whereas the two counties of Mitchell and Baker having joined in their act of appropriating the property of plaintiff as a whole in both counties, acting through a common agent, the plaintiff has the right to hold the two counties liable for the amount of damage done by the joint act as joint tortfeasors, and she has a right to sue them jointly in one suit, so as to have the whole matter of damages adjudicated in one action; and therefore the proceedings for separate condemnations of plaintiff's separate pieces of property should be enjoined because they are illegal, and in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits. The value of plaintiff's land taken by the defendants on each side of the river, and especially its value as a bridge site and as a ferry site, is an indivisible unit, the value of which cannot be ascertained by considering the land taken on either side of the river separately, nor is there any method or rule of law by which the two separate tribunals assessing damages separately in each county, under condemnation proceedings, could be required to consider the damage done plaintiff on the whole by taking the lands considered in connection with their value as a bridge site or a ferry site and by the destruction of plaintiff's ferry franchise, nor is there any method or rule of law by which the separate tribunals could be made to apportion properly the damages as between the two counties, so as to fix the amount thereof for which each county is liable to plaintiff; and for these reasons there could be in this case no proper application of any adequate and proper measure of damages for the injury done to plaintiff by the acts of the defendants, if the same are considered in two separate tribunals under the condemnation proceedings; and therefore, if the condemnation proceedings are allowed to proceed, plaintiff's remedy at law would be inadequate and incomplete. Unless equitable relief prayed for by her is granted, her damages will be irreparable. Her prayers are for damages, and for injunction against the condemnation proceedings.

The defendants demurred to the petition as amended, both generally and specially. The court overruled the general demurrer and all the grounds of the special demurrer but one (paragraph 5), which was sustained. This paragraph appears in the opinion. To the judgment overruling the general demurrer the defendants excepted; and on the judgment sustaining paragraph 5 of the special demurrer the plaintiff in her cross-bill of exceptions assigns error.

Benton Odom, of Newton, and A. S. Johnson, of Camilla, for plaintiffs in error.

Pope & Bennet, of Albany, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. In the main bill, exception is taken to the overruling of the general demurrer only. It is insisted that the plaintiff was afforded an adequate remedy at law for the enforcement of whatever rights she may have had under the Eminent Domain Act of 1894, as embraced in section 5206 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910. It is further insisted that, inasmuch as the condemnation proceedings had already been instituted under the act of 1894 (Acts 1894, p. 95), they should continue, and therefore that the present petition should have been dismissed in the court below. Equitable relief in the nature of an injunction is prayed against the condemnation proceedings. There can be no question, under the allegations, that the defendants are endeavoring to take plaintiff's land without just and adequate compensation having first been paid; and, unless the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, then the general demurrer should have been overruled, so far at least as the petition set out a cause of action for injunction. We are of the opinion that the Eminent Domain Act of 1894, as embodied in the Civil Code, § 5206 et seq., does not apply to the condemnation of a road and bridge site on the lands of another. In the case of Hutchinson v. Lowndes County, 131 Ga. 637 (3), 62 S. E. 1048, it was held that—

"The provisions embraced in Political Code, §§ 520-525, inclusive [now section 640 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910], were not repealed by the act of 1894, embodied in Civil Code, § 4657 et seq. [now section 5206 et seq.] or by the act of 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 66)."

It seems, therefore, that in condemning land for the establishment of a public road the counties have no right to proceed under section 5206 et seq., but must proceed under section 640 et seq. Section 640 provides that—

"On application for any new road, or alteration in an old road, the ordinary shall appoint three road commissioners, residing as near where such road is intended to pass as possible; and if they find it a public utility, they must proceed to mark it out, and make their report under oath to such ordinaries that it was laid out and marked conformably to law."

In the case of Ainslee v. Morgan County, 151 Ga. —, 105 S. E. 836, this court held, under the facts of that case, that—"It was error for the court to refuse to enjoin the county authorities from proceeding to condemn the land; there having been no compliance with section 640 et seq., Civ. Code 1910. Warren County v. Todd, 150 Ga. 690, 104 S. E. 906."

In that case Morgan county, through its board of commissioners of roads and revenues served upon Mrs. Ainslee a notice of its purpose to condemn a certain strip of land across her property, to be used for the construction of a public road. Mrs. Ainslee filed a petition, seeking to enjoin the county and the individuals constituting the board of commissioners from proceeding with the condemnation, alleging that it was the intention to use the property (condemnation of which was sought) for the purpose of changing the location of an existing road; that the change was unnecessary; that it would result in the destruction of a number of valuable shade trees and injury to petitioner's property for residence purposes; that no offer of compensation had been made to petitioner, etc. The defendants denied all the material allegations of the petition, and averred that they had endeavored to reach an agreement with the plaintiff as to the price to be paid her for the land, but were always informed that she would not sell any land to the county, etc. After hearing the evidence both for the plaintiff and the defendant, and after it was agreed in open court that the commissioners had not complied with section 640 et seq. of the Civil Code, the court refused to grant an injunction, holding that the county authorities were authorized to proceed under section 5206 et seq. of the Civil Code. The plaintiff excepted to the judgment refusing an injunction, and this court reversed the judgment of the lower court, as set out in the headnote above quoted. We think the principle ruled in the Ainslee Case is controlling here, and that the defendants could be enjoined from proceeding to condemn plaintiff's land under section 5206 et seq. of the Civil Code. We think also that defendants have an available remedy to condemn land for road purposes, under section 640 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910, if they see fit to avail themselves of it. But the court, clearly having jurisdiction of this case for the purpose of enjoining the illegal condemnation proceedings, can retain jurisdiction also for the purpose of determining the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, if any, and in order likewise to avoid a multiplicity of suits, etc.

While it is not alleged that the counties have actually opened up the road through the plaintiff's lands on both sides of the river, and have completed the bridge, and that the bridge and road are now in actual use by the public, the petition does allege that the counties have actually taken the right of way and bridge site, and have partially completed the road and bridge. The counties, having actually taken plaintiff's land, are liable to plaintiff for the value thereof. The counties cannot retain plaintiff's land without paying her therefor; and while the counties, as ruled above, are not authorized to condemn land under Civil Code, § 5206 et seq., nevertheless the plaintiff may maintain the suit for the recovery of the value of the land, or easement therein actually taken and appropriated by the counties for the purposes and in the manner set out in the petition. We do not hold that the counties may not, under proper pleadings, reserve the right to decline payment of the damages finally fixed, and to abandon the road and bridge. In the circumstances of this case, the burden is upon the counties to have the decree so molded as to permit them to decline to open the road as a public road and to be relieved from the payment of damages for the value of the right of way and bridge site, in the event they shall determine that the damages "transcend the utility of such road." Compare Civil Code, § 687. The counties could not relieve themselves of the damages, if any, occasioned by the trespass, by abandoning the road; but nothing here ruled is to be construed as holding that the county authorities may not, by proper pleadings, be left by the decree free to abandon the road and to decline to pay the damages finally assessed for the value of the plaintiff's land.

[2] 2. The court sustained paragraph 5 of the defendants' special demurrer, which in part was as follows:

"In the fifteenth paragraph [of the petition] the words 'which, considering its value as a bridge site and a ferry site and for other purposes, is and was at the time of such taking of the value of $25,000, and' on the ground that (a) said words and allegations are irrelevant, and constitute no element of any cause of action in favor of plaintiff against these defendants, and (b) they present a claim and measure of damages which is illegal and not allowable under the law, and which plaintiff is not entitled to, and which should not be considered in estimating plaintiff's damages."

The plaintiff in her cross-bill of exceptions excepted to this ruling of the court. We think that the court erred in sustaining this special demurrer. Section 781 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that—

"In determining the value of land taken for a bridge, its prospective value as a bridge site and its present value as a ferry, if one is in use, may be taken into the calculation."

Under the allegations of the present petition the land taken by the defendants from the plaintiff was for the avowed purpose of building a free bridge, and the approaches thereto, across the Flint river, and for this damage to her property she is entitled to just and adequate compensation; and in order to ascertain what this just and adequate compensation is, it seems to us, while the plaintiff has no exclusive right to establish and maintain a ferry on her land, as decided in Hudspeth v. Hall, 111 Ga. 510, 36 S. E. 770, yet the value of the land taken by the county as a ferry or bridge site, and the approaches thereto, together with all other facts and circumstances calculated to enhance or diminish the value of the property taken or damaged, may be inquired into. In the case of Dougherty County v. Tift, 75 Ga. 815, Blandford, Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"If Tift was the owner of the land through which this stream ran, on both sides, then, under the act of 1850, he had the right to erect a bridge over the same, and charge toll for crossing thereon; and, whether the bridge be public or private, it belonged to Tift, and, when the county of Dougherty takes his land and erects another bridge, which causes damage to Tift's property, he is entitled to just compensation therefor. Article 1, § 3, par. 1, Const. Georgia; Code, § 5024. Whether the same is a public or a private bridge, the question in such a case is, What damage has the party sustained? and to ascertain this, the cost of erection, the income derived from the bridge, may be looked to and considered by the jury, together with all other facts and circumstances calculated to enhance or diminish the value of the property taken or damaged."

Civil Code, § 688, provides:

"In estimating the value of land when taken for public uses, it is not restricted to its agricultural or productive qualities, but inquiry may be made as to all other legitimate purposes to which the property could be appropriated."

We are of the opinion that the plaintiff may show the value of her land for any legitimate purpose to which the land could be appropriated, including its value as a bridge site, and as a ferry, if any, and that the court therefore erred in sustaining the above portion of paragraph 5 of the defendants' special demurrer; but in so far as such demurrer above dealt with was directed at paragraph 16 and a part of paragraph 17 of the petition, the demurrer was properly sustained because in the two paragraphs last mentioned there are elements of damages set forth as a basis of plaintiff's claim which are not allowable under the law, as will be seen from what has been said above while dealing with the demurrer to paragraph 15.

Judgment affirmed on the main bill of exceptions, and reversed on the cross-bill.

All the Justices concur.

NEWCOMB HOTEL CO. v. CORBETT.
(No. 11867.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 31, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Innkeepers ⇨10—Guest entitled to be unmolested by unjustified intrusion.

A guest in a hotel is entitled to the privacy of the room to which he has been assigned, and to remain there unmolested from improper or unjustified and unreasonable intrusion from the hotel keeper or those acting under his authority. Whether a hotel keeper is under a duty to protect a guest against third persons, it is not necessary to be here decided. See Newcomb Hotel Co. v. Corbett, 24 Ga. App. 533, 101 S. E. 713; Id., 25 Ga. App. 533, 103 S. E. 723.

2. Innkeepers ⇨10—Inference held authorized that intrusion on hotel guest was within scope of employment.

Where a "night watchman" or "houseman" of a hotel, whose duty is to "Keep order in general and to look after things generally," including "anything that comes up," and who carries a pass key to the rooms, and who is told by the clerk on duty that there is "something wrong" in a certain room in the hotel, and is requested by the clerk to go to that room, and where such watchman or "houseman," in response to the clerk's request, goes to the room and opens the door with his pass key for the purpose of ascertaining what is going on in the room, the inference is authorized, if not demanded, that the clerk and the watchman were acting within the scope of their employment, and that their acts were those of their employer, and for which he is responsible.

3. Innkeepers ⇨10—Entry of guest's room, to ascertain whether improper conduct was transpiring, held to violate guest's rights.

Where a guest of a hotel is occupying his room, and is neither engaged in nor permitting improper conduct therein, nor affording any just ground to suspect such, it is an unjustified intrusion upon the guest, and a trespass upon his rights incident to his occupancy of the room for the hotel keeper to effect an uninvited and unpermitted entry into the room for the purpose of ascertaining whether improper conduct on the part of the guest or any one is transpiring therein.

4. Innkeepers ⇨10—Bound to know assignment of guests to room, irrespective of register.

Since a hotel keeper has an opportunity of seeing his guests when he receives them, he is chargeable with knowledge as to what guests are assigned to particular rooms in the hotel, and therefore he has no right to assume that a guest who is occupying a room to which he has been assigned is any other than the guest properly entitled to occupy the room. While, in order to facilitate his business in handling his guests, a hotel keeper may require his guests, when applying for accommodations at his hotel, to register their names in a register, he is nevertheless not thereby relieved, by any false inference he may draw from the register, from the duty resting upon him of knowing to what rooms the various guests are assigned. Thus, where a female guest has applied for lodging at a hotel and has signed her name upon the register, without any prefix to her signature or other indication that her signature is that of a female, and is assigned to a certain room in the hotel, the hotel keeper is charged with notice that the particular room is occupied by the female guest, and he has no right to assume, from any false inference which he may afterwards draw from the character and handwriting of her signature on the register, that the person entitled to occupy the room is a man, and that the female guest properly occupying the room is an intruder, and not entitled to it. That the hotel keeper, possessing actual knowledge of this fact, may, when acting through another and different clerk, have drawn such false inference from the character of the guest's signature, is not a defense to a suit against him by the guest for unlawfully entering her room for the purpose of ascertaining if immoral conduct is being practiced therein.

5. Innkeepers ⇨10—Trial ⇨29(2)—Guest need not indicate sex on register; remark of court held not an expression of opinion, and not prejudicial.

Even assuming that, under the record as here presented the circumstance that the hotel clerk was misled by the character and handwriting of the plaintiff's signature on the register of the hotel may go to mitigate the defendant's act and to show a lack of willful misconduct, wantonness, or conscious indifference to the plaintiff's rights, it is nevertheless true that, since a hotel keeper has an opportunity of seeing and inspecting his guests when they apply for accommodation, a guest is not under any duty to indicate his or her sex by the name on the register, and therefore a remark by the trial judge, directed to counsel in the presence of the jury at the time such evidence was offered, that "I do not think it makes any difference as to how a person writes his name," was not an expression of opinion upon any fact in issue, and this court cannot conclude that it in any way operated to prejudice the jury against the defendant's case, especially in view of the fact that the trial judge, in his fair and impartial charge to the jury, instructed them that in fixing the amount of any damages which they might assess they were to look to the evidence and the circumstances and conditions surrounding the occurrence, and it must therefore necessarily be inferred that in awarding damages the jury, following the instructions of the court, considered the nature and character of the signature on the register as a mitigating circumstance.

6. Case sustained by evidence, and charge not erroneous.

This being a suit by the female occupant of the room for damages for an unjust and unwarranted intrusion and trespass upon her by the hotel company, through its employees acting within the scope of their employment, while she was occupying her room, and applying the above rulings, the evidence sustains the plaintiff's case as laid; and the charge of the court properly submitted all the issues to the jury, and certain requests to charge made by the defendant, when not covered by what was actually given in charge, were properly refused.

7. Amendment properly allowed.

Under the above rulings, there was no error in allowing the amendment to the petition, excepted to by the defendant.

8. New trial  $\S$ 76(4)—Denial for excessiveness of verdict of \$5,500 for wrongful intrusion into hotel room not abuse of discretion.

It appearing from the evidence that the plaintiff, who was a female guest alone in her room, to which she had been assigned in the hotel of the defendant, and had retired and gone to bed for the night, was aroused by the night watchman of the hotel, accompanied by a police officer, with the encouragement of the night clerk, after the plaintiff had telephoned to the clerk for protection from the threatened intrusion, which night watchman, without the plaintiff's permission and over her protest, accompanied with a charge, communicated to her, that she had a man in the room, unlocked her door and caused the room to be entered for the purpose of ascertaining if the charge were true, and her room was searched for that purpose, even though she consented to the search after her room had been forcibly entered without her consent, this court cannot hold, that the trial judge abused his discretion in not granting a new trial to the defendant upon the ground that the verdict in the sum of $5,500 was excessive.

VAN KEUREN v. TRAVELERS' INDEMNITY CO. (No. 11882.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Aug. 31, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Insurance  $\S$ 425—Against robbery held not to cover taking in clerk's presence, unless he had actual knowledge of taking; "felonious taking."

Where a contract of insurance insures the proprietor of a jewelry store against robbery committed on his premises, which robbery is defined in the policy as "an overt felonious act committed in the presence of a custodian and of which he was actually cognizant," a felonious taking or conversion by a customer of a diamond ring on the premises of the insured, even though done in the presence of the clerk or custodian, as contemplated in the policy, is not such a felonious taking as is insured against by the policy, unless the clerk having the ring in custody had actual knowledge of its felonious taking or conversion.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Steal.]

2. Insurance  $\S$ 635—Petition in action on policy insuring against robbery construed as alleging clerk was cognizant of taking; "actually cognizant."

In a suit by the insured against the insurer to recover for a loss covered by the above-recited clause in the policy, an allegation in the petition that, after the clerk or custodian had placed a tray containing rings upon the counter, the customer extracted from the tray a diamond ring of a certain value and then hurriedly left the petitioner's store before he could be apprehended or detained by the petitioner's employees, and where the petition further alleges that such taking was "a robbery of jewelry from petitioner as covered and included in the terms of said policy," the petition will be construed as alleging that the clerk was "actually cognizant" of such felonious taking. The general demurrer to the petition was therefore improperly sustained.

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS v. BEARD. (No. 11809.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Aug. 31, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Receivers  $\S$ 177—Suable in any county where railroad might be sued.

The receivers of a railroad corporation are subject to suit as such in any county in which the corporation may be sued for a like cause of action. Ball v. Mabry, 91 Ga. 781, 18 S. E. 64.

2. Carriers  $\S$ 180(2)—Initial carrier liable for loss on connecting lines notwithstanding limitation of liability.

Since the passage of the act of 1906 (Ga. L. 1906, p. 102), from which section 2777 of the Civil Code of 1910 was codified, the initial carrier in an intrastate shipment "is liable for loss occasioned anywhere en route, whether on its own lines or not, where it voluntarily receives the shipment, notwithstanding an agreement or stipulation in a bill of lading limiting liability to loss, damage, or injury occurring on its own lines." *Heath v. STODDARD v. CAMPBELL. (No. 12111.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 23, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Death  $\S$ 31(7)—Grandmother, given child by father, held entitled to recover value of services in action for death.

Although "until majority" a child "remains under the control of the father, who is entitled to his services and the proceeds of his labor," this parental power may be "lost," among other ways, "by voluntary contract releasing the right to a third person." Civ. Code 1910,  $\S$  3021 (1); Eaves v. Fears, 131 Ga. 820 (2), 64 S. E. 289. Where the father of a minor unconditionally gives him to the child's grandmother, who accepts him, for several years raises him as her own child, and performs for him all parental duties, she thereafter stands in loco parentis, and, in an action for the tortious homicide of the child, where at the time of his death he was performing services of value to the grandmother (such as contributing his earnings to her support), she is entitled to recover the value of his services until majority. Atkinson v. Yarbrough, 13 Ga. App. 781, 80 S. E. 29.

2. Death  $\S$ 31(7)—Statute held not to authorize recovery by grandmother for child's death.

Section 4424 of the Civil Code of 1910, which gives to "a mother, or, if no mother, a father," the right to recover "the full value of the life" in case of the "homicide of a child minor or sui juris, upon whom she or he is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support," being in derogation of the common law and subject to strict construction (Robinson v. Ga. R. Co., 117 Ga. 168, 169, 43 S. E. 452, 60 L. R. A. 555, 97 Am. St. Rep. 156), must be held to exclude persons standing only in a quasi-parental relation to the child, and not to authorize a recovery for the full value of a child's life by a grandmother standing in loco parentis, although dependent upon the child's earnings for her support. City of Albany v. Lindsey, 11 Ga. App. 573 (3), 75 S. E. 911.

3. Pleading  $\S$ 34(3), 204(3)—Construed in absence of special demurrer as based on cause of action sufficiently alleged; petition in action for death, stating cause of action for recovery of value of services, not demurrable.

While, as a general rule, allegations of fact are to be construed most strongly against the pleader, yet, in the absence of special demurrer, where the facts alleged in a petition are such as would be proper and adequate to support one form of action, but inadequate, although appropriate, to another form of action, and where the petition is ambiguous to the extent that the pleader's intention is not clearly manifest as to which form of action is relied upon, the courts in such a case, in endeavoring to ascertain the plaintiff's intention, will prima facie presume that his purpose was to serve his best interest, and will construe the pleadings so as to uphold, and not defeat, the action. Southern Express Co. v. Pope, 5 Ga. App. 689, 690 (2), 697, 63 S. E. 809; Bell v. State Life Ins. Co., 24 Ga. App. 497 (5), 101 S. E. 541; Payton v. Gulf Line Ry. Co., 4 Ga. App. 762 (2), 763, 62 S. E. 469; Wright v. Southern Ry. Co., 7 Ga. App. 542, 545, 67 S. E. 272; Dawson Cotton Oil Co. v. Kenan, 21 Ga. App. 688, 692, 94 S. E. 1037. Under such a rule of construction, while the petition here failed to set forth a cause of action under section 4424, it was good as against general demurrer, in that it might be construed as a suit for the recovery of the value of the child's services. City of Albany v. Lindsey, 11 Ga. App. 573 (3), 578, 75 S. E. 911; Frazier v. Ga. R. Co., 101 Ga. 70 (1), 72, 28 S. E. 684; Augusta Ry. Co. v. Glover, 92 Ga. 132, 143, 18 S. E. 406.

PAYNE, Agent, etc., v. YOUNG. (No. 12024.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 31, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant  $\Rightarrow$ 276(2) — Evidence held to warrant inference that railroad flagman was struck by train.

Evidence that a flagman of a railroad train, a few minutes after having attended to his duties, in going back along a track to flag a train, was seen sitting on the outside of the rails of an adjacent track on the projecting cross-ties, and that shortly after a train had passed over the latter track the flagman was found lying by the track unconscious, with such a wound in his head as could have been made by a passing train, warrants the inference that he was injured from being struck by a passing train.

2. Master and servant  $\Rightarrow$ 278(18)—Evidence held to warrant inference that trainmen saw or negligently failed to see flagman struck by train.

Where the right of the injured person to recover against the railroad company is dependent upon the federal Employers' Liability Act, and his suit against the railroad company for such recovery is predicated upon the alleged negligence of the defendant in not keeping a lookout on the train which injured the plaintiff, so as to discover his helpless condition on the track after he had fainted and fallen over unconscious on the track, and in not stopping its train after the plaintiff's presence in such helpless and dangerous condition had become known to the defendant, evidence that the track was straight and unobstructed, in the direction from which the train approached, for three-quarters of a mile beyond where the injured person was found, that it was about 2 o'clock p. m. on a clear day, and that if the plaintiff's presence had been seen by the engineer keeping a lookout the train which injured him could have been stopped in time to prevent the injury, and that the train, according to the testimony of the engineer, was running a race with another train, and that this engineer kept a lookout, and that people had been in the habit of frequenting the place where the injured person was found, warrants the inference that the servants of the railroad in charge of an approaching train saw the plaintiff, or negligently failed to see him, and thereby negligently injured him.

3. Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$ 302(3)—Master and servant  $\Rightarrow$ 270(18)—Exception in motion for new trial to refusal to strike evidence respecting matter is incomplete when evidence does not appear; evidence of habit of frequenting place of accident on right of way held admissible.

An exception in a motion for a new trial to the refusal of the court to strike from the record all of the evidence of a certain witness "with reference to outsiders walking on or along the tracks at or near the place where the plaintiff alleged he was injured," where it does not appear what the evidence was, is incomplete, and presents no question for this court to pass upon. However, evidence that persons were in the habit of frequenting the right of way of the railroad company at the place where the plaintiff was injured was relevant to the issue, and was properly admitted.

4. Appeal and error  $\Rightarrow$ 302(4)—Ground of motion for new trial complaining of correct charge because of failure to give additional instructions presents no error.

An exception to an admittedly correct extract from the charge of the court, upon the ground that the court erred in giving it in charge, because the court failed, in the extract quoted, or elsewhere in the charge, to give additional instructions, presents no ground of error, and is therefore without merit.

5. Damages  $\Rightarrow$ 130(1)—Verdict for \$5,000 for injury on head and pain and suffering not excessive.

From the nature of the injury which the plaintiff received in his head, and the pain and suffering which it appears from the evidence he underwent, this court cannot hold that the trial judge abused his discretion in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict in the sum of $5,000 was excessive.

OWENS v. FULLER. (No. 12012.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 31, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales  $\Rightarrow$ 377, 384(1)—Measure of damages for purchaser's breach stated; count praying for wrong measure of damages properly stricken on demurrer.

The proper measure of damages for the purchaser's breach of a contract for the sale of personal property is the amount due on the purchase money contracted for. In a suit by the seller against the purchaser, where the second count of the petition alleged the contract of sale and the purchase price agreed upon between the parties, but prayed for damages at the market value of the commodity sold, which alleged market value was in excess of the purchase price agreed upon, the second count was properly, on this ground, stricken on demurrer.

2. Appeal and error  $\S$  1064(1)—Charge referring to warranty as condition held not prejudicial; instruction defining "conditional contract" without distinguishing between conditions precedent and subsequent held not prejudicial.

Where in such a suit the issue was whether or not the alleged contract of sale had been entered upon, the plaintiff contending that the sale had been consummated and the property had been delivered to the defendant with a warranty by the plaintiff that a sawmill, which was the subject-matter of the sale, would saw merchantable timber, and the defendant contending that the property had been delivered to him by the plaintiff under an agreement between them that the defendant would enter into a contract to purchase the property, provided that the defendant found, upon testing the machinery, that it would saw a certain number of feet of lumber per day, it was not prejudicial error for the court, in the charge to the jury, to refer to the plaintiff's alleged warranty or guaranty as a condition, nor (since there was no contention by either party that there was a contract containing a condition subsequent) to define a conditional contract as a contract which the parties enter into upon certain conditions, and which, if the conditions are not complied with, does not become binding, without distinguishing between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent.

3. Trial  $\S$  193(2)—Instruction that conditions of sale were for jury not expression of opinion, though issue was whether sale was on condition.

An expression of an opinion by the court that the alleged sale was a conditional one was not made by charging the jury "that the terms and conditions under which the sawmill was delivered to the defendant * * * is a question of fact for your consideration."

4. Appeal and error  $\S$  1068(4)—Error in limiting damages harmless, where jury found against plaintiff.

Since the jury found against the plaintiff's right to recover in any amount in his suit for the breach of the alleged contract of sale, any alleged error in the charge, limiting the plaintiff's right to recover to an amount less than that sued for, is necessarily harmless.

5. New trial  $\S$  70—Properly denied when evidence supported verdict.

The charge of the court fairly and without prejudice to the plaintiff submitted all the issues to the jury, and the evidence supports a verdict for the defendant in so far as it applies to the plaintiff's suit for an alleged breach of the alleged contract of sale. The trial court therefore did not err in overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

SAVANNAH ELECTRIC CO. v. LOWE.
(No. 11760.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Aug. 23, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers  $\S$  266—False Imprisonment  $\S$  7(1)—Street car conductor may make such reassignments of seats as exigencies of traffic require; passenger remaining in seat other than that assigned him may be arrested without warrant.

Under sections 2718 and 2719 of the Civil Code of 1910, it is not only the right, but the express duty, of street railroad conductors to assign all passengers to seats in the cars in which they are riding, "so as to separate the white and colored races as much as practicable." To effectuate these provisions of law designed for the benefit and protection of both races, so as to preclude the possibility of racial contact and friction, conductors are invested with ample police powers. Under section 2719 it is a misdemeanor for any passenger, white or colored, to remain in any seat "other than that to which he may have been assigned." A reasonable construction of this power of a conductor includes not only the right to thus assign a seat at the time a passenger enters the car, but the right to make such necessary reassignments as the exigencies of the traffic may require. For a violation by a passenger of the penal provisions of this statute, not only may he be ejected from the car, but he is subject to summary arrest by the conductor, without warrant. Civ. Code, 1910, § 2719. Furthermore, under the general police powers vested in railroad and street railroad conductors by section 926 and 927 of the Penal Code 1910, any passenger may be ejected or summarily arrested by the conductor for the violation within his presence of the penal provisions of this statute, or of any other penal statute or valid municipal ordinance, or for words or acts amounting to a breach of the peace.

2. False Imprisonment  $\S$  20—Plea of justification admits detention and imposes burden of showing ground for arrest without warrant.

In a suit for false imprisonment, a plea of justification, while not admitting all the facts as alleged by the petition, does admit the act of detention (Smith v. Savannah Electric Co.,

25 Ga. App. 59, 102 S. E. 549; Rigden v. Jordan, 81 Ga. 668, 7 S. E. 857; Civ. Code 1910, § 4488; and where the arrest is made without a warrant, in order for the defendant to overcome the prima facie case thus made to arise, it is incumbent upon him to plead and to prove that a criminal offense was committed by the plaintiff in the presence of the defendant or his agent. Civ. Code, § 4488; Rattree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 574, 579, 4 S. E. 684; Kerwich v. Steelman, 44 Ga. 198; McPherson v. Chandler, 137 Ga. 129, 130(3), 72 S. E. 948; Ocean Steamship Co. v. Williams, 69 Ga. 251, 258.

3. Pleading §409(1)—Informal plea of justification is sufficient after trial.

"However loose and informal the plea of justification may be, when it is not demurred to, but is considered by the parties and the court as a sufficient plea of that character, and a trial is had under it, defects in it are not to be scrutinized after the trial is over; indeed it has been held that, where the parties treat it as sufficient, the trial court should do so likewise." Henderson v. Fox, 83 Ga. 233(3), 242, 9 S. E. 839, 840, citing Bryan v. Gurr, 27 Ga. 378.

4. False Imprisonment §7(1)—Passenger not subject to arrest for violating rule of Railroad Commission as to seating of white and colored passengers.

The infringement by a street railway passenger of the provisions of some special rule or regulation of the state Railroad Commission, providing specifically and in detail the manner and method whereby the separation of the races is to be effected, but which rule neither does nor can (see Southern Ry. Co. v. Melton, 133 Ga. 277, 291, 65 S. E. 665; U. S. v. Keitel [D. C.] 157 Fed. 396; U. S. v. Sandefuhr [D. C.] 145 Fed. 49, 51) impose a penalty upon the passenger for its violation, while authorizing expulsion, does not authorize his arrest, in the absence of disorderly conduct. Thus, the rule of the state Railroad Commission, introduced in evidence by the defendant, and given in charge by the court, providing "that the Savannah Electric Company, in seating passengers on all of its cars, shall seat white passengers from the front of the car towards the rear, and colored passengers from the rear of the car towards the front, and that conductors shall be required to enforce this rule strictly by requiring colored passengers, beginning with the first seat in the rear, to occupy such seat to its capacity before taking the next seat in front, and so on," while having the full effect of a valid and binding civil statute (Union Dry Goods Co. v. Ga. Public Service Corp., 142 Ga. 841, 846, 83 S. E. 946, L. R. A. 1916E, 358; Civ. Code 1910, § 2663), and while under the statute law it might be held to have penal force as against the common carrier, its officers, agents, or employees (Civ. Code 1910, §§ 2666, 2667, 2668) does not nor does it purport to provide a penalty for its violation by a passenger; and consequently the infringement of such a rule by a passenger, unless, as here, it amounts also to a violation of the statute, would not, in the absence of disorderly conduct, authorize his arrest.

5. False Imprisonment §40—Municipal corporations §121—Street Railroads §70—Trial §39—Reading pleaded ordinances to court without objection held equivalent to formal tender; validity of ordinance is question for court; separate coach ordinance held in conflict with order of Railroad Commission; instruction as to effect of ordinance on street car passenger's right to retain seat held confusing, notwithstanding another instruction.

The plaintiff, in her petition against the street railway company, set forth certain municipal ordinances of the city of Savannah which she alleged had been violated by the defendant, and which in effect provide for the furnishing of separate accommodations for white and colored street railway passengers, by providing either separate cars or dividing the same car into separate divisions, each marked and designated by a described sign or placard so as to indicate for which race such part of the car is maintained. These ordinances further provide that any conductor or other official operating a street car not so provided with indicating signs shall be guilty of a criminal offense, and that any person "willfully occupying as a passenger" any part of a car other than that so set apart and designated for persons of his or her color shall, on conviction, be punished as for disorderly conduct. On the trial the ordinances were not formally introduced in evidence, and the defendant company excepts to the charge of the court relative thereto, (1) because the ordinances, for the reason that they were not formally tendered in evidence, were not properly before the court at all; (2) because the court erred in instructing the jury that "if there is a conflict between the state law and the city ordinances, then the state law takes preference," the contention being that any question of such a conflict was purely a question of law for determination by the court; and (3) because the court charged in reference to the ordinances as follows: "I want you to bear in mind, however, that if you find in this case that this plaintiff was not occupying a seat reserved under the city ordinance for white passengers, and where under the law she had a right to be, then she had a right to decline to move therefrom, and there would be no right on the part of the conductor to arrest her or expel her from the car." Held:

(a) While, in the absence of proof, the court cannot ordinarily take judicial cognizance of municipal ordinances (Collier v. Schoenberg, 26 Ga. App. —, 106 S. E. 581), yet where, as here, the ordinances have been pleaded in the petition, and the trial court has certified that "while the ordinances pleaded were not formally tendered in evidence, they were read to the court in the presence of the jury," such treatment of them by counsel without objection will be taken as equivalent to a formal tender. Ga. Excelsior Co. v. Hartfelder-Garbutt Co., 12 Ga. App. 797, 78 S. E. 611.

(b) Any question as to the validity of a municipal ordinance and whether or not it conflicts with a state statute is properly a question of law to be determined by the court. As we construe these ordinances, they do in a sense conflict with the plan and method of procedure outlined by the rule of the Railroad Commission; and since the Commission has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, its order has superior and binding force and effect as a civil rule, to the exclusion of the municipal ordinance which attempts to legislate otherwise. Consequently, while it is true that the court charged the jury that even a violation by the defendant company of any obligation sought to be imposed upon it by the ordinances would not justify the plaintiff in transgressing the statute law, still it seems reasonably possible, if not probable, that the excerpts from the charge quoted relating to the ordinances might have been confusing to the jury, on the theory that, since the plaintiff was undoubtedly occupying the rear portion of the car (either the second or third seat from the rear), she was therefore within her legal rights under the ordinances in so remaining, despite the direction of the conductor acting under the duty and authority of the statute law that she exchange her seat so as to occupy one further back.

6. False Imprisonment  $\S$  25—Evidence of good character admissible on question of damages when good character alleged.

The character of the person seeking damages for false imprisonment is not ordinarily in issue, so far as the mere right to recover is concerned; but where the petition alleges good character, which allegation is denied by the answer, evidence in support of good character becomes relevant in the consideration of the amount of damages. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 733(2), 3 S. E. 420; 19 Cyc. 365.

7. False Imprisonment  $\S$  7(1) — Passenger properly arrested for refusing to obey conductor's direction to change seats.

Under the statute law (Civ. Code 1910, §§ 2718, 2719), set forth in the first division of the syllabus, and under the undisputed evidence in the case, the conductor was acting within the reasonable scope of his rights, duty, and authority, in directing the plaintiff to exchange her seat for another located behind her, the purpose being in this way to "separate the white and colored races as much as practicable;" and since, under such circumstances, the statute makes it a misdemeanor for any passenger, white or colored, to remain in any seat "other than that to which he may have been assigned," the undisputed refusal of the plaintiff to obey such direction authorized her arrest, and consequently she could not be entitled to damages therefor.

JENKINS, J. P. [1-7] The plaintiff was a passenger of the defendant street railway company. She brought suit for damages on account of her alleged unlawful arrest by the conductor of the defendant company. The company entered a plea of justification based on the ground that the plaintiff had violated the regulations pertaining to the separation of the races. No objection was made as to the sufficiency of the plea of justification, but the case was tried upon the theory set up by a defense of that character. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $537, and the defendant company brought its exceptions to this court.

Section 2717 of the Civil Code (1910) provides that—

"All railroads doing business in this state shall furnish equal accommodations, in separate cars, or compartments of cars, for white and colored passengers; but this section shall not apply to sleeping cars."

This section manifestly does not apply, however, to street cars. These are dealt with in the next section (section 2718), which provides:

"All conductors or other employees in charge of such cars shall be required to assign all passengers to their respective cars, or compartments of cars, provided by the said companies under the provisions of the preceding section; and all conductors of dummy, electric, and street cars shall be required, and are hereby empowered, to assign all passengers to seats on the cars under their charge, so as to separate the white and colored races as much as practicable; and all conductors and other employees of railroads and all conductors of dummy, electric, and street cars shall have, and are hereby invested with, police powers to carry out said provisions."

For a failure to obey the requirements of this section passengers are penalized by section 2719, as follows:

"Any passenger remaining in any car, or compartment, or seat, other than that to which he may have been assigned, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The court on the trial gave in charge to the jury these two latter sections of the Code, and also the rule of the railroad commission of Georgia quoted in the fourth headnote, to the effect that conductors of the Savannah Electric Company should require "colored passengers, beginning with the first seat in the rear, to occupy such seat to its capacity before taking the next seat in front, and so on." The plaintiff in her petition pleaded certain municipal ordinances of Savannah, the provisions of which she contended had been violated by the defendant company. These ordinances were read in the presence of the jury, without objection, and were treated in the charge of the court as indicated in the syllabus. They read as follows:

"All companies, persons, firms, and associations operating street cars in the city of Savannah are hereby required to furnish separate accommodations for white and colored passengers, and all white and colored passengers occupying seats in street cars in the city of Savannah are hereby required to occupy the respective cars or divisions of cars provided for them, so that the white passengers shall occupy only the cars or division of cars provided for white passengers, and the colored passengers shall occupy only the cars or divisions of cars provided for the accommodation of colored passengers. All companies, firms, persons, and associations operating street cars in the city of Savannah shall furnish such separate accommodations, at their option, by the operation together of two or more cars, providing separate cars for white passengers and separate cars for colored passengers, or by furnishing separate accommodations for white and colored passengers in the same car. When separate accommodation is furnished for white and colored passengers in the same car the front part of the car shall be designated for white passengers, and the rear part of the car for colored passengers. When two or more cars are operated together, thus providing separate car or cars for white passengers, and separate car or cars for colored passengers, the front car or cars shall be designated for white passengers and the rear car or cars for colored passengers. The cars, or parts of cars, furnished for white and colored passengers respectively shall have placed conspicuously at each end of the car, or part of car, signs in plain letters, not less than two inches high, indicating by the words 'white' or 'colored,' as the case may be, that such car, or part of car, is provided for the use of white passengers or colored passengers, as the case may be; and when open cars to be entered from the side of the cars are provided for the accommodation of both white and colored passengers, additional such signs shall be provided and placed conspicuously on the side of the cars so as to indicate thereby the portion of the car to be used by white and colored passengers respectively."

"Any officer, agent, or employee of any company, person, or firm, who shall as superintendent or other officer of such company, or as conductor, motorman, or other employee of such company, operate any car not so provided with signs on the streets of the city of Savannah for the transportation of passengers, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than one hundred ($100) dollars, or by imprisonment not more than thirty (30) days for each such offense; and any white person willfully occupying as a passenger any car or part of car not so set apart and provided for white passengers, and any colored person willfully occupying as a passenger any car or part of car not so set apart and provided for colored passengers, shall be deemed guilty of disorderly conduct, and shall be punished by fine not exceeding one hundred ($100) dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty (30) days."

It would seem from the record that the car was not divided into separate divisions or compartments, but that placards indicating the method of seating the races were placed in the front and rear of the car. There is a conflict in the testimony as to which particular seat the plaintiff occupied as a passenger upon the occasion in question. According to the conductor's evidence it was the third seat from the rear. According to her own evidence (which, however, is not exactly clear on this point) it might seem that she occupied the second seat from the rear. Without going into the testimony of the conductor, but setting forth the transaction solely according to the version given by the plaintiff herself, the record shows that she testified as follows:

"The conductor came and touched me on the shoulder and asked me to move, that two white ladies were seated directly behind me. * * * Why didn't I move. Well, the ladies were pointed to two seats above. The two ladies were seated in the rear of me, and after they were seated I didn't see any reason to move. * * * I simply looked directly behind me to see the people who called my attention to it. I saw two white ladies directly behind me. * * * Why did I undertake to tell them where to be seated, where they wanted to be seated? They were seated in the colored portion of the car. * * * As to why I did not move back when my attention was called to it? Well, I would have moved back, but the ladies did not say anything, and they simply were able to move up."

Referring to a different and later incident, when all the seats in front of her were occupied, and she was again directed to change her seat, she testified:

"I said, 'Why should I move? You haven't given me any reason.' I didn't look back to see whether there were any other white folks on the car. He said, 'There is a white man and a white boy? I said, 'Is that so? I did not know that.' After speaking to me like that, I saw the man and boy sitting down. I did not think of color any more. I sat there, and didn't pay any more attention. * * * It is not true that the conductor told me three times to move to the rear seat and I refused; he told me twice."

"Q. But at this particular time he told you to move, and you saw the white man and white boy were forced to sit in the negro compartment, and the conductor asked you to move. Now I ask you to tell the jury why you didn't reply to the conductor. A. Well, this is the point that I looked at then. It was a man and boy. Had it been ladies I would have readily gotten up."

"Q. So that, if it had been ladies, you would have moved, but being a man and boy, you refused to move? A. Yes, sir."

Thus, from the testimony of the plaintiff herself, whatever question might suggest itself as to the reasonableness of the direction given her in the first instance by the conductor, it would seem clear and undisputed that on the second occasion the plaintiff refused to exchange her seat for another in her rear, although the car in front of her at that time was filled with white passengers, and white passengers were standing or sitting in her rear, and that the reason given by her for her refusal on this occasion was that the persons in her rear were not ladies. There was other testimony given for the defendant which would afford plain and palpable justification for the arrest, but which, for the purposes of this decision, it is not thought necessary to incorporate.

As we understand the case, the question is solely whether the defendant was authorized in arresting the plaintiff on account of her violation of the statute law, as properly administered by the officers and servants of the defendant company. It is not whether she may have violated also the provisions of the valid civil rule of the Railroad Commission, or whether either she or the defendant violated or observed the provision of the municipal ordinances.

Judgment reversed.

ELIZABETH CITY MILLING CO. v. PHILLIPS & CO. (No. 15.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Sales  $\S$ 175—Buyer held to have broken contract by cancellation for refusal to deliver contrary to its terms.

Where plaintiff had agreed to buy potatoes, to be shipped 25 per cent. in November, 25 per cent. in December, 25 per cent. in January and February, and 25 per cent. in March, and later demanded 50 per cent. to be shipped in December and the remaining 50 per cent. also in December, or half in December and half in January, and, on the refusal to ship as ordered, canceled the contract, it is guilty of a breach of contract, and cannot recover for failure to deliver.

2. Sales  $\S$ 384(1)—Measure of damages for buyer's cancellation stated.

Where contract for the sale of potatoes, by which buyer paid down 50 cents per barrel and was to get a deduction for frozen potatoes, was later canceled by the buyer, the seller was properly permitted to recover the difference between the contract price and the price realized by the sale of the potatoes whose delivery was improperly refused less the amount of the deposit of 50 cents per barrel for those not delivered, and less the value of frozen potatoes delivered under the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Allen, Judge.

Action by the Elizabeth City Milling Company against Phillips & Co. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This was an action upon a contract, made by correspondence, for the delivery by defendant to the plaintiff at Elizabeth City of 1,000 sacks of seed Irish potatoes to be shipped subject to weather hazards, and upon receipt of written order from the plaintiff for shipment. The plaintiff deposited with the defendant the sum of 50 cents per sack in advance. The defendant agreed to refund to plaintiff the purchase price per sack for all potatoes frozen before delivery. The defendant actually delivered only 440 sacks, of which 12 sacks were frozen, and the liability therefor acknowledged.

The plaintiff brings this action for $280, being the refund of 50 cents per sack deposited for the 560 sacks not delivered; for $52.80, being the purchase price for the 12 sacks of frozen potatoes, and $896, alleged profit which plaintiff would have made, if potatoes had been delivered according to contract. The first two items were not disputed, but the defendant contended that it was relieved of shipping the potatoes on account of weather conditions, and also by reason of the congestion of traffic caused by the war, and also pleaded as a counterclaim that by reason of the failure of plaintiff to take the potatoes, when offered within the time specified, it was forced to sell the same at a price below the contract. The jury found all issues in favor of the defendant, and assessed the sum due the defendant at $288.75, and from the judgment plaintiff appealed.

Meekins & McMullan and Thompson & Wilson, both of Elizabeth City, for appellant. Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. By the contract, which was made September 7, 1917, it was provided that the potatoes should be shipped "between January 1 and February 1, 1918." Owing to congestion in freight shipments caused by the war the contract was changed, as appears by the correspondence, to provide that the potatoes should be shipped, "25 per cent. last of November, 25 per cent. in December; 25 per cent. in January and February, and 25 per cent. in March." The plaintiff failed to order any shipment in November, but demanded 50 per cent. to be shipped in December and the remaining 50 per cent. also in December, or half in December and half in January. These demands were not assented to by the defendant and were contrary to the amended contract as above set out. On March 13 the plaintiff canceled the order and refused to take the remainder of the potatoes though the defendant had under the terms of the contract all the month of March to complete delivery. The plaintiff received about 25 per cent. of the potatoes during December, and in January another shipment covering the deliveries agreed on for February. No written orders were given for November, and the contract was canceled by plaintiff March 13, before the time for the final deliveries had expired.

[1, 2] The plaintiff had no right to recover upon his own showing, according to which he had breached the contract in four particulars. He was entitled to recover nothing, and the defendant was properly permitted to recover for its damage by reason of the cancellation of its order, after deducting the amount in hand; i. e., 50 cents per barrel for the potatoes not delivered, and for the frozen potatoes. That is, the defendant recovered the difference between the contract price and the price realized by the sale of the potatoes whose delivery was improperly refused, less the amount of the deposit of 50 cents per barrel for the potatoes not delivered, and proper credit was also given to the plaintiff for the frozen potatoes.

No error.

HIPP v. E. I. DUPONT DE NEMOURS & CO.
et al. (No. 441.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Pleading  $\S$ 214(2)—Demurrers admit all facts sufficiently pleaded.

A demurrer admits all facts sufficiently pleaded.

2. Judgment  $\S$ 693 — Judgment against husband suing for injuries not res judicata as to negligence as against wife suing for damages resulting to her.

The wife not being party to action by husband for personal injuries to him, the judgment against him is not conclusive as to negligence against her suing for the damages resulting to her from the alleged negligent injury of him.

3. Husband and wife  $\S$ 209(4)—Wife may sue for her damages from negligent injury of husband.

In view of the status and rights of married women under Const. 1868, art. 10, § 6, and C. S. § 2513, a wife may sue for damages to her from negligent injury of her husband, but can recover nothing which he could recover or which in case of his death from the injury his personal representatives could recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Harding, Judge.

Action by Mrs. W. B. Hipp against the E. I. Dupont de Nemours & Co. and another. From judgment overruling demurrer to the complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, who is the wife of W. B. Hipp, brings this action alleging that her husband, while working as an employee of the defendant company in Hopewell, Va., was, "seriously, painfully, and permanently injured as a proximate result of the carelessness and negligence of the defendants," setting out the manner in which he was injured and the extent of such injuries and the expense, and that, under the law of Virginia, which is set out, the plaintiff was entitled, as a married woman, to sue and be sued as if she were unmarried, and to own and control her property as fully as if she had remained single, and that neither she nor her husband have received anything whatever from the defendants in the way of damages for the serious injuries inflicted on him; and that her husband brought action in Virginia, but, notwithstanding three separate jury verdicts afforded him, the Court of Appeals of that state rendered judgment against him upon demurrer to the evidence; that the plaintiff is entitled notwithstanding to recover in this jurisdiction, she having obtained service upon the defendants, for the personal injuries inflicted on her by the injury to her husband. The defendants demur upon the ground that it appears upon the face of the complaint that judgment has been rendered in Virginia, that her husband was not entitled to recover, and that it appears inferentially therefore that under the law of the state of Virginia she has no action for the loss of her husband's company, for damages to her consequent upon injury sustained by him, caused by the negligence of a third person, where the husband's right of action, if any, is barred. The judge overruled the demurrer, and the defendants appealed.

W. S. Beam and C. A. Cochran, both of Charlotte, and V. S. Thomas, of Wilmington, Del., for appellant Dupont de Nemours & Co.

Clarkson, Tallaferro & Clarkson, of Charlotte, for appellant Stillwell.

John M. Robinson and Hamilton O. Jones, both of Charlotte, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The demurrer admits all facts sufficiently pleaded, and therefore we must take it that the plaintiff's husband was "seriously, painfully, and permanently injured as the proximate result of the carelessness and negligence of the defendants," and that by reason thereof the plaintiff has suffered shock, which has impaired her nervous system, impaired and permanently injured and weakened her physical and mental condition, and that she has suffered greatly from loss of sleep, worry, and anxiety on account of the condition of her husband; in watching over and caring for him, causing her to devote her entire time to nursing and caring for him, while at the same time the burden of maintaining the family fell upon her, entailing heavy cost and expense, and that she has been forced to pay out large sums of money to hospitals, doctors, nurses, and medical expenses, and that by reason of said injuries she has been deprived of the support and maintenance which her husband would have given her, and has suffered mental anguish by being forced to witness the suffering endured by her husband, whereby her own nerves and health have been seriously and permanently shocked, weakened, and impaired; and that by reason of the physical and mental condition of her husband she still continues to suffer in mind and body, and has been denied the care, protection, consideration, companionship, aid, and society of her said husband, and the pleasure and assistance of her husband in escorting her to visit friends and relatives, and has been required to remain at home for long periods of time, denying herself to friends and relatives, and besides has had entailed upon her the fatigue of nursing and caring for him, and incurred expenses, and has paid large sums on that account. These matters are set out more at length in the complaint, but this is a summary of the grounds of her action—all of which allegations of facts are admitted as pleaded by the demurrer. The demurrer in effect presents two questions of law upon these facts:

(1) The first is that the judgment against her husband in Virginia (Dupont v. Hipp, 123 Va. 49, 96 S. E. 280) bars any right of action which she might have for damages for grief, mental anguish, labor, and expense devolving upon her by the disability of her husband and the loss and comfort of his society.

(2) The second is that upon the facts admitted the wife is not entitled to maintain this action.

[2] As to the first ground of demurrer, if the wife has a cause of action we do not think the demurrer can be sustained. She was not a party to the action brought by her husband, and she is not estopped by the judgment as to any relief she might be entitled to. It may be that upon the trial of this action an entirely different state of facts as to the manner in which the husband was injured might be developed, either by additional evidence or by the estimate placed upon the evidence by the jury. She was neither a party nor a privy to that action.

In Laskowski v. People's Ice Co., 203 Mich. 186, 168 N. W. 940, 2 A. L. R. 586, it was held that—

“A judgment in favor of a wife in an action to recover damages for injuries to her person is not conclusive upon the question of defendant's negligence, and absence of her contributory negligence, in an action by her husband for the damages resulting to him from such injuries.”

Of course the reverse must be true, since, as held in that case, under the Married Woman's Act, he was not a necessary or proper party to the action by his wife to recover damages for injuries to her person, and was not, in fact, a party. See notes to that case (2 A. L. R. 592) citing many cases that neither the judgment in such cases nor a settlement by compromise on the part of the wife would affect the husband's right to recover for the damages sustained by him, quoting among others R. R. v. Kinman, 182 Ky. 597, 206 S. W. 880.

[3] But the second ground of demurrer presents an entirely different question. At common law the husband could maintain an action for the injuries sustained by his wife for the same reason that he could maintain an action for injuries to his horse, his slave, or any other property; that is to say, by reason of the fact that the wife was his chattel. This was usually presented in the euphemism that “by reason of the unity of marriage” such actions could be maintained by the husband. But singularly enough this was not correlative, and the wife could not maintain an action for injuries sustained by her husband. The reason is thus frankly stated by Blackstone:

“We may observe that in these relative injuries notice is only taken of the wrong done to the superior of the parties (husband) injured by the breach and dissolution of either the relation itself, or at least the advantages accruing therefrom; while the loss of the inferior (the wife) by such injuries is totally unregarded. One reason for this may be this: That the inferior hath no kind of property in the company, care or assistance of the superior as the superior is held to have in those of the inferior; and therefore the inferior can suffer no loss or injury.” 3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 143.

By the married women's provision in the Constitution of 1868, art. 10, § 6, this conception of ownership by the husband whereby upon marriage all the personal property of the wife became the property of the husband, and he became the owner of her realty during his lifetime, was abolished. The courts in this state continued for a long while, notwithstanding, to hold that the husband could recover his wife's earnings and the damages for injuries done her; but by Acts 1913, c. 13, now O. S. § 2513, it was provided that her earnings and damages for torts inflicted upon her were her sole and separate property for which she could sue alone.

It follows therefore that the husband cannot sue to recover his wife's earnings, or damages for torts committed on her, and there is no reason why she can sue for torts or injuries inflicted on her husband. The law has never authorized the wife to maintain such action for torts sustained by the husband. We agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff that if the husband could maintain an action to recover damages for torts on the wife she should be able to maintain an action on account of torts sustained by the husband. Such right of action, if it existed in favor of the husband, should exist in favor of the wife. It should be in favor of both or neither, but, in view of the Constitution of 1868 and our statute on the subject, we think that such action cannot be maintained by either on account of the injury to the other.

So far as injuries to the husband are concerned and the damages he has sustained, whether the plaintiff recovers or fails to do so the verdict and judgment are conclusive. The wife certainly cannot recover a second time for the injuries of the husband, who alone can sue for them (or, in case of wrongful death, his personal representative); but the action of the wife is not for the injuries to the husband, though formerly the husband was allowed to recover damages for the injuries sustained by the wife because they were his property. Price v. Electric Co., 160 N. C. 450, 76 S. E. 502. That is now swept away.

The cause of action for the wife in this case is not for the injuries to the husband, but for the injuries to herself, which are thus summed up in the brief for the plaintiff in this action:

- (1) Expenses paid by her, made necessary by her husband's injuries.
- (2) Services performed in nursing and caring for him.
- (3) Loss of support and maintenance.
- (4) Loss of consortium.
- (5) Mental anguish.

Though the husband can no longer recover for the damages which his wife has sustained as property belonging to himself, he may still recover for the damages sustained by him by reason thereof which have been held to include expenses incurred, deprivation of society, and loss of aid and comfort.

In Kimberly v. Howland, 143 N. C. 398, 405, 55 S. E. 778, 781 (7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 545), the plaintiff's wife received a serious injury by reason of the defendant's negligence. The court said:

"It is contended that the husband has sustained no injury, and as to him the motion to nonsuit should have been allowed. It seems to be well settled that where the injury to the wife is such that the husband receives a separate loss or damage, as where he is put to expense, or is deprived of the society or the services of his wife, he is entitled to recover therefor, and he may sue in his own name."

In Bailey v. Long, 172 N. C. 661, 90 S. E. 809, L. R. A. 1917B, 708, decided since chapter 13, Laws 1913, the plaintiff had taken his wife to the defendant's hospital. By reason of the defective condition and construction of said hospital, his wife contracted pneumonia and died. The plaintiff brought the action for damages suffered by him. Mr. Justice Brown, for a unanimous court, held that the plaintiff could recover for expenses which accrued to him for nursing and otherwise, and said:

"In addition, we think plaintiff can recover damages for the mental suffering and injury to his feelings in witnessing the agony and suffering of his said wife while lingering with such cold and pneumonia, and in the act and article of death resulting therefrom."

We do not think that the husband could now recover compensatory damages for her physical and mental anguish, nor for the value of her services, which are matters purely personal to her, and for which she alone could recover, though formerly these were the basis for an action by the husband. As he can no longer sue for her earnings, of course he is not entitled to recover the value of her services. But the great weight of authority sustains the proposition that, under the modern statutes enlarging the rights of married women, the husband is not deprived of his right to recover the damages which he himself sustains, and which are the direct consequences of the injury to the wife. He cannot sue for the injuries she sustained, but for those which accrued to himself as the direct and not the remote consequences of such wrongful act of the defendant. 13 R. O. L. § 642; 21 Cyc. 1527.

In Holleman v. Harward, 119 N. C. 150, 25 S. E. 972, 34 L. R. A. 803, 56 Am. St. Rep. 672, where the defendant had sold the plaintiff's wife laudanum or similar drugs despite the plaintiff's protests, the court held that the husband could recover for loss of companionship and loss of services resulting therefrom. While the statute now does not permit the husband to recover for loss of services, which must be recovered solely by the wife, the loss of the companionship of his wife is a loss purely personal to him, and the direct consequence of the wrong of the defendant. For this the wife could not recover, and being the direct and not remote consequence of the wrongful act the husband is entitled to his action.

In Flandermeyer v. Cooper, 85 Ohio St. 327, 98 N. E. 102, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 360, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 983, where the defendant had sold drugs to the husband over the wife's protests, it was held in exact analogy to the above case from this court, that she could recover for the damages thus resulting to her. The court said:

"A statutory right cannot change except by action of the lawmaking power of a state. But it is the boast of the common law that: 'Its flexibility permits its ready adaptability to the changing nature of human affairs.' So that whenever, either by the growth or development of society, or by the statutory change of the legal status of any individual, he is brought within the principles of the common law, then it will afford to him the same relief that it has theretofore afforded to others coming within the reason of its rules. If the wrongs of the wife are the same in principle as the wrongs of the husband, there is now no reason why the common law should withhold from her the remedies it affords to the husband."

The court in that case aptly cited from Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 477:

"Upon principle, this right in the wife is equally valuable to her as property, as is that of the husband to him. Her right being the same as his in kind, degree, and value, there would seem to be no valid reason why the law should deny her the redress which it affords to him. * * * The gist of the action is the loss of consortium, which includes the husband's society, affection, and aid."

And also uses this language:

"There can be no reasonable contention but that the wife suffers the same injury from the loss of consortium as the husband suffers from that cause. His right is not greater than hers. Each is entitled to the society and affection of the other. The rights of both spring from the marriage contract, and in the very nature of things must be mutual, and, while this was always true of the marriage relation, yet there was a time in the history of our jurisprudence when the legal status of the wife was such that she could not, at common law, maintain an action of this character. Now her legal status is the same as that of her husband. She has the same right to the control of her separate property, the same right to sue in her own name, and, in a word, is in the full enjoyment of every right that her husband enjoys, so that she has come clearly within the principles of the common law that allow a right of action by the husband for damages for the loss of the consortium of his wife. Either we must hold that the common law is fixed, unchangeable, and immutable, that it possesses no such flexibility as will permit its ready adaptability to changing conditions of human affairs, or that, when every reason and every theory for denying the wife the same rights as the husband has entirely disappeared from our jurisprudence, she is now equally entitled with her husband to every remedy that the common law affords; and we have no hesitation in adopting the latter view."

To the same purport is Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun (N. Y.) 40. The plaintiff's counsel adds:

"Why should the husband be allowed a recovery in cases of this character and the wife who suffers in the identical same way be denied a recovery? They stand before the same altar; they enter into the same contract."

Necessarily their rights are the same at the bar of justice.

In Bernhardt v. Perry, 276 Mo. 612, 208 S. W. 462, in discussing this identical question, it was said by the able Chief Justice Bond of that court as follows in speaking of the rights of the wife:

"She could have had no recovery when she occupied the status of a married woman at common law; for then her legal existence was merged in that of her husband. But under the Married Woman's Acts in this state, beginning in 1875 and culminating in 1889, with slight amendments thereafter, a wife is to all intents and purposes a legal entity distinct from her husband and capable of contracting and being contracted with and suing and being sued, as fully as if she were an unmarried woman and sui juris. While the principles of the common law, previous to her statutory emancipation, debarred the wife from any legal redress in cases like the present, they nevertheless recognized fully the injury to her personal rights caused by the acts set forth in the petition, and they affirmed such rights to be the same as those which the husband would have been deprived of had the injury in question been inflicted upon the wife, (Flandermeyer v. Cooper, 85 Ohio St. 327; Holleman v. Harward, 119 N. C. 150; 13 R. C. L. par. 509, p. 1460), and though sanctioning a full right to recover in such cases on the part of the husband they denied it to the wife, although an equal sufferer, because feudalism had decreed that she was a legal nonentity and incapable of maintaining any action for the violation of her rights as a wife caused by wrongful injuries inflicted upon her husband."

Further he says:

"The injury suffered by a husband from the loss of the consortium of his wife is no more direct or immediate than that sustained by her from the loss of his society, aid and affection. Hence, there is no logical basis for the reason upon which some of the adverse rulings are based, that in such cases the injury sustained by the wife is not directly and proximately caused by the wrongful act preventing her husband from giving her the means of a livelihood—which it is his duty to provide—and from performing his conjugal duties."

And again:

"The reasons given in the decisions against the right of a wife to recover from the material injury inflicted on her by a negligent act destroying the power of her husband to labor for her support and thereby imposing on her the task of supporting him and which renders him unable to perform the duties of a consort, are utterly inadequate to support the conclusions reached. It will be noted in all of these cases that they are rested upon the lack of suable capacity of the wife or upon the rules of the common law disabling her as against her husband to acquire title to the money awarded as damages for wrongful injury to him, wherefore the hobgoblin of a foolish consistency impelled the common law to adjudge she could not recover for an injury to her personal rights so caused since the instant a recovery was had it would belong to the husband. Neither of these reasons can exist under the specific provisions of the law governing married women; for, as has been shown, the wife may now sue as a feme sole and the awards for any violation of her personal rights belong to her and not to her husband."

It is true that these citations from the distinguished Chief Justice are in a dissenting opinion (in which Judge Williams concurred), but the decisions in other courts than ours are not authority, and are entitled only to the persuasive weight given them on account of the force and correctness of the reasoning therein, and therefore if there is correct and forceful reason in a dissenting opinion from another state it should command exactly the same consideration as if it were made in the majority opinion.

One of the chief grounds for the plaintiff's recovery is the loss of consortium which was formerly pleaded by the phrase, "per quod consortium amisit." This formerly lay only in behalf of the husband, but now the term has been extended to give the wife, and with more reason, the same ground of action. The present state of the law is thus fully stated under the heading of Consortium, 12 Corpus Juris, 532, with full citations in the notes.

"In its original application the term was used to designate a right which the law recognized in a husband, growing out of the marital union, to have performance by the wife of all those duties and obligations in respect to him which she took upon herself when she entered into it; the right to the conjugal fellowship of the wife, to her company, co-operation, and aid in every conjugal relation; fellowship and assistance of the wife; comfort in her society in that respect in which a husband's right is peculiar and exclusive; conjugal society, affection, and assistance of the wife. The term, however, has developed to include the right of the wife to the society and comfort of the husband, and is now used interchangeably to denote the affection, aid, assistance, companionship, and society of either spouse; and as thus employed the term has been defined as those duties and obligations which by marriage both husband and wife take upon themselves toward each other in sickness and health; conjugal affection; conjugal fellowship; conjugal society and assistance; the conjugal society arising by virtue of the marriage contract; the consort's affection, society, or aid; the person's affection, society, or aid; the person, affection, assistance, and aid of the spouse. Loss of services as well as society and affection is included in the legal meaning of the loss of consortium."

There are decisions from other courts denying relief to the wife in cases of this character. Such decisions are necessarily dependent upon two factors: (1) The legislation in reference to the rights of married women in the particular jurisdiction; (2) the attitude of the court in giving either a liberal or restricted construction to new legislation of the nature of that in this state. As was well said by Chief Justice Bond in the above case:

"So prone are the courts to cling to consuetudinary law, even after the reason for the custom has ceased or become a mere memory, that it has required hundreds of years to obtain the meed of justice for married women."

The reasons formerly advanced for a denial to the wife of a recovery for damages sustained by her as a direct result of the injury to him and which are over and above and distinct from the damages which could be recovered by the husband in an action by himself were threefold: (1) The merger of her identity into that of her husband; (2) her incapacity to sue; (3) the right of her husband to recover full damages for his diminished earning capacity, with no corresponding right possessed by her.

Neither of the first two grounds are now valid in this state. It is urged, however, that the plaintiff, after he had obtained a recovery, is presumed to have obtained full pecuniary compensation for all the injuries sustained by him, and of course, if he failed to recover, no action can be maintained by the wife. This proposition is correct if the action of the wife is for the damages for which the husband could maintain an action, but the facts as admitted by this demurrer are that he was injured by the negligence of the defendants, and that the wife sustained damages, which, though flowing from the injuries to her husband, are purely injuries to herself, and for which the husband could not have maintained an action. She is therefore not barred by the judgment, favorable or unfavorable, in the action brought by her husband. A judgment in an action is not effective as a bar or estoppel in any other action unless between the same parties and for the same cause of action. The present action is not between the same parties nor for the same cause of action as in the litigation between the husband and the defendants.

It has always been held that the husband's action for damages sustained by him on account of injuries to her is not barred by judgment in favor of the same defendant in an action brought by the wife. See cases cited in the notes to 2 A. L. R. 592. Of course the reverse of the proposition is true, 13 R. C. L. § 461.

As already stated, the rights which the wife is asserting in this action are entirely separate and distinct from the grounds of recovery asserted by the husband in his action. In paragraph 12 of the complaint is the following allegation which is admitted by the demurrer to be true:

"That, by reason of the sudden and fearful injury of her husband as above stated, and by reason of being forced to look upon him in his horribly mutilated condition, she was shocked and frightened to such an extent that her entire nervous system was impaired and undermined and left permanently injured and weakened, and her physical and mental condition was permanently injured and impaired."

In Kimberly v. Howland, 143 N. C. 398, 55 S. E. 778, the court said:

"We think the general principles of the law of torts support a right of action for physical injuries resulting from negligence, whether willful or otherwise, none the less strongly because the physical injury consists of a wrecked nervous system instead of lacerated limbs."

This was cited and approved, Walker, J., May v. Telegraph Co., 157 N. C. 422, 72 S. E. 1059.

While the wife cannot recover for any damages for which the husband might have recovered (or his personal representative in the case of a wrongful death), we think that she could recover for those injuries which were sustained by her, and, being personal to her, for which the husband could not have recovered in his action. 15 A. & E. (2d Ed.) § 61, which is cited in May v. Telegraph Co., 157 N. C. 423, 72 S. E. 1059.

We will not go more fully into the elements of damages which can be considered by the jury when the action goes back for a new trial.

It is objected by the defendant in this case that, if such action can be maintained by the wife, it can be sustained on the part of the children or other dependent relatives. That plea has never been found good when the action has been brought by the husband, and of course it cannot avail when the action is by the wife upon the same state of facts. The wife's cause of action arises from the nature of the relationship created by the contract of marriage as now recognized by our Constitution, and the laws replacing the former status, under which, by the common law, the husband was the sole personage. Such plea has not been held valid in an action for criminal conversation or for alienation of affections, or in any other case in which an action by either husband or wife has been brought for injury to the plaintiff (whether husband or wife), which were personal to the plaintiff therein, and for which the other party could not maintain an action. It does not depend upon the fiction of loss of services of the other party to the marriage, but is based upon the ground that the party bringing the action (whether husband or wife) has been directly injured by the wrongful conduct of the defendant.

It is sufficient to say that the plaintiff has a cause of action for those injuries which were sustained by her, and which are personal to herself, and the direct and not the remote consequences of the negligence of the defendants, which is admitted by the demurrer in this case; and the judgment overruling the demurrer must therefore be affirmed.

ALLEN and STACY, JJ., concur in result.

(182 N. C. 34)

NEWBY et al. v. ATLANTIC COAST REALTY CO. et al. (No. 18.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Frauds, statute of §74(1)—Inapplicable to contract of parties to buy land and share profits of resale.

C. S. § 988, requiring contracts to sell or convey land to be in writing, refers only to a case where, as a result of a sale or exchange, a conveyance from one to the other of the contracting parties is contemplated, and not to an agreement for one of the parties to furnish the money to take up an option for land which the other had and take title in his name and divide the profits on a resale.

2. Joint adventures §5(1) — Action at law maintainable for breach of agreement.

Where defendants, who, under agreement with plaintiffs were to take title to land in themselves, furnishing the money for taking up an option thereon, and on resale were to divide the profits with plaintiffs, breached the contract and sought to thwart or forestall plaintiffs in the enforcement of the trust by associating with them others and taking title in them as well as themselves, plaintiffs need not resort to equity, but may sue for damages for breach of the contract or trust.

3. Trial §139(1) — No nonsuit, where evidence most favorable sufficient to establish plaintiff's cause of action.

Nonsuit may not be granted, where the evidence most favorable is sufficient to establish plaintiff's cause of action, and this notwithstanding discrepancies, inconsistencies, and contradictions; it being for the jury to determine which part is true.

Appeal from Superior Court, Perquimans County; Allen, Judge.

Action by W. G. Newby and another against the Atlantic Coast Realty Company and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and new trial granted.

This case was here at a former term, and is reported in 180 N. C. at page 51, 103 S. E. 909, to which we refer for a statement of the facts other than those to be found herein. The land was purchased at the sale thereof at public auction, and was bought in for the joint and equal benefit of the plaintiffs and the defendants, and under the new, or substituted, contract, which was in parol, previously made, the land was to be sold under an option and trust deed, plaintiffs to receive one half of the net proceeds of the sale of real and personal property, and defendants the other half, and the property was to be held by the parties for resale; and, it was further provided that the farm should be cultivated during the year 1919, all of which was to be done at the sole expense of the defendants and without any personal obligation on the part of the plaintiffs, the land and crops, and other property, to stand as security to the defendants for any money so advanced or expended by them for the joint benefit of the parties, and in furtherance of their agreement, the profits from the whole transaction to be equally divided between the parties. It is alleged that defendants failed to perform the contract on their part, and, instead thereof, that they entered into an agreement with other parties for the purpose of enabling them to relieve themselves of the burden of paying all the expenses, as they had contracted to do. Instead of paying the money due on the sale and to close the option for the purchase of the land, which was held by plaintiffs, defendants united with other parties, who they thought could assist them in raising the funds to pay for the land and to defray the other expenses, and took the title to them jointly, the purpose being to break their contract with plaintiffs and to defeat or disregard their rights thereunder. The judge nonsuited the plaintiffs, and they appealed.

J. S. McNider, of Hertford, Ehringhaus & Small and Meekins & McMullan, all of Elizabeth City, for appellants.

Aydlett & Sawyer, of Elizabeth City, Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., Chas. Whedbee, of Hertford, and Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] When the case was here before, we did not consider the question as to the statute of frauds, because there was no exception requiring us to do so. But in this appeal there was a nonsuit, which may have been granted upon the ground that if there was a contract, as alleged, it was not in writing, and therefore defendants were not bound by it, although the plaintiffs may have established it by their evidence. We will therefore pass upon it, as the question is presented and may arise again unless disposed of by us now. In order to decide this question, we must have a clear conception, or understanding, of the terms of the contract, and, as these were tersely and lucidly stated by Judge Cranmer at the first trial of the case, we adopt what he said about them, though not literally. Plaintiffs contend, said he, that they made a contract with defendants on the 6th day of December, 1918, under which it was agreed that the property be bought by them and held for resale for the joint account of both plaintiffs and defendants, they to share equally in all the profits, and that the farm was to be operated for their joint account, and that the profits from the farming were also to be divided equally; further, that all money necessary for the purchase of the land and the operation of the farm was to be furnished by the defendants, and that plaintiffs were not to furnish any money whatever, or to become in any way liable for any money for the purchase of the land or the farming operations.

With this understanding of the salient features of the contract, we are of the opinion that it is not within the language or spirit of the statute of frauds, which provides that all contracts to sell or convey lands, or any interest in or concerning them, shall be void, unless the contract, or some memorandum or note thereof, be put in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some other person by him thereto lawfully authorized. Revisal, § 976 (Consol. Statutes, § 988). There is no such contract in this case as is described in the statute. The plaintiffs have not contracted to sell or convey any land to the defendants, nor have the defendants agreed to buy and pay for the same, nor vice versa. While the question was not considered in the opinion of this court, by Justice Allen, in the first appeal, the learned justice thus referred to it when deciding as to the measure of damages:

"In the first place, the plaintiffs are not asking to recover damages for breach of contract to convey land. If they had done so, and the contract had been in writing, the rule laid down by his honor would have been the true measure of damages, being one-half of the difference between the option price and the market value of the land at the time of the breach, but being by parol, if one to convey the land, the statute of frauds would be a complete defense." Newby v. Realty Co., 180 N. C. 51, at page 53, 103 S. E. 909, at page 910.

He then continues, and states the terms of the contract very succinctly and clearly as follows:

"The plaintiffs are asking to recover damages for breach of a contract by the terms of which, as they allege, the defendants agreed to furnish the money to take up the option, which expired on January 1, 1919, and to sell the land and pay the plaintiffs one-half the profits, less one-half the expenses of sale, and to furnish the money for the cultivation of the lands for the year 1919, under the management of one of the plaintiffs, and to pay the plaintiffs one-half the profits from the crops."

The parties contracted with reference to the profits to be realized upon a resale of the land, and not with the view of acquiring title to any part of the land. They already had the title, and the land itself was to be held in trust, for the purpose of realizing the profits by another sale of it.

The section of the English statute of frauds, relating to declarations of trust, was never adopted in this state, though enacted in the same or similar form in some other states of the Union. And in this distinction will be found the explanation of the minority decisions in such other states, holding, in an action to raise and declare a trust, that the statute of frauds was applicable in those cases where, upon an agreement similar to this, title to the lands had been taken in the name of one party who wrongfully refused to execute the agreement. The majority view in all the states, however, is that to an agreement of this kind the statute of frauds has no application. 25 R. C. L. pp. 595-597; Morgart v. Smouse, 103 Md. 463, 63 Atl. 1070, 115 Am. St. Rep. 367, 7 Ann. Cas. 1140. In the majority view of the courts such an agreement for the purchase of land for the purpose of resale is regarded, not as a contract to sell or convey lands, but as a contract of partnership or a joint venture, as the case may be, which contemplates, not the transfer of any interest in lands from one party to the contract to the other, but only a division of profits upon a resale of the lands. In

Morgart v. Smouse, supra, 103 Md. 468, 63 Atl. 1072, 115 Am. St. Rep. 371, 7 Ann. Cas. 1141, the court said:

"It has been repeatedly held in different jurisdictions that an agreement by two or more persons to buy land and sell it and share either the profits or the profits and losses constitutes them partners for that venture, and entitles either of them to an accounting in equity from the others of the joint transactions. * * * A verbal agreement is sufficient to constitute a partnership to deal in lands; the statute of frauds not being applicable to such a contract." Parsons on Partnership (4th Ed.) § 6; Lindley on Partnership, 88, 89, and other cases cited.

In the note in Morgart v. Smouse, supra, 7 Ann. Cas. 1142, it is said:

"The widely accepted rule is that a partnership agreement between two or more persons that they will become jointly interested in a speculation for buying and selling lands is not within the section of the statute of frauds, providing that no estate or interest in lands shall be created, assigned, or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by a deed or conveyance in writing."

In this state, as stated above and in effect, the only statute requiring consideration is Revisal, § 976, providing that contracts to sell or convey lands shall be void unless some sufficient memorandum thereof be reduced to writing. The uniform construction of this statute is that it has reference to those cases alone in which, as the result of sale, exchange, or other form of bargaining, a conveyance of land is contemplated from one of the contracting parties to the other. By the uniform decisions of this court, the statute has no application to those contracts whereby two persons agree to purchase land, either generally, or as a single venture, for the purpose of reselling the same at a profit and sharing the same between them. The reason for this is obviously that, by such a contract, no conveyance of land is intended between the parties to the contract forming the basis of the dispute. And where consequently such a contract has been entered into, and where one of the parties has thereafter taken the title to the lands in his own name and wrongfully refuses to execute the agreement, this court has consistently held that he holds the land as a trustee for the purposes of the joint agreement, and that an action to declare and enforce the trust will lie, as will appear by the case of Brogden v. Gibson, 165 N. C. 16, 80 S. E. 966, where the action was to declare and enforce a parol trust, upon facts practically identical with those in this case. The court held that the action would lie, and that the statute of frauds had no application, citing ample authority in this state to support the ruling. Because of its close likeness to this case is our excuse for quoting liberally from it. In that case, the court said (165 N. C. at pages 19 and 20, 80 S. E. at page 968):

"While defendant has not sold the land, so as to bring this case within the operation of the principle just stated, he has, by his agreement, charged it with a trust which equity will enforce, and the statute, fortunately for fair and honest dealing, is no protection to him. That he is morally bound to its performance will not be questioned, and he is also legally required to fulfill his promise. The law, upon this phase of the matter, is equally well established. We cannot doubt for a moment that the agreement was that the title to the land should be taken in the name of the plaintiff, or, at least, in the joint names of the parties, as the plaintiff was authorized to sell as well as to buy the lots, and everything necessary to carry out this purpose is implied. It surely was not intended that defendant should be able to block the execution of the agreement by taking the title to himself and refusing to convey. But even if it was the purpose that he should have the title to it, the agreement was that he should hold it for the joint benefit of himself and the plaintiff, and upon the faith of this promise he acquired the title, and will not be permitted to hold it discharged of this obligation, but only in trust for the uses declared in the agreement. The further consideration for the promise was that the plaintiff should contribute his skill and labor in securing the property for the purposes of the joint enterprise. This he has done fully and faithfully, and equity will not disappoint his reasonable expectation that defendant would not take the benefit of this skill and labor and refuse to execute the trust and confidence reposed in him."

In the same case (165 N. C. 22, 80 S. E. 969) the court said:

"If we should permit defendant to profit by any such betrayal of the trust so implicitly and innocently reposed in him, it would be not only inequitable, but a reproach to the administration of justice." Anderson v. Harrington, 163 N. C. 140, 79 S. E. 426.

A comparison of the cited case, Brogden v. Gibson, supra, with the instant case, will show a strong similarity of facts, and certainly a substantial one. In both cases there was an agreement that defendant furnish the money to purchase the land—the title to be taken, in the cited case, either in the plaintiff's name, or the names of both parties—and in both cases again the original owner of the property conveyed the same, not according to the terms of the agreement, but in the cited case, by the wrongful inducement of the defendant, to the defendant alone, and in the instant case, by the wrongful inducements of the defendants, to the defendants and other, perhaps, innocent parties, so as practically to preclude an enforcement of the trust. In neither case was there such an execution of the agreement as to remove the bar of the statute of frauds, if otherwise applicable. So that here the defendants' contention, based upon the imaginary distinction, that in the cited case the contract was executed, so far as it contemplated a conveyance of land, is untenable. The only conveyance of land contemplated by the contract sued on was the conveyance from Fleetwood to the corporation, which plaintiffs and defendants agreed to form, and of which the defendants were to hold all the stock as security until their scheme or project was fully consummated. Fleetwood's contract with the plaintiffs to convey the land was evidenced by a written option, and Fleetwood, furthermore, is not a party to this suit. By the wrongful inducement of the defendants, Fleetwood has, as did the vendor in Brogden v. Gibson, supra, conveyed the lands to the defendants and their associates, in violation of the agreement and plaintiffs' equitable rights thereunder. It cannot be contended that the defendants, who, if they had taken title to the lands in themselves alone, would have been charged with a trust in plaintiffs' favor, can, by the ingenious and wrongful method of associating other, perhaps innocent, parties in the acquisition of the title, bar the plaintiffs of all relief. If the lands in defendants' hands, as is well established, would be chargeable with a trust in plaintiffs' favor, it is because the agreement between plaintiffs and defendants was a valid agreement, unaffected by the statute of frauds.

That this contract is not within the statute of frauds is strikingly illustrated by Michael v. Foll, 100 N. C. 178, 6 S. E. 261, 6 Am. St. Rep. 577, where it was held by this court that an agreement, made at the time of the sale of land, and as an inducement thereto, that if a certain mineral interest thereon was sold in the grantor's lifetime he was to have one-half of the price, is not a contract for an interest in land. See, also, Houston v. Sledge, 101 N. C. 640, 8 S. E. 145, 2 L. R. A. 487; Ambrose v. Ambrose, 94 Ga. 655, 19 S. E. 980. And still more to the point is Trowbridge v. Wetherbee, 11 Allen (Mass.) 361, cited and approved in Michael v. Foll, supra, where it was held that a parol promise to pay to another a portion of the profits made by a promisor on the purchase and sale of real estate is not within the statute of frauds, and may be proved by parol. See, also, Sherill v. Hogan, 92 N. C. 345.

[2] If the agreement was a valid one, and the defendants have not only wrongfully breached it, but sought to thwart or forestall the plaintiffs in the enforcement of the trust by the association with them of other innocent and bona fide purchasers for value, and without notice of the trust, then it follows, both in reason and upon authority, that the plaintiffs may properly assert their right through the medium of this action to recover damages for a breach of the trust or the contract, or to follow the fund they have received for the land. Ledford v. Emerson, 140 N. C. 288, 52 S. E. 641, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 130, 6 Ann. Cas. 107, and cases cited; Owen v. Meroney, 136 N. C. 475, 48 S. E. 821, 103 Am. St. Rep. 952, 1 Ann. Cas. 834; Newby v.

Harrell, 99 N. C. 149, 5 S. E. 284, 6 Am. St. Rep. 503; and especially Campbell v. Everhart, 139 N. C. 503, 52 S. E. 201; May v. Le Claire, 11 Wall. 217, 20 L. Ed. 50.

Plaintiffs have an election of remedies. They may sue for specific performance, which would require that the new associates of Ferrall be made parties, so that it might be determined whether they are purchasers bona fide and for value, and without notice of plaintiffs' equity. If they were not, they would be bound by the original contract between plaintiffs and defendants, and if they were, defendants would be liable to a money judgment, in lieu of plaintiffs' right to specific performance which they had lost by defendants' wrongful act. And, second, plaintiffs could waive their right to specific performance and recover damages for a breach of the contract, or a violation of the trust, which they have chosen to do in this action. 39 Cyc. 572; Seymour v. Freer, 8 Wall. (U. S.) 202, 19 L. Ed. 306; Taylor v. Benham, 5 How. (U. S.) 233, 12 L. Ed. 130. But there is no contention about plaintiffs' right to recover, as we understand it, if the contract is valid, and there was evidence to show that it was made between the parties as alleged. There was clearly a consideration to support it.

[3] This brings us to the second proposition, as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show the contract. We have examined the same carefully, and conclude that there was at least some evidence which should have been submitted to the jury. The testimony of the witnesses Newby and Weeks corresponds with the allegations of the complaint, and, if accepted by the jury as true, entitled plaintiffs to their verdict. It would be of little value in the discussion to recite their testimony here, the only question being whether there was any evidence as to the contract alleged in the complaint. Both Newby and Weeks gave testimony to the effect that the contract as alleged was entered into, and that defendants had failed to comply with it. The plaintiffs in their brief insist that the learned judge who presided at the trial decided the case and ordered the nonsuit upon the ground that a recovery was barred by the statute of frauds. We have disposed of this plea.

On a motion by the defendant for a nonsuit under the statute, or on a demurrer to the evidence, the latter must be construed most favorably to the plaintiff, and every fact essential to the cause of action, which it tends to prove, must be taken as established, and plaintiff also is entitled to the most favorable inferences deducible therefrom, considering only so much of the evidence as is favorable to the plaintiff and rejecting that which is unfavorable. Sikes v. Life Ins. Co., 144 N. C. 626, 57 S. E. 391; McCaskill v. Walker, 145 N. C. 252, 58 S. E. 1073; Cotton v. Rail- road, 149 N. C. 227, 62 S. E. 1093; Thompson v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 155, 62 S. E. 883; Morton v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 54, 67 S. E. 67; West v. Tanning Co., 154 N. C. 44, 69 S. E. 687. This rule prevails generally in other jurisdictions. Pinson v. Railway Co., 85 S. C. 355, 67 S. E. 464. Applied to this case, the evidence is, in law, fully sufficient to establish plaintiffs' cause of action, if taken to be true, as it should be. It makes no difference if there are discrepancies in it, or inconsistencies or even contradictions, as the jury must determine which part is true, and not the court. But, whichever way we take it, there was error in nonsuiting the plaintiffs, and there must be a new trial, so that the jury may pass upon the facts.

New trial.

(182 N. C. 755)

WALLACE v. SOUTHERN COTTON OIL CO.
(No. 61.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Aug. 14, 1921.)

1. Master and servant §105(1)—Charge on custom in other mills held proper.

In an action for injuries to an employee struck by a bale of cotton linters, which fell off a slide with no guard rails to prevent bales from falling off, after being placed thereon without lookout or warning, there was no reversible error in the court's charge that the fact that the method of removing linters was similar to that used in other cotton oil mills, though evidentiary, was not sufficient to relieve defendant from liability, unless it exercised reasonable care to provide its employees with reasonable safeguards.

2. Appeal and error §1066—Abstract charge held not prejudicial.

An instruction in an action for injuries to an employee which was abstract held not prejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by Robert C. Wallace against the Southern Cotton Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

Plaintiff alleged that defendant was operating a cotton seed oil and a fertilizer manufacturing plant, and operated in the northern wing of its main factory building a large compress for the baling of linters, or short fibers of cotton taken from the seed after ginning. This press was located in a square room on the second floor of said building, which room was called the "press room." In said room there was a large compress into which the linters were forced up from the room below through the floor. In said compress the linters were compressed into bales and covered with rough bagging, said bales weighing about 500 pounds each. The only entrance to the press room was through a large double door, or opening through the eastern wall, which door was connected with the ground by a series of steps forming a stairway. Along the sides of said stairway were parallel guides or runners, which formed together with the side rails of the stairway an inclined slide from the press room to the ground. The only means provided by the defendant for entering or leaving the press room and for moving the baled linters out of the press room to the ground was said stairway, and it was the practice of the press operator to shove the baled linters from the press onto the stairway, along which it fell or slid with great force to the ground. Along the sides of said stairway there were no guard rails or guides to prevent the bales from falling off. At the foot of the stairway there were no platforms to receive the bales, no rails to keep the bales from rolling, no rails to keep the passers-by away from the landing place, and no sign or other warning of danger from the falling bales. It was the custom of the defendant's employees in passing around the wing of the building in which the press room was located to pass either in front of the stairway above described or under it and between it and the building. This custom of the defendant's employees was known to defendant through its officers, agents, and foremen. The plaintiff while acting in the course and scope of his employment, about his master's business, and while acting under orders of his superior, undertook to go from the defendant's saw-filing room near the press room near the northern end of the building. Plaintiff's duties had not usually carried him to that part of defendant's plant, and he had never seen the baled linters sliding or tumbling down the stairway. He had never been warned of the danger from that source, and did not know of its existence. No rules had ever been promulgated by defendant to govern its employees in passing in that vicinity, and plaintiff was totally unconscious of the danger there lurking. As plaintiff passed within a distance of some 8 or 10 feet from the stairway, and while he was facing in a direction away from the door of the press room, a young negro employee of the defendant, without looking to see whether any person was near the stairway, and without giving any signal or other warning, pushed a bale of linters onto the stairway. Said negro workman was employed in a department of defendant's plant separate from that of plaintiff who was not acquainted or associated with him. The bale was not placed squarely upon the stairway, and when it reached a point about halfway to the ground it tumbled over the side of the stairway, and struck plaintiff from behind.

His honor charged the jury as follows:

In this case the plaintiff alleges that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant, in that he alleges that the place at which he was injured was not a safe place for an employee to be or pass, that there were no danger signals, and that no rules or instructions as to taking care to avoid the alleged danger had been given to the plaintiff. This the defendant denies. It is denied by the defendant company that there was any negligence on its part, but it alleges that if there was any negligence causing the injury to the plaintiff it was solely the negligence of a fellow servant, negligence solely of the man who threw out the bale. Defendant alleges that the premises were in such condition as is customary in such a place as that. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in this issue. Before you can answer this first issue "Yes" you will have to find from the evidence and by the greater weight of it that the defendant was negligent, and that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff.

An employer or master is liable for an injury to an employee who is free from contributory negligence, where it is caused by the concurrent negligence of the employer and of a fellow servant. Nevertheless, to authorize a recovery, the employer's negligence must have contributed to the injury. If the master's negligence is the proximate or efficient cause of the injury, or if the injury would not have been sustained but for his negligence, the master is liable, even though it might have been prevented by the exercise of greater care on the part of the fellow servant.

It is no defense that the negligence resulted from the act of a fellow servant, if the master's negligence concurred with that of the fellow servant. Thus in the present case, if the jury finds that the defendant failed to exercise reasonable care by establishing and continuing a needlessly dangerous method of removing the bales of linters from the press room to the ground, the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff, even though a concurrent cause of the accident was the failure of the negro in the press room to give a signal of danger to the plaintiff, or to others who might have been passing. Where, however, the negligence of the servant is such as to have caused the injury even had the master not been negligent, then the servant's negligence is the sole cause of the injury, and the master is not liable.

With respect to the question as to whether or not this was a safe place, the defendant in this cause owed the plaintiff the duty to exercise reasonable care in providing him a safe place to work. A master fails in his duty to supply his workman a safe place to work if he allows the work to be habitually conducted in a manner needlessly dangerous. This obligation on the part of the defendant extended, not only to the actual place where the plaintiff had to perform his duties, but extended also to such parts of the premises as the plaintiff reasonably had a right to go in performing the work he had to do. The protection which this rule throws around the plaintiff did not extend to out of the way places where the defendant could not have reasonably anticipated his presence, but such protection did extend to those parts of the defendant's premises to which the plaintiff or other employees might have been reasonably expected to go, either in discharge of their duties or for any other lawful purpose. In this view of the case it is immaterial whether or not the plaintiff was about his master's business at the time of the injury, provided the defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known, of the existence of an unsafe condition at a point where its employees were frequently passing and repassing to the knowledge of the defendant's manager.

The court charges you that the defendant's duty to furnish the plaintiff a safe place to work was not limited to the actual place where the plaintiff performed his customary duties, but extended to such additional parts of the plant to which the plaintiff may have been sent for other purposes connected with his work. If you should find that the plaintiff was injured while passing near the skids leading from the press room while the plaintiff was on his way to get a piece of lumber to make a straight edge, under the direction of the plaintiff's superior officer, then the defendant's duty of furnishing him a safe place to work extended to such parts of the plant as he was reasonably required to pass in obtaining said straight edge.

(The court charges you that if you should find from the evidence that the method of removing the linters which was employed by the defendant, was similar to that used in other oil mills, this fact would be evidence for you to consider, but would not be sufficient to relieve the defendant from liability unless you should also find that the defendant exercised reasonable care in so ordering the operations of its plant as to provide its employees with reasonable safeguards. The custom of other plants is evidence for you to consider, but a negligent method of operation cannot be excused on the ground that other parties or plants are similarly negligent.)

To so much of the foregoing charge as is contained in parenthesis, the defendant excepts.

The court charges you that it is not only the duty of the defendant to establish proper methods for the conduct of its business, but it must also establish rules among its employees for the observance of such proper methods. The employer is bound to warn and instruct his employees concerning such dangers as are known to his employees, or which could be known to him by the exercise of ordinary care.

A master is not bound to indemnify one servant for injuries caused by the negligence of another servant in the same common employment, unless the negligent servant was the master's representative. Therefore, if the jury shall find from the evidence, and the greater weight thereof, that the servant who threw the bale of cotton down the slide, or skid, had been specifically instructed always to give timely notice of his purpose to discharge such bale, and that in this case he did discharge the bale without giving notice, and that the plaintiff's injury resulted solely from the negligent act of the servant in so discharging the bale without notice, they should and are instructed to answer the first issue "No." This would be so, and you should answer this issue "No" if you find the facts so to be (unless you further find that defendant's officers knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that the negro operating the press room frequently failed to look out and give warning of the falling of a bale of cotton).

To so much of the foregoing charge as is contained in parenthesis, the defendant excepts.

As to the duty of the master to instruct the man handling the bales to look out and give warning to any one passing, the employer's duty to establish proper rules is not completed by merely announcing such rules to its employees, because the servant is not affected by a rule which is customarily abrogated to the master's knowledge. (Thus if in the present case you should find that the manager or superintendent of the defendant's plant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that the negro operating the press in the press room frequently failed to give warning of the falling of a bale of cotton, then it would have been the duty of the defendant through its manager or superintendent, to establish such additional safeguards as would have been reasonably calculated to protect its employees from danger from that source.)

To so much of the foregoing charge as is contained in parenthesis, the defendant excepts.

As to the duty to post signs of danger: The court charges you that if you should find that the defendant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that the method employed by it in passing the baled linters to the ground was a source of danger to those passing at that point, it should have posted signs or given other warnings of the danger there existing, and its failure to do so is evidence of negligence.

Gentlemen, it is not the law that the master should use all preventive measures which might be employed, but there has to be applied to such matters what we call the rule of the prudent man. That is, what would a reasonable and prudent person have done under the circumstances of the situation?

On this issue or question, the plaintiff contends that the testimony tends to show that on November 28, 1918, he was working for the defendant as a saw filer, and that that was the third week that he had worked there, and that he found in doing his work that the saw teeth of the machinery referred to were uneven, and that they needed to be straightened, and that he spoke to the superintendent, Mr. Denmark, about it, and also had a talk with Bartholomew, the assistant superintendent, who said he would get a straight edge for him with which to line up the saw teeth. That Bartholomew did not get the straight edge, but instructed the plaintiff to go out for filing material and get a strip, and that he would find some material behind the hydrant house; that the plaintiff went around by the tool house to get a saw, and in going to the material behind the hydrant house, as he turned the corner of the press room, the bale of cotton fell on him, which rendered him unconscious, and that he knew nothing more of what occurred for some days thereafter. Plaintiff further says that the testimony tends to show that at that place the bales of linters are thrown from the upper floor, that there is a ladder from the ground to the bottom of the floor over which the bales of linters are thrown, and that there is a rail on each side of the steps on the same level with the steps, that there are no cross rails to keep the bales on the skid, that there are paths around and under the skid, which show that employees frequently pass that way, and that at that time there was a coal pile so close that it was necessary for any one passing to go close to the skid, and that there was no guard or arrangement at that time on the ground for catching the bales, and that there was no danger sign at that place, and that there were no rules that had been given about passing that particular point. (Plaintiff further contends that the testimony tends to show that Sherrod, the boy whose duty it was to take the bales from the press room and put them out on the ground, had never been told by the defendant or the defendant's officers to keep a lookout and give warning, and that the defendant was guilty of negligence in permitting him to work without giving warning), and even if you find that the defendant did instruct Sherrod to keep a lookout, and it was Sherrod's negligence in failing to do so, plaintiff contends that you should find from the evidence that the injury would not have happened if the defendant had provided guard rails to prevent the bales from falling sideways off the skid, or had provided guard rails on the ground, and plaintiff contends that in the exercise of ordinary care the defendant should have had guard rails on the side and a guard on the ground, and the failure of the defendant in exercise of ordinary care to provide such conditions concurred with the negligence of Sherrod, if you find that he was negligent, and the concurring negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury.

To so much of the foregoing charge as is contained in parenthesis, the defendant excepts.

The last three exceptions involve the same point, and are directed to the error of the court below in charging the jury upon an abstract proposition of law not raised by the evidence or the complaint.

M. V. Barnhill and F. S. Spruill, both of Rocky Mount, for appellant.

Battle & Winslow, of Rocky Mount, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] All the defendant's exceptions and assignments of error, not abandoned in its brief, are directed exclusively to the charge. After a careful examination of the court's charge to the jury and the defendant's exceptions thereto, we can find no prejudicial or reversible error. A perusal of the record in its entirety leaves us with the impression that the case has been tried in substantial conformity to our decisions, and we have discovered no sufficient reason for disturbing the result.

No error.

(182 N. C. 788)

STATE v. PRINCE. (No. 91.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Intoxicating liquors  $\S$ 236(19), 238(1) — Evidence insufficient to sustain conviction for manufacturing, or to justify submission to jury.

In a prosecution for manufacturing spirituous liquor, evidence held insufficient to support a verdict of guilty, and that it was error for the court not to grant a nonsuit.

2. Criminal law  $\S$ 552(3)—Circumstantial evidence, producing mere conjecture of guilt, insufficient.

Where all of the circumstances on which the state solely relies may exist, and yet the defendant be innocent, and either singly or in combination they produce no assurance of guilt, but at most only a mere conjecture or surmise of it, the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction.

3. Criminal law  $\S$ 741(1) — Legal sufficiency and moral weight of evidence distinct.

The legal sufficiency of proof in a criminal prosecution and the moral weight of legally sufficient proof are very distinct in the conception of the law, the first lying within the province of the court and the last within that of the jury; but the province of the jury should not be invaded in any case, and when reasonable minds, acting within the limits prescribed by the rules of law, might reach different conclusions, the evidence must be submitted to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Lyon, Judge.

Young Prince was convicted of manufacturing spirituous liquor, and appeals. Reversed.

The only question is whether there was any evidence of his guilt, and this was raised by his motion to nonsuit the state. The evidence substantially was that three officers had searched near defendant's premises, on May 10, 1921, and about one-half or three-quarters of a mile from his house they found a distillery that was being operated, and the materials were there for making whisky. There was a path leading from the distillery up a hill about 150 yards to a road, which was intersected by the railroad, and led to the defendant's house; but the road passed his house and extended to the neighborhood beyond and in the direction of Raleigh. There was a path from the house of the defendant to a spring about 200 yards away, and a path led from the spring to an old place where a distillery furnace had once been, "which showed no signs of recent use." A pile of sawdust was found some distance beyond this spring, and beyond this sawdust there was evidence of a distillery furnace having been operated some time in the past, but which had not been recently used. They found an old still worm in the edge of the woods and back of defendant's garden, but there was nothing to indicate any recent use of it, and it apparently had been lying there, exposed to the weather, for quite a while. Not far from this old and unused distillery worm, a jug of something, having the appearance of tomato beer, was found. It resembled something found at the distillery, three-quarters of a mile away, which they took to be tomato beer.

The defendant was not at home, and they did not see him on this raid or search; his premises and house were searched without objection by his wife, who assured them before they went in that they would find nothing, and they found nothing there, as she had stated. In the barn or granary of the defendant, there was found a barrel containing a few gallons of molasses, estimated to be not over five gallons. Following the road past the defendant's house from the direction of the distillery, going directly west into the woods, something like 300 yards from the defendant's home and about 35 or 40 yards from the road, two five-gallon jugs were found sitting behind a log and were in guano sacks, but were unstopped. One of them was empty, and the other one contained about a cupful of something that had the odor of whisky. All the witnesses admitted that nothing was found in the home of the defendant to arouse the least suspicion that whisky was being stored or kept there. Each witness stated he knew not whether the land belonged to the defendant where the still sites were found, and none of these witnesses knew whether the still worm, or jug of tomato beer, or any jugs, were on the premises of defendant; that the defendant was not seen in connection with either the distillery, the empty jugs, or the still worm, and was not at home on this occasion.

The witness Ferguson, who lived in Prince's neighborhood, testified that the path leading from the distillery in the direction of the defendant's home had been used as a school path for a number of years. Motion to nonsuit, submitted at the close of all the evidence, which is above set forth, was overruled. Defendant excepted and appealed.

A. C. Ray, of Pittsboro, for appellant.
James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. [1, 2] We have examined the evidence with close scrutiny, and can find none upon which a verdict of guilty can reasonably be based, if there is any upon which to raise even a well-founded suspicion. All of the circumstances, upon which the state solely relies, may exist, and yet the defendant be innocent. Either singly, or in combination, they produce no assurance of guilt, but at most only a mere conjecture, or surmise of it, which is certainly not sufficient as evidence. Byrd v. Express Co., 139 N. C. 273, 51 S. E. 851. In State v. Vinson, 63 N. C. 335, this court thus states the rule:

"We may say with certainty that evidence which merely shows it possible for the fact in issue to be as alleged, or which raises a mere conjecture that it was so, is an insufficient foundation for a verdict, and should not be left to the jury."

And in Brown v. Kinsey, 81 N. C. 245, it is said:

"The rule is well settled that if there be no evidence, or if the evidence be so slight as not reasonably to warrant the inference of the fact in issue or furnish more than materials for a mere conjecture, the court will not leave the issue to be passed on by the jury."

In the later case of Young v. Railroad, 116 N. C. 932, 21 S. E. 177, the court says:

"Judges are no longer required to submit a case to the jury merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof, unless the evidence be of such a character as that it would warrant the jury to proceed in finding a verdict in favor of the party introducing such evidence."

See Cobb v. Fogalman, 23 N. C. 440; Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451; Sutton v. Madre, 47 N. C. 320; Pettiford v. Mayo, 117 N. C. 27, 23 S. E. 252; Lewis v. Steamship Co., 132 N. C. 904, 44 S. E. 666.

It all comes to this: That there must be legal evidence of the fact in issue, and not merely such as raises a suspicion or conjecture in regard to it. The state must do more than show the possible liability of the defendant for the crime. It must go further, and offer at least some evidence which reasonably tends to prove every fact essential to its success. This has not been done in the case now before us.

[3] We may say generally that evidence should raise more than a mere conjecture as to the existence of the fact to be proved. The legal sufficiency of proof and the moral weight of legally sufficient proof are very distinct in the conception of the law. The first lies within the province of the court; the last within that of the jury. Applying the maxim, "de minimis non curat lex," when we say that there is no evidence to go to the jury, we do not mean that there is literally and absolutely none, for as to this there could be no room for any controversy; but there is none which ought reasonably to satisfy the jury that the fact sought to be proved is established, though there is no practical or logical difference between no evidence and evidence without legal weight or probative force. The sufficiency of evidence in law to go to the jury does not depend upon the doctrine of chances. However confidently one, in his own affairs, may base his judgment on mere probability as to a past event, when he assumes the burden of establishing such event as a proposition of fact and as a basis for the judgment of a court, he must adduce evidence other than a majority of chances that the fact to be proved does exist. It must be more than sufficient for a mere guess, and must be such as tends to actual proof. But the province of the jury should not be invaded in any case and when reasonable minds, acting within the limitations prescribed by the rules of law, might reach different conclusions, the evidence must be submitted to the jury. Campbell v. Everhart, 139 N. C. 516, 52 S. E. 201; Lewis v. Steamship Co., 132 N. C. 904, 44 S. E. 666; Wheeler v. Schroeder, 4 R. I. 383; Offutt v. Col. Exposition, 175 Ill. 472, 51 N. E. 651; Day v. Railroad, 96 Me. 207, 52 Atl. 771, 90 Am. St. Rep. 335; Catlett v. Railway, 57 Ark. 461, 21 S. W. 1062, 38 Am. St. Rep. 254; Railroad v. Stebbing, 62 Md. 504.

The principle is well stated in Spruill v. Insurance Co., 120 N. C. at page 147 (27 S. E. 41), that where the action of the judge, in directing a verdict or granting a nonsuit or dismissal of the action, can be sustained only under the doctrine, firmly established in this state, that where there is no evidence, or a mere scintilla of evidence, or the evidence is not sufficient, in a just and reasonable view of it, to warrant an inference of any fact in issue, the court should not leave the issue to be passed upon by the jury, but should direct a verdict against the party upon whom the burden of proof rests. And Judge Gaston thus stated the rule in Cobb v. Fogalman, 23 N. C. 440:

"Although the boundary between a defect of evidence and evidence confessedly slight be not easily drawn in practice, yet it cannot be doubted that what raises but a possibility or conjecture [as to the existence] of a fact never can amount to evidence of it."

See Crenshaw v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 320, 56 S. E. 947; Wittkowsky v. Wasson, supra; State v. Powell, 94 N. C. 968; State v. Satterfield, 121 N. C. 558, 28 S. E. 491; Jewell v. Parr, 13 C. B. (76 E. C. L.) 916; Ryder v. Wombwell, L. R. 4 Exch. 32.

This rule is not intended, as said by Justice Douglas in Spruill v. Insurance Co., supra, to interfere with the rightful province of the jury to pass upon the weight of the evidence, but it assumes that the determination of its "character and legal effect" belongs to the court, and requires that this preliminary question be first decided before the evidence is submitted to the jury. The sufficiency of proof in law is for the court; the moral weight of legally sufficient proof is for the jury. The rule, as to the legal sufficiency of evidence, is not only well established, but of practically universal application, and under it we cannot perceive how any evidence was produced by the state,

In this case, to convict the defendant. There was circumstantial evidence, it is true, that somebody was illegally operating a still at a place between one-half and three-quarters of a mile from defendant's home, but not on his premises. Old and unused stills and a still worm were found in the neighborhood, and a jug with a cupful of liquor in it was discovered some distance from his house; but none of the witnesses did or could state that any one of the said articles was on defendant's land. There was a path leading from the still to a road, which was intersected by the railroad, and the road passed near the defendant's home; but both path and road were used by the public generally. The few other circumstances do not add anything to the probative force of the testimony. No connection or relation whatever was shown between the operation of the still and the circumstances, or any of them, to which we have referred. We are left to guess or speculate as to whether the defendant was, in fact, running the still, or assisting in the operation of it. There is absolutely no legal evidence to prove that fact, which, of course, must be established by the state before he can be convicted. We considered a case somewhat like this one at this term, and affirmed the conviction; but there other proof was introduced which tended to identify the defendant as the guilty person, or one of those who operated the still. As we said in Foy v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. at page 598, (68 S. E. 8):

"The evidence is too vague and uncertain, and lacks the probative force which entitles it to be considered by the jury."

The testimony in State v. Brackville, 106 N. C. 701, 11 S. E. 284, was much stronger than that to be found in this case, and pointed to the defendant as the guilty person with far more certainty than does the testimony here, and yet the court held that it fell short of legal proof of the alleged crime, and should not have been submitted to the jury.

The case of State v. Turner, 171 N. C. 303, 88 S. E. 523, in some of its features was similar to the one in hand, though there was additional positive and direct testimony of guilt, and the court held that, but for the latter kind of evidence, the other would not be legally sufficient as the basis of a verdict.

The isolated facts as to the finding of the still and still worm and jug with the cupful of liquor in it, and the tomato beer, all off the defendant's premises, were really collateral to the issue, being distinct and independent offenses, not connected with the principal charge (even if there was any evidence that defendant was responsible for the articles being where they were), and are not regarded by the law as evidence of defendant's guilt. State v. Jeffries, 117 N. C. 727, 23 S. E. 163. Quite a different question was involved in State v. McMillan, 180 N. C. 741, 105 S. E. 403, and it is therefore not at all pertinent to this case. We have referred to the last two cases because they were cited by counsel, and to exclude the inference that they were overlooked.

The result is that the learned judge who resided at the trial should have granted the motion to nonsuit under the statute, and there was error in refusing to do so.

Reversed.

(182 N. C. 20)

BLANCHARD v. EDENTON PEANUT CO. (No. 21.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Trial  $\S$  165—Evidence considered in most favorable light for plaintiff on motion to nonsuit.

On a motion to nonsuit, the evidence should be considered in its most favorable light for plaintiff.

2. Accord and satisfaction  $\S$  11(2)—Acceptance of check, purporting to be in full settlement of claim, amounts to complete discharge thereof.

Under C. S.  $\S$  895, where amount of an account is in dispute and one party sends the other a check or makes a payment, clearly purporting to be in full settlement, and the other knowingly accepts it on such condition, this is a full discharge of the debt.

3. Accord and satisfaction  $\S$  27—Question whether check accepted in full settlement of account held for jury.

Unless the intention of the parties to an account as to whether the acceptance of a check sent by the debtor to the creditor should amount to a settlement in full is so clearly apparent as to admit of no doubtful inference or uncertain conclusion among men of fair, disinterested, and unbiased minds, the issue must be referred to a jury; the sending of a check to cover what the debtor claimed was the balance due not showing conclusively ipso facto that an accord and satisfaction was a condition annexed to its acceptance.

4. Witnesses  $\S$  37(1)—Testimony not destroyed because contradictory, its credibility only being affected.

The fact that a plaintiff's testimony is self-contradictory does not destroy his favorable testimony, but only affects its credibility.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; Allen, Judge.

Action by M. V. Blanchard against the Edenton Peanut Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract and loss of commissions growing out of the purchase and sale of certain peanuts during the year 1920.

Plaintiff contends that by agreement he purchased said peanuts as agent for defendant. There was ample evidence tending to show the existence of a contract between the parties and a breach thereof, but defendant pleads in bar a settlement by way of accord and satisfaction.

Plaintiff received from the defendant a statement of his account, accompanied by a check to cover the balance as shown upon said statement. This was not posted or mailed, but sent by one L. M. Blanchard, plaintiff's partner in the guano business. Touching the receipt and acceptance of said check the plaintiff testified as follows:

"I did not accept this check in full settlement of the accounts due me. The statement shown me is the one I received along with the check. [Statement was offered in evidence and bears the notation: "We inclose check to cover."] Mr. L. M. Blanchard handed it to me and said: 'Here is what they sent you. I don't know what it is; take it.' I did not know they claimed it to be in full at that time. There is nothing on the face of the check showing or saying that it is in full.

"Q. You knew that they claimed it was in full of the balance that they claimed was due you? A. That is what they claimed.

"Q. You knew that they claimed this check was to cover all that they owed you up to that date? A. Yes; that is what they claimed, that was all they claimed to owe me.

"Court: What do you mean by saying they claimed? A. No; I didn't know that was all they claimed then.

"Court: You didn't admit that the check was all, but you knew that was what they claimed it was? A. Yes; but I didn't think that was all they were going to pay me. I was satisfied they would pay me the remainder of it. I knew it was not my fees.

"Court: Did you know that they claimed that was in full at that time? A. No, I did not.

"Court: You knew that was what they claimed when L. M. Blanchard brought it to you? A. He handed it to me and said: 'Here is what they sent you.' I looked it over, and I think I remarked to him: 'This is not all they owe me.' I thought maybe they would send me some more.

"Court: You knew at the time that they claimed that was all that was due you, and you claimed it was not? A. Yes, sir."

At the close of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved for judgment as of nonsuit, which motion was allowed, and plaintiff appealed.

A. P. Godwin, of Gatesville, and Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] Considering the evidence in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, the accepted position on a motion to nonsuit, we think the question of settlement by way of accord and satisfaction sufficiently ambiguous to require the aid and verdict of a jury.

[2] Under a uniform construction of our statute, C. S. § 895, as announced in a long line of decisions, it is held with us that where two parties are in dispute as to the correct amount of an account, and one sends the other a check, or makes a payment, clearly purporting to be in full settlement of the claim, and the other knowingly accepts it upon such condition, this will amount to a full and complete discharge of the debt. Mercer v. Lumber Co., 173 N. C. 49, 91 S. E. 588; Aydlett v. Brown, 153 N. C. 334, 69 S. E. 243; Kerr v. Sanders, 122 N. C. 635, 29 S. E. 943, and numerous cases of like import. The law as it prevails in this jurisdiction is succinctly stated by Mr. Justice Hoke in Rosser v. Bynum & Snipes, 168 N. C. 340, 84 S. E. 393, as follows:

"It is well recognized that when, in case of a disputed account between parties, a check is given and received, clearly purporting to be in full or when such a check is given, and from the facts and attendant circumstances it clearly appears that it is to be received in full of all indebtedness of a given character, or all indebtedness to date, the courts will allow to such a payment the effect contended for"—citing a number of authorities, and this has been approved in the recent case of Supply Co. v. Watt, 181 N. C. 432, 107 S. E. 451.

The case of Ore Co. v. Powers, 130 N. C. 152, 41 S. E. 6, chiefly relied on by defendant, is not at variance with the rule above stated, nor is it more favorable to defendant's contention, for, as appears from the last paragraph of the opinion in that case, the check in question was sent in full settlement of account, and this condition was annexed to its acceptance. An examination of the original papers discloses this fact more clearly than is shown by the report as published.

[3] But it is equally well established that unless the intention of the parties, as gathered from the facts in evidence, is so clearly apparent as to admit of no doubtful inference or uncertain conclusion, among men of fair, disinterested, and unbiased minds, the issue must be referred to a jury. This position is well stated in Mercer v. Lumber Co., supra, as follows:

"It is the well-recognized principle here and elsewhere that when a dispute exists between two parties as to the amount of an account, and one sends another a check or makes a payment clearly purporting to be in full settlement of the claim, and the other knowingly accepts it, this will amount to an adjustment, and further action thereon is precluded. It is a question, however, of the intent of the parties, as expressed in their acts and statements at the time, and unless, on the facts in evidence, this intent is so clear that there could be no disagreement about it among men of fair minds, the issue must be decided by the jury."

In the case at bar, we do not think it appears unequivocally that the check was sent on condition that its acceptance should amount to a settlement in full, or as a complete discharge of the debt. This may be a permissible view to take of the evidence, but not necessarily the only one. The sending of the check to cover what the defendant claimed was the balance due on the account does not ipso facto show conclusively that an accord and satisfaction was the condition annexed to its acceptance. The ultimate fact can only be determined by a jury under proper instructions from the court.

[4] The contention that the plaintiff's testimony is self-contradictory, and that he should be held to his admissions, or bound by the hurtful parts thereof, cannot avail the defendant on the present record; for, conceding without deciding that such a conflict exists, still, under our decisions, this does not perforce destroy his favorable testimony, but only affects its credibility, which the jury alone may pass upon. Loggins v. Utilities Co., 181 N. C. 221, 106 S. E. 822; Christman v. Hilliard, 167 N. C. 4, 82 S. E. 949; Shell v. Roseman, 155 N. C. 90, 71 S. E. 86.

The judgment of nonsuit will be set aside, and the cause remanded for trial upon appropriate issues.

Reversed.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring). Concurring in all that Mr. Justice STACY has so clearly stated, the very great importance of the principle at issue, especially to farmers and all other shippers of produce, may justify some additional reasons being given. The mere sending of the statement of an account with check for the balance set out therein, accompanied by a statement, more or less explicit, that such sum is all that is due, will not of itself bind the sendee. There must be an explicit acceptance or agreement by the receiver that the account is assented to, and that the check is accepted in full. It is not the assertion of the sender, but the assent of the sendee, which makes the settlement. When the check on its face states that it is "in full," its use with the indorsement of the receiver is such acceptance, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation.

But the mere receipt of the statement of an account and the use of the check sent with it for the amount of the balance the sender alleges to be due is not an estoppel. This can be effected only by an acceptance of the check, or of the amount paid with a knowledge of the facts and an agreement that it is received in full, or by the retention of the account stated and check without objection for such length of time that the jury may infer as a fact that it was accepted as correct. Hawkins v. Long, 74 N. C. 781.

Indeed, at common law and up to chapter 178, Laws 1874-75, now C. S. § 895, the acceptance of a lesser amount in payment with full acknowledgment that it is in payment of a larger amount was not valid. Fickey v. Merrimon, 79 N. C. 585. Since that statute a full and voluntary acceptance of a smaller amount in payment of a larger sum, voluntarily and with full knowledge of the facts, is binding as a settlement in the absence of fraud.

It would be a serious inconvenience and injustice to the farmers and the like, especially if the mere receipt of the account sales of produce, stating that the balance therein set out was all that was due, and the use of the checks sent therewith, should prevent the creditor from making claim thereafter that the statement was incorrect, or that the amount sent was less than it should have been, when there is no express acknowledgment by the recipient that the check was accepted in full payment. If this were not so the factor or commission merchant could force the consignor of produce to accept a lesser sum than was really due, by compelling him to lay out of the use of the entire sum due him from the sales of his crop until the matter was litigated, or otherwise adjusted.

Few commission merchants or other factors would attempt to force their consignors to accept their statements as true by sending checks stating on their face that they are "in full settlement," and certainly the law does not require that checks not so stating shall be accepted "in full settlement." Those words must be written in the face of the check, or there must be an express agreement that the check is accepted in full settlement, with full knowledge that it is a release of liability, or such lapse of time after receipt of the statement and check, without any objection, that the jury may infer acceptance of the balance as stated by the account as correct.

GUTHRIE v. MOORE et al. (No. 22.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Bills and notes  $\Leftrightarrow$  351—Mortgages  $\Leftrightarrow$  338
—Purchaser of past-due purchase-money notes takes with notice of maker's right to rely on agreement with vendor.

In view of C. S. § 446, where purchase-money notes secured by a deed of trust, under which a purchaser of the notes proposed to sell the lands so incumbered, were past due at the time of his purchase, he took them subject to any equities and defenses existing in favor of the land purchaser against the vendor, such as the latter's agreement that prior liens created by deeds of trust to secure notes executed by him should be discharged before the purchase-money notes should be valid obligations, and in such case the purchaser of the notes might be restrained from exercising the power of sale in the trust deed.

2. Mortgages — 338 — Exercise of power of sale not allowed where amount for which mortgagor liable is disputed.

Where there was a real dispute between the parties to a deed of trust as to the amount for which the maker was liable, an order, restraining the purchaser of notes secured thereby from exercising the power of sale in the trust deed, was properly continued until final hearing; the exercise of such a power being allowed only in plain cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Allen, Judge.

Action by F. F. Guthrie against D. O. Moore and others. From an order continuing an order restraining defendants from selling certain lands, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is an appeal from an order restraining the defendants from selling certain lands under powers contained in two deeds of trust.

On October 8, 1918, the defendant Fenner B. Godley and wife executed a deed of trust to E. A. Daniel, trustee for J. B. Patrick, upon a tract of land securing an indebtedness of $1,275, and on December 5, 1919, the said Godley executed a deed of trust to H. C. Carter, trustee for D. O. Moore, securing an indebtedness of $1,950.

On December 12, 1919, the defendant Fenner B. Godley and wife executed to the plaintiff a deed for the consideration of the sum of $10,000, $4,000 of which was to be paid in cash, and the balance of $6,000 to be secured by deed of trust, and 12 notes of $500 each were executed to represent said $6,000 balance. When the parties closed the said deal, the plaintiff had only $2,700 in cash, and executed a note due on January 1, 1920 (about two weeks later) for the sum of $1,300, representing the balance of the cash payment. Said note of $1,300, together with 4 or 5 of the notes for $500 each, were deposited with J. D. Grimes in escrow, and were to be turned over to said Godley, when the notes secured by the two deeds of trust to E. A. Daniel and H. C. Carter, above set out, were paid. This agreement was in writing. The said $1,300 note was not paid when it was due. During the fall of 1920 the defendant Moore purchased from the defendant Godley 12 of the notes of $500 each, and the note of $1,300, which said notes were secured by a deed of trust upon all of the property described in the two deeds of trust to Daniel and Carter, which deeds of trust provided that upon default in payment of any note or the interest on any note the whole debt should become due and payable.

On the 18th day of December, 1920, H. C. Carter, trustee for D. O. Moore, advertised under the deed of trust to him the lands therein described, and on the 11th day of January, 1921, E. A. Daniel advertised under the deed of trust from F. F. Guthrie, the plaintiff, to him. At the time of the advertisements, no part of either the principal or interest on any of the notes had been paid, and the whole, under the terms of the deed of trust, was then due. On January 21, 1921, the plaintiff secured a restraining order, and said restraining order was continued to the hearing at the February term, 1921, of the superior court of Beaufort county, and the defendants appealed.

Daniel & Carter, of Washington, N. C., for appellants.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] It is admitted in the brief of the defendants that the notes purchased by the defendant Moore and secured by one of the deeds of trust under which the defendants proposed to sell the lands in controversy were past due at the time of the purchase, and, this being true, the defendant took the notes subject to and with notice of any equities and defenses existing in favor of the plaintiff against Godley, who sold the notes to the defendant Moore (C. S. § 446; Capell v. Long, 84 N. C. 17), and as against Godley the plaintiff had the right to rely upon the agreement that the prior liens created by the deed of trust to secure the notes to Patrick and Moore should be paid off and discharged before all of the notes secured in the last deed of trust should be valid obligations against the plaintiff.

[2] It is also well settled that—

Powers of sale "are looked upon by the courts with extreme jealousy, because the mortgagor is thereby put entirely in the power of the mortgagee. The exercise of the power is only allowed in plain cases when there is no complication and no controversy as to the amount due upon the mortgage debt, and the power is given merely to avoid the expense of foreclosing the mortgage by action, but when there is such complication and controversy the court will interfere and require the foreclosure to be made under the direction of the court, after all the controverted matters have been adjusted and the balance due is fixed, so that the property may be brought to sale when purchasers will be assured of a title, and not be deterred by the idea that they are 'buying a lawsuit.'" Mosby v. Hodge, 76 N. C. 388.

It follows, therefore, as there was a real dispute between the parties as to the amount for which the plaintiff was liable, that the restraining order was properly continued until the final hearing.

Affirmed.

NOTE.—This opinion was written in accordance with the court's decision and filed by order of the court after Justice ALLEN'S death.

NEWTON v. NEWTON. (No. 60.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Evidence — 197—Writings are to be submitted to jury for comparison of handwriting.

Under Laws 1913, c. 52 (C. S. § 1784), the admission of testimony as to the genuineness of a writing by comparison of handwriting is now on the same basis as the declarations of agents, and the court determines whether there is prima facie evidence of agency, or of the genuineness of a writing admitted as a basis of comparison, and then the testimony of the witnesses and the writings themselves are submitted to the jury.

2. Appeal and error — 1056(2) — Refusal to permit jury to compare handwriting harmless.

Though it was error for the court in a divorce case to refuse to permit a letter claimed to have been written by defendant and defendant's admitted signature to the answer to be submitted to the jury for their inspection along with testimony of witnesses, under Laws 1913, c. 52 (C. S. § 1784), it was not reversible error, where the letter, if genuine, did not tend to prove any fact or circumstance in issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by Thomas B. Newton against Carrie Newton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

G. M. T. Fountain & Son, and Donnell Gilliam, all of Tarboro, for appellant.

Allsbrook & Phillips, of Tarboro, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. A letter purporting to be from the defendant was offered as competent evidence against her, as tending to show the misconduct alleged. Its genuineness being denied, the judge admitted witnesses to compare the signature and handwriting of the letter with the defendant's signature to the answer, which she admitted to be genuine, but refused to permit the writings to be submitted to the jury for their inspection.

In Outlaw v. Hurdle, 46 N. C. 150, the court held that, while witnesses can testify to the genuineness of the handwriting by comparison with other papers admitted, or proved, to be genuine, the jury must pass upon its genuineness upon the testimony of witnesses, holding:

"Writings are not properly submitted to a jury's inspection. * * * As a general rule, all evidence is addressed to the hearing of the jury and not to their sight."

In Tunstall v. Cobb, 109 N. C. 321, 14 S. E. 29, the court said:

"In North Carolina it seems to be settled law that an expert in the presence of the jury may be allowed to compare the disputed paper with other papers in the case, whose genuineness is not denied, and also with such papers as the party whose handwriting gives rise to the controversy is estopped to deny the genuineness of, or concedes to be genuine, but no comparison by the jury is permitted. Pope v. Askew, 1 Iredell, 16; Outlaw v. Hurdle, 1 Jones, 150; Otey v. Hoyt, 3 Jones, 407; Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 142; Fuller v. Fox, 101 N. C. 119."

And this has continued to be the settled law in this state. See cited cases to Tunstall v. Cobb in the Anno. Ed. But a recent statute (chapter 52, Laws 1913, now C. S. § 1784) has provided:

"In all trials in this state, when it may otherwise be competent and relevant to compare handwritings, a comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the Judge to be genuine, shall be permitted to be made by witnesses, and such writings and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the Court and jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute, provided, this shall not apply to" actions pending on March 5, 1913.

The last line is an unequivocal declaration of change in the rule obtaining theretofore.

[1] As we understand the statute, the admission of testimony as to the genuineness of a writing by comparison of handwriting is now on the same basis as the declarations of agents. The court determines whether there is prima facie evidence of agency or of the genuineness of writing admitted as a basis of comparison, and then the testimony of the witnesses, and the writings (in the plural) themselves are submitted to the jury. It is fair to the presiding judge to say that this statute was not called to his attention. It was adverted to by Walker, J., in Bank v. McArthur, 168 N. C. 55, 84 S. E. 39, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1054, though the disputed writing in that case did not come within the statute.

[2] Though it was error to exclude the writings from the jury, if the testimony was competent and pertinent, it was not reversible error in this instance; for we are of opinion that the letter, if genuine, was irrelevant, not tending to prove any fact or circumstance in issue, and the refusal to submit the writing to the jury to determine its genuineness was harmless error.

Upon the whole case we see no error of which the plaintiff can complain.

No error.

SASSER v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R.
R. et al. (No. 117.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

Railroads  $\Leftarrow$  446(12)—Nonsuit properly directed against owner leaving team of mules unhitched and unattended.

Nonsuit held properly directed, plaintiff's evidence showing that his team of mules, left unhitched and unattended, turned without apparent cause and went onto the railroad track about 50 feet away, where they were struck by a train, and that the train could not have been stopped within the time between their turning and being hit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Alex Sasser against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad and W. D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Simpkins and Hood & Hood, all of Goldsboro, for appellant.

E. M. Land, of Goldsboro, and O. H. Guion, of New Bern, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to a mule and wagon. The plaintiff's servant had driven the team, consisting of two mules and a wagon, to a place in front of a garage in Mt. Olive, and left them there unhitched and unattended, and went into the garage for a minute or so. While he was in there, the mules, without any apparent cause, such as fright, turned around and went across the railroad track, and as the mules stopped they were struck by a passing train. One of the mules was killed, and the wagon was broken.

A witness for the plaintiff testified that if the engineer or fireman had seen the action of the mules as they turned with the wagon, and stopped the train as quickly as they could do so, it would not have prevented the collision, "as they could not have stopped the train from the time the mules turned around and the train hit them." The mules were only 50 feet from the track, that being the width of the street on the west side. The driver did not stay in the garage more than a minute, and when he came out it had all happened. The evidence, which was all introduced by the plaintiff, tended to show that the train could not have been stopped in time to have prevented the accident. The judge, on motion of defendant, nonsuited the plaintiff, and dismissed the action under the statute, and plaintiff appealed.

After careful consideration of the evidence and the argument of counsel, we conclude that there was no evidence upon which the plaintiff could have asked for a verdict, and therefore that the judgment of nonsuit was proper. The sole, efficient, and proximate cause of the alleged injury was the negligence of the plaintiff's servant in leaving the mules unhitched, and their turning around and crossing the railroad so suddenly. Needham v. Railroad, 171 N. C. 763, 88 S. E. 495. The plaintiff is wholly to blame for his own misfortune, and must therefore bear the loss.

TYRRELL COUNTY et al. v. HOLLOWAY
et al. (No. 13.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Statutes  $\Leftarrow$  34(1)—Change in county government may be by local act.

The power given to the Legislature by Const. art. 7, § 14, to modify, change, or abrogate any and all provisions of the article, and substitute others in their place, need not be exercised by an act general in its operation, or formally abrogating a section of the article and substituting another in its stead; but it is enough that an act makes a change in county government, as by abolishing the office of county treasurer and providing for appointment of a bank as a depository to do the duties of county treasurer, and this though the act applies to certain counties only.

2. Constitutional law  $\Leftarrow$  63(3) — Legislative power to change county government may be delegated to county commissioners.

The power of the Legislature under Const. art. 7, § 14, to make changes in the Constitution as to county government, may be delegated to the board of county commissioners, as it is by C. S. § 1389, authorizing such boards of certain counties to abolish the office of county treasurer and appoint banks to perform the duty of treasurer.

3. Mandamus  $\Leftarrow$  100—Lies to compel ex-treasurer to turn over money to successor.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a county treasurer, whose office has been abolished, to turn over to the banks appointed to perform his duties the money which he admits that he received as such officer, but which he claimed right to hold and disburse, under claim that the office has not been abolished.

4. Mandamus  $\Leftarrow$  170 — When to require ex-county treasurer to turn over money pursuant to statute, heard by judge.

Mandamus to compel an ex-county treasurer to turn over public funds, pursuant to requirements of statutes directly applicable, is not a suit on a money demand, within C. S. § 867, requiring the summons to be returnable to term, and that it be proceeded with as in ordinary civil actions, wherein the material issues must be determined by jury unless formally waived; but it comes under section 868, providing for return of the summons before the judge, in chambers or in term, and that he shall determine all issues of law and fact, unless a jury trial is demanded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Allen, Judge.

Action by Tyrrell County and others against S. J. Holloway and others. From an adverse judgment, defendant Holloway and his surety appeal. No error.

The action is in the nature of mandamus to compel the defendant S. J. Holloway to turn over to two banks, the lawfully designated depositaries made parties of record, the public funds of the county, which plaintiffs aver and offered proof to show, had come into the hands of said defendant while treasurer of said county, and which he wrongfully refuses to deliver. Plaintiffs further allege, and offered evidence tending to show, that said office of treasurer had been lawfully abolished by resolution of the Commissioners, and the two banks referred to duly designated as depositaries to act as treasurer without charge, etc., and that defendant continued to withhold the funds, claiming that he was still the lawful treasurer of the county. There was a preliminary order issued, restraining said defendant from other and further disposition of said funds, which was returnable at said term, and which, on proof submitted, was heard at the same term as the principal cause. Defendant admitted that he had received the county funds in controversy while treasurer of the county, and claimed the right to hold and disburse on allegation and evidence tending to show that the office had not been abolished, and that said defendant was still county treasurer, and as such had control and lawful disposition of same. His honor, having heard the case, entered the following judgment:

"This cause coming now to be heard at Columbia, N. C. on April 25, 1921, according to continuances upon motion in this cause, and being heard upon the evidence taken and affidavits filed, the court finds:

"That the board of county commissioners on the 5th day of April, 1920, abolished the office of treasurer of Tyrrell county, to take effect the 1st of December, 1920, and elected the two banks at Columbia, the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank and the Tyrrell County Bank, as its financial agents, to act as its treasurer, upon giving bond and without compensation. That on Monday, the 6th day of December, 1920, being the first Monday in December, the new board of county commissioners, which was elected in November, 1920, at the November election, duly qualified and passed resolutions abolishing the office of treasurer of Tyrrell county, and elected the said two banks as the financial agents, and to act as treasurer for the said county without compensation, and the said banks duly accepted on the said 6th day of December, 1920, and tendered their bonds. That the bonds were accepted, except the bond for the county road fund, and a question having arisen as to whether the money should be paid to the treasurer of the county or to the treasurer of the highway commission of the county, the question was referred to the Attorney General, and the bonds for these amounts were not accepted until January 8, 1921, which was the next meeting of the board of said commissioners, and that this bond was accepted at that time. That the two banks have been acting as financial agents and treasurer of Tyrrell county ever since the 6th day of December, 1920. That the said S. J. Holloway did not tender any bond on the first Monday in December, 1920, as treasurer of the county, and has not at any time since, and has not paid over to the county the moneys in his hands belonging to the said county, nor to either of its financial agents as required by law.

"The court finds that the defendant S. J. Holloway is not the treasurer of Tyrrell county; that he has not settled with the said county, and has in his hands a large sum of money belonging to the said county; that it is his duty to pay over the same to the duly elected and qualified financial agents of said county, to wit, the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank and the Tyrrell County Bank; and that they have been elected and qualified.

"It is ordered, decreed, and adjudged that the defendant S. J. Holloway pay over to the said Merchants' & Farmers' Bank one-half of all moneys which are due to the county by the said Holloway, and the other half to the Tyrrell County Bank, and that he be and is hereby enjoined and restrained from paying out any moneys belonging to the said county, or its financial agents, except as set out above, and enjoined and restrained from acting as said treasurer.

"It is further ordered and adjudged that he pay over to the Tyrrell County Bank the half of all the moneys due to it as said financial agent of said Tyrrell County on or before the 15th day of July, 1921.

"It is further adjudged that the said S. J. Holloway enter into a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $50,000 for the faithful compliance with the above order, and that he pay over and account to the said banks, as set out above, the said moneys due to them as financial agents of said county.

"It is further adjudged that the defendant Merchants' & Farmers' Bank execute a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $50,000 for the faithful handling of the moneys described in the pleadings in this cause, and to account for any and all of the moneys referred to in this proceeding that may come into its hands, or should come into its hands, and that it will faithfully account to the plaintiff for said moneys.

"It is further adjudged that the defendants pay the cost of this proceeding and that this restraining order continue to the hearing."

Defendant and his surety, also defendant, excepted and appealed.

Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, and R. W. Winston, of Raleigh, for appellants. Aydlott & Simpson, of Elizabeth City, and W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, for appellees.

HOKE, J. In section 1389, c. 28, Consolidated Statutes, it is provided that the board of county commissioners of Tyrrell and certain other counties therein specified may abolish the office of county treasurer by resolution to that effect, passed at least 60 days before a primary or convention, held for the purpose of nominating candidates for said office, and when so abolished the board of commissioners may appoint one or more solvent banks or trust companies to perform the duties of treasurer or sheriff acting as ex-officio treasurer of the county, such designated depositaries not being allowed to charge or receive anything in compensation other than the advantages accruing to them from such a deposit; and said banks and trust companies, termed financial agents, are also required to give bond for safe keeping, and proper disbursement of said funds, and for faithful performance of their duties concerning them. Acting under this statute, the commissioners of Tyrrell county, by formal resolution passed in apt time, have abolished the office of county treasurer and designated the banks to act as financial agents of the county, who have duly accepted and qualified, and if these proceedings are valid, we find no good reason for disturbing the judgment of his honor as it appears of record.

[1] The only objection against the propriety of this judgment urged before us on the oral argument, and the original brief filed in behalf of the appellant is that the office of treasurer being one provided for in the Constitution, may not be abolished except by direct legislative action, and the attempt to vest such power in the board of commissioners of any county may not be upheld. It is true that article 7, § 1, of the Constitution, provides in terms that for the ordinary purposes of general county government there shall be elected biennially a treasurer, register of deeds, and five commissioners; but it is also provided in the same article (section 14) that as to this and all other sections of the article, except sections 7, 9, and 13, neither of which have any bearing on the question presented here, the General Assembly shall have full power by statute to modify, change, or abrogate any and all the provisions of this article, and substitute others in their place. In reference to the power conferred in section 14, it has been frequently held and is now the accepted construction that, in order to its exercise, it is not required that an act to effect a change in municipal government should be "general in its operation, or that it should in terms formally abrogate any given section of this article, and substitute another in its stead, but that an act of the General Assembly making such change, and local in its operation, must be given effect under this provision if otherwise valid." Smith v. School Trustees, 141 N. C. at page 157, 53

S. E. 529, citing Harriss v. Wright, 121 N. C. 179, 28 S. E. 269.

[2] This being the established position, the Legislature, under approved principles, in our opinion, had the undoubted right to confer the exercise of the power referred to in section 14 upon the board of county commissioners of Tyrrell county, and said board, proceeding properly under the act, having formally abolished said office, the judgment of his honor must be upheld. While legislative power granted by the Constitution may not as a rule be delegated, it is fully recognized that under our system of government such power may be delegated to municipal corporations for local purposes, where as agencies of the state they are possessed and in the exercise of governmental powers in designated portions of the state territory, whether such localities are the ordinary political subdivisions of the state or local governmental districts created for special and quasi public purposes. Trustees v. Webb, 155 N. C. 379, 71 S. E. 520; Smith v. School Trustees, 141 N. C. 143-149, 53 S. E. 524, 8 Ann. Cas. 529; State v. Austin, 114 N. C. 855, 19 S. E. 919, 25 L. R. A. 283, 41 Am. St. Rep. 817; People of N. Y. ex rel. Dunn v. Ham, 166 N. Y. 477, 60 N. E. 191; State and Josephine Taintor v. Mayor, etc., 33 N. J. Law, 57; 1 Smith, Modern Law of Municipal Corporations; 1 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 101; Black's Constitutional Law (3d Ed.) p. 373. In the citation to Cooley, the principle is stated as follows:

"There is, nevertheless, one clearly defined exception to the rule that the Legislature shall not delegate any portion of its authority. The exception, however, is strictly in harmony with the general features of our political system, and it rests upon an implication of popular assent which is conclusive. This exception relates to the case of municipal corporations. Immemorial custom, which tacitly or expressly has been incorporated in the several state Constitutions, has made these organizations a necessary part of the general machinery of state government, and they are allowed large authority in matters of local government, and to a considerable extent are permitted to make the local laws."

And in Black, at page 374, the author says:

"Municipal corporations are regarded as subordinate agencies of government, created with a view to the more judicious and effective administration of local governmental affairs. The Legislature has power to create such corporations, and to invest them with such powers and prerogatives as are necessary to enable them to make rules for the government of their own affairs, particularly in matters of taxation and police, provided that their by-laws and ordinances shall not be inconsistent with the general laws of the state."

[3, 4] The case before us comes clearly within the principle, and the commissioners of Tyrrell county were well within their powers in the abolition of the office. And the defendant admitting that he received the public funds of the county while he was the treasurer, and insisting on the right to hold and disburse them under a claim that the office has not been abolished and that he has them as of official right, the authorities are to the effect that mandamus is the appropriate procedure. O'Donnell v. Dusman, 39 N. J. Law, 677; State ex rel. Meinger, Collector, v. Disbrow, Late Collector, 42 N. J. Law, 141; State v. Oates, 86 Wis. 634, 57 N. W. 296, 39 Am. St. Rep. 912; 26 Cyc. p. 258, and authorities cited in note 40; 18 R. C. L. title "Mandamus," §§ 120, 186. And it appearing from a perusal of the record that this is an action to enforce the turning over the public funds of Tyrrell county pursuant to the requirement of the statutes directly applicable (C. S. c. 26, § 1400, chapter 62, §§ 3205 and 3206, and chapter 82, § 4385), the case presented is not in strictness a suit on a moneyed demand, coming under section 867, C. S., and which requires that the summons be returnable to term, and to be proceeded with as in the ordinary civil actions, wherein the material issues must be determined by jury unless formally waived, but it comes under the subsequent section 868, C. S., which provides that the summons may be returnable before the judge, in chambers or in term, and he shall determine all issues of law and fact, unless a jury trial is demanded by one or both of the parties. Coleman v. Coleman, 148 N. C. 299, 62 S. E. 415; Audit Co. v. McKensie, 147 N. C. 461, 61 S. E. 283; Martin v. Clark, 135 N. C. 178, 47 S. E. 397.

In the present case, no demand was made for a jury trial by any of the parties, no exception was entered because same was not allowed, nor by exception or otherwise was any objection made to the mode of trial in the oral argument before us nor in any brief as then filed. In a brief filed by one of defendants some 15 days later, and by consent, objection is made that there are disputed questions of fact presented in the affidavits and evidence; but these are only as to differences arising at the hearing, and no demand is therein shown or claimed that any jury trial was claimed on any material issues arising on the pleadings.

There is no error, and this will be certified, that the funds of the county, admitted to be in the hands of defendant Hollaway, shall be forthwith delivered to the financial agents of the county, and that the amounts in dispute be so delivered when determined in accordance with law and the course and practice of the court, and the restraining order in the meantime be continued as directed in the judgment.

No error.

JENNINGS v. JENNINGS et al. (No. 14.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Contracts $\Rightarrow$ 130—Contract held not void as stifling bidding at sale.

Contract that, if plaintiff would raise bid on certain land at a partition sale, he would get a share of any higher bid which might be made, is not void as stifling competition and chilling bidding, since the purpose and tendency of the contract was to increase the bids at the sale.

2. Contracts $\Rightarrow$ 312(1)—Sale of bid on land held a breach of the purpose of the contract to secure highest bid for land.

Where defendant contracted that plaintiff, in return for raising the bid on land, should receive a share of higher bids, and the latter, after making a higher bid, to prevent a still higher one sold his own to the person intending to raise the bid, he is guilty of breach of contract, and cannot recover the stipulated share.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Allen, Judge.

Action by G. C. Jennings against W. H. Jennings and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. New trial granted.

This is an action to recover an amount alleged to be due by contract in connection with a sale of certain lands in a partition proceeding. The lands belonged to the wife of the defendant A. C. Bell, and to a minor son of the defendant W. H. Jennings, in equal parts, and was sold for division in said proceeding on October 11, 1919, R. G. Sawyer being the highest bidder in the sum of $10,250. On the 31st day of October, 1919, it being the last day on which an increased bid on said land could be made, the plaintiff and defendant entered into the following agreement:

"I hereby agree with G. C. Jennings that if he will raise the bid of $10,250 made on the R. Nixon Morgan Farm 10%, making his bid $11,275, that in the event other bona fide bidders should run the price up to $12,050 to refund to him the $725 raise, so as to make the property cost him only $11,275; in consideration of getting him to raise the bid.

"Should said bona fide bidders run the price above $12,050, and it is knocked off to a responsible bidder other than the said G. C. Jennings, then he, the said G. C. Jennings, is to have one-half of such raise above his bid of $11,275 when the sale is confirmed and the purchase money paid over in full.

"Should a bidder run up the price on said G. C. Jennings to $13,000 or $13,050, and it is knocked off to the said G. C. Jennings, then he is only to pay $11,775 for the property.

"[Signed] W. H. Jennings.
"G. C. Jennings."

The plaintiff raised the bid as above stated, and the agreement made on October 31, 1919, Exhibit A, was abrogated and a new alleged agreement entered into between plaintiff and both defendants, reading as follows:

"November 11, 1919.

"Whereas, G. C. Jennings raised the bid on the R. Nixon Morgan farm from $10,250 to $11,275 on October 31, 1919, and is now desirous of being protected in further bids for the property:

"We hereby agree with him that he is to have one-half of the raised bids from his present bid of $11,275 up to $12,075, and one-third of the raise of bids from $12,075 up to the highest bid at the sale to be made at 12 o'clock noon on Monday, November 17, 1919. The agreement made on October 31, 1919, is hereby declared null and void in so far as it refers to the bidding.

"This agreement is strictly a private memorandum, nonnegotiable, and is to be kept strictly confidential by all the signers hereto, so as to protect the said G. C. Jennings in his future bids at the sale.

"[Signed] W. H. Jennings.

"A. C. Bell.

"G. C. Jennings."

At the resale on November 17, 1919, the plaintiff was the last and highest bidder at the price of $11,830.00, and he is now seeking to recover in this action under the last agreement one-half of the difference between the first bid by him of $11,275 and the last bid of $11,830, or $277. Thereafter the plaintiff sold his bid to H. C. Ferrell for $650 without giving any information to the defendants of any offer to buy the bid, or that the said Ferrell intended to increase the bid. F. C. Ferrell testified:

"I am the present owner of the property called the Nixon Morgan property, and mentioned in the papers which have been offered in evidence, having bought the bid made by plaintiff for the land. I was not present at the first sale. I wanted the property, and after the second sale employed a lawyer, Mr. P. G. Sawyer, to endeavor to purchase from G. C. Jennings the bid he had offered at the second sale. Mr. Sawyer and I tried to buy the bid from him, and finally I did buy it, and got him to assign his bid to me by paying him $650 for it. I did not know he had any agreements with defendants about the matter. He did not tell me so. I had made arrangements to raise the bid, had arranged to get the money, and was able and prepared to do so. If he had not sold his bid I would have raised it, and told him I was going to do."

P. G. Sawyer testified:

"After the second sale Mr. H. C. Ferrell employed me as attorney to try to buy Jennings bid for him. We arranged for Ferrell to get the money and he was able and prepared to buy. I saw the plaintiff and tried to buy his bid, and told him if he did not sell Mr. Ferrell was going to raise the bid on him. He sold to Ferrell."

The following issues were submitted to the jury:

"(1) Are the defendants indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what sum? A. $277.50.

"(2) Is the plaintiff indebted to the defendants, and, if so, in what sum? A. Nothing."

His honor instructed the jury that if they found the facts to be as testified by the witnesses they would answer the first issue "$277.50," and the second issue "Nothing," and the defendants excepted.

There was a judgment on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed.

Thompson & Wilson, of Elizabeth City, for appellants.

Ehringhaus & Small, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The contract on which the action is founded is of doubtful wisdom and propriety. It does not, however, fall under the principle that contracts which stifle competition and chill bidding, so that property may be bought for less than its true value are void (Nash v. Hospital Co., 180 N. C. 63, 104 S. E. 33), because the whole purpose and tendency of the contract was to increase and enhance the bids at the sale, but it is close akin to the employment of by-bidders, which is violative of the implied guaranty that all bids at public sales are genuine, and which may enable the purchaser, who acts promptly, to be relieved from his bid. 16 R. C. L. 71; Corpus Juris, 830 et seq.

No other bidder is, however, complaining, and therefore, assuming the contract to be valid as between the parties, who have not been moved by any fraudulent purpose, and have received direct benefits from the contract, there is still a view presented by the evidence which, in our opinion, ought to be submitted to a jury.

[2] The contract was made for the purpose of securing the highest price for the land obtainable at a public sale, and the plaintiff was required to perform his obligations in good faith, and would not be permitted to prevent a sale at which a higher sum would be bid, which is the very object the contract had in view, and then claim benefits under the contract. He acquired the position of advantage as a bidder, and the right to sell his bid under the contract, and he could not defeat the only purpose which caused its execution, and then seek to recover on it, as no principle is better settled than that a party suing upon a contract must show performance.

If the evidence of the defendant is to be believed, the plaintiff knew that, if he did not sell his bid, there would be an increased bid on the property by one who was ready, able, and willing to pay the advanced bid, and that this would inure to the benefit of the defendants under the contract, and instead of informing the defendants he made a private arrangement to sell his bid, and the sale was confirmed without knowledge on the part of the defendants of the agreement between the plaintiff and Ferrell.

There was therefore error in the peremptory instructions given to the jury, and there must be a new trial.

New trial.

NOTE.—This opinion was written in accordance with the court's decision and filed by order of the court, after Justice ALLEN'S death.

In re FOUNTAIN. (No. 50.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Contempt §66(7)—On appeal findings of fact held not reviewable.

On an appeal in contempt proceedings from an inferior court, findings of fact are reviewable, but not where the appeal is from the superior court.

2. Contempt §28(1)—Denial of intention to show contempt of court in assaulting juror, not in the presence of the court, held no defense to proceedings for indirect contempt.

Where defendant, during the term of court, but not in the presence of the court, assaulted a juror because of an adverse verdict, a denial of intention to show contempt of court is no defense under C. S. § 984, since the crime does not consist of intention to show contempt, but intention to do the acts constituting a contempt.

3. Contempt §14—Assault on juror not in presence of court, coupled with abusive language, held sufficient to found proceedings for indirect contempt.

Although no battery was committed, an assault on a juror for returning a verdict adverse to defendant, by threatening gestures and abusive language, is sufficient, under C. S. § 984, to constitute an indirect contempt of court, as tending "to impede and hinder the proceedings of the court and to impair the respect and authority for the proceedings of the court."

4. Contempt §66(1)—Defendant in contempt proceedings is entitled to an appeal.

In contempt proceedings defendant is entitled to an appeal, but if he were not his remedy would be by habeas corpus and certiorari, if necessary, from the Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Calvert, Judge.

Contempt proceedings against L. E. Fountain. Respondent was convicted of indirect contempt, not in presence of the court, and appeals. No error.

The judge finds as facts that at November term, 1921, of said county the case of

"L. E. Fountain against Calvin Jones" was called for trial on Thursday of the first week (it being a two-week term), and the verdict was rendered on the following day; that Raeford Liles was a talis juror, and after the verdict had been returned he was discharged from further service as a juror; that about an hour or two after the return of the verdict in said cause, and after said talis juror had been discharged from further service, he was met on the street by the plaintiff in the action, L. E. Fountain, "who accosted him, using abusive and insulting language towards him and the other jurors in the case because of the verdict they had rendered, and committed an assault upon the said Liles." The matter was brought to the attention of the court during that term, who thereupon issued a rule against the said Fountain which was not served because of his absence from town until after the said court had adjourned for the term, and was continued by reason of such failure; the March term was a criminal term, and this matter was not reached, but at the April term it was called up, and a new rule to show cause was issued by the judge holding that term, requiring the respondent to appear to answer the rule, which he did in person and by counsel, and—

"upon the hearing then had the court makes these further findings of fact: About an hour or two after court adjourned for the day on which a verdict was rendered the respondent (L. E. Fountain) accosted the said Raeford Liles, using abusive and insulting language towards him, and of and concerning him, and the other jurors in the case, and committed an assault upon him, the said Liles, and that this talis juror Liles that same afternoon informed one, Daniel Harris, who was then a regular juror, and served as such the following day, that the acts and conduct of the said respondent, L. E. Fountain, did tend to impede and impair the respect and authority for the proceedings of the court; and the court finds that the respondent has been guilty of contempt of the court, and so adjudges L. E. Fountain, respondent, to be in contempt of court, and adjudges that he pay a fine of $100 and the costs of this proceeding.

"Thomas H. Calvert, Judge Presiding."

The respondent excepted to the foregoing findings of fact and the judgment of the court.

G. M. T. Fountain & Son, of Tarboro, for appellant.

The Attorney General and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. This is a proceeding for indirect contempt, under C. S. § 984, by conduct impeding and impairing the respect due to, and the authority of, the court, by abusing and assaulting a juror. Such conduct occurred during the term of the court, but not in the immediate presence of the court.

The court held In re Gorham, 129 N. C. 485, 40 S. E. 311, that in a proceeding as for contempt in attempting to influence a juror, the findings of fact by the trial judge, if there is any evidence, cannot be reviewed on appeal, and that the respondent can purge himself only where the intention is the gravamen of the offense. Baker v. Cordon, 86 N. C. 116, 41 Am. Rep. 448. Here there is evidence, and the offense was in the act, and not in the intention.

In this case, moreover, there was slight divergence between the evidence for the state and the respondent, and there was ample evidence to justify the findings of fact by the court. While the respondent denies attempting to strike the juror Liles, he does not deny the abusive and threatening language as to him and the other jurors on account of the verdict they rendered against him. Said juror testified that, when the respondent upon the recess of the court met him and began cursing and abusing him and the rest of the jury who had sat on the case, using profane and vile expressions, he started to walk away from said Fountain, but the latter continued to walk beside him, cursing and abusing him and all members of the jury, and repeatedly raised his hand and shook it in his face, continuing to threaten and abuse both affiant and all other members of the jury, talking in an angry and vehement manner and threatening him so that the affiant had to walk away from him, being an old man 70 years of age, to avoid a battery upon him, and walked into the lot of an adjacent stable to avoid personal encounter and fistcuff, as he thought the said Fountain was going to strike him, and he was actually put in fear, and that this was before the court had adjourned for the term, and about two hours after the affiant had been discharged as a juror.

[1] There was also an affidavit by the deputy sheriff that he was unable at that term of the court to serve the rule upon said Fountain, though his residence and place of business was in Tarboro, he absented himself from the county for the purpose of avoiding said officer or keeping himself concealed, to prevent service of said rule upon him. On an appeal in such proceedings from an inferior court, the findings of fact are reviewable, but it is otherwise when the appeal is from the superior court. In re Deaton, 105 N. C. 62, 11 S. E. 244.

The respondent does not deny the use of abusive language as stated by the juror as above, and says that he might have used gestures and raised his hand, but that he did not intend to assault him or put him in fear, and asserts he left town upon business.

In State v. Hampton, 63 N. C. 13, where the defendant in striking distance of the prosecutor, his arm being bent, but not drawn back, said to the prosecutor "I have a good mind to hit you." Whereupon the prosecutor walked away. It was held that the defendant was guilty of an assault.

But it was not necessary, indeed, that there should have been a battery upon the juror. This is not an indictment for such battery. It is sufficient if the juror was called in question in the manner above stated for the discharge of his official duty in rendering his verdict, for the court properly held that such conduct tended "to impede and hinder the proceedings of the court, and to impair the respect and authority for the proceedings of the court," and adjudged that the respondent had been guilty of contempt of the court. C. S. § 984.

[2] The defendant contends that he has purged himself of contempt by denying his intention to show contempt for the court. The question is not whether the respondent intended to show his contempt of the court, but whether he intentionally did the acts which were a contempt of the court. In re Parker, 177 N. C. 467, 99 S. E. 342.

[3] The adjustment of differences between parties or the investigation of conduct forbidden by law by legal tribunals, instead of by personal strength, marks the line between civilized government and barbarism. When the tribunals established for that purpose have investigated the matter at issue, or are investigating it, their action is to be respected and obeyed, and is subject to review only in the method provided by law.

In Ex parte McCown, 139 N. C. 95, 51 S. E. 957, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 603, there was a personal attack upon a judge during the recess of the court, and before it had actually adjourned, though the case on account of which the judge was attacked had been finally disposed of, and the court held that McCown was in contempt; that the right of the court to be protected in the discharge of its duty is an inherent power of which it could not be deprived, for Const. art. 4, § 12, provides:

"The General Assembly shall have no power to deprive the judicial department of any power or jurisdiction which rightfully pertains to it as a co-ordinate department of the government."

It is a most essential power, rightfully pertaining to the judicial department, that those administering it, whether judges or jurors, shall not be assaulted or intimidated by violent and threatening conduct from the untrammelled discharge of their duties, and this is as essential in regard to jurors who are a part of the court as it is to the judges.

There would be small assurance of the impartial and fearless administration of justice if the judges only are to be protected from such misconduct as is here shown, but the jurors who are much more liable to be thus called in question should be left to defend themselves by physical strength or by indictment or prosecution of the offenders.

In Re Brown, 168 N. C. 417, 84 S. E. 690, the court held that a newspaper criticism after the court had adjourned was personal to the judge, and not a matter of contempt. That case was rested upon the ground that the court had adjourned.

In the McCown Case, 139 N. C. at page 110, 51 S. E. at page 862, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 803, Judge Walker said:

"As courts can exercise judicial functions only through their judicial officers, an assault upon such officer because he has discharged a required duty is necessarily an attack upon the court for what it has done in the administration of justice."

That case holds that such conduct is direct contempt, and is constructively done in the presence of the court, and falls within subsection C. S. § 978 (1). Besides the able and full discussion of the whole matter in that case, see, also, State v. Little, 175 N. C. 743, 94 S. E. 680, in which it is held, Hoke, J., that the power of the court to attach for contempt includes in its protection all officers of the court, jurors, attorneys, and others, who in the line of their official duties are assisting the court in the dispatch of its duties, and all witnesses who are in attendance under subpoena. In that case the defendant in a criminal action had assaulted the state's witness before the trial, for the purpose of hindering or delaying the administration of justice, and he was held to be in direct contempt, and that the respondent had no right of appeal, or to demand trial by jury, or to demand that his hearing be removed before another judge. Nothing could be added to the very full and careful discussion of the subject-matter in State v. Little.

[4] The respondent was entitled to an appeal (In re Parker, supra), but, if he were not, if his sentence were excessive or the jurisdiction was doubtful, his remedy was by habeas corpus proceedings and a certiorari, if necessary, from this court. In re Holley, 154 N. C. 163, 69 S. E. 872.

Disregarding, however, this phase of the case, we find in the judgment of the court in this case no error.

Appeal and error ⇐627(2)—Appeal dismissed, where record docketed long after expiration of proper term.

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Devin, Judge.

Action by the Corbett Buggy Company against Gethro McLamb and others, before a justice. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on appeal, and, from a judgment overruling the motion to set it aside, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

This was a motion, filed in the superior court, to set aside two judgments upon the ground of excusable neglect, and upon the further ground that they purported to be consent judgments; whereas, movants allege that said judgments were entered by their codefendant without authority from them and without their consent.

E. F. Young, of Dunn, for appellants McLamb.

L. J. Best and Clifford & Townsend, all of Dunn, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The judgment which forms the basis of this appeal was rendered at the November term, 1920, of Harnett superior court. The record was not docketed here until August 27, 1921, long after the term at which the case should have been heard had expired. Hence the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the appeal must be allowed. State v. Telfair, 139 N. C. 555, 51 S. E. 911.

Notwithstanding the motion to dismiss, we have examined the record, and have been unable to find any reason for disturbing the result below. Upon the merits, the case should be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

JONES v. BLAND et al. (No. 18.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⇐76—Unlawful act of person injured no bar.

The fact that a plaintiff at the time he suffers injury to his person and property from the negligence of the defendant was doing some unlawful act will not prevent a recovery unless the act was of such a character as would voluntarily tend to produce the injury.

2. Trial ⇐285—Charge considered and interpreted in reference to material facts.

A charge must be considered and interpreted in reference to the material facts submitted for a decision.

3. Innkeepers ⇐10—One who enters hotel for ulterior purpose and wanders into portion of building where he is not expected to go is a trespasser.

One who enters a hotel for an ulterior purpose and who goes beyond the scope and purpose of the invitation and wanders into some remote portion of the premises not covered by the invitation, where there is no reason to expect him to go, is not an invitee, toward whom the hotel proprietor is required to exercise the duty of ordinary care, but is a trespasser or mere licensee, whom the proprietor owes no duty except not to willfully or wantonly injure him.

4. Innkeepers ⇨10—One who entered hotel for purpose of gambling not an invitee, but a mere licensee or trespasser.

One who enters a hotel building by invitation of an inmate for the purpose of going to the room of such inmate to gamble is not an invitee, but a mere trespasser or licensee, toward whom the hotel proprietor owes no duty except not to willfully or wantonly injure him.

5. Innkeepers ⇨10—Evidence held to establish prima facie case of negligence.

In action against hotel keeper for injuries sustained in falling down elevator shaft, proof that plaintiff was an invitee, that he walked into an elevator shaft opening on the lobby, receiving injuries, that the door had been left open, and that by reason of the weather and other conditions the place was so dark that ordinary observation did not disclose the opening or absence of the elevator carriage, held to establish a prima facie case of negligence entitling plaintiff to recover without further proof that defendants knew that door had been left open or that it had remained open long enough for them, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have discovered it.

6. Negligence ⇨121(2)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine stated.

Where a thing which causes an injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the occurrence is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by defendant, that the accident arose from want of care.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Allen, Judge.

Action by M. M. Jones against T. L. Bland and others. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. New trial.

The action is to recover damages for the alleged negligence of T. L. Bland, proprietor of the Hotel Louise, and another, in leaving open the elevator shaft leading off the hotel lobby and into which plaintiff fell, receiving serious, painful, and enduring injuries. There was denial of liability and plea of contributory negligence on part of plaintiff. On the trial there was evidence tending to show that on the afternoon of January 23, 1918, about 3:30 p. m. plaintiff was invited into said Hotel Louise by W. B. Troy, a boarder at the hotel, and the two were going up to the room of said Troy on the fourth floor of the building; that it was a dark, cloudy day, the elevator being behind the stairs, shutting off much of the light that existed, and the elevator shaft from its placing and color of paint was such that plaintiff was unable to discern whether carriage was in place, and, believing it was, stepped into the open door, falling to cement floor of the basement, a distance of 9 to 11 feet, and causing painful and permanent injuries, from which he is still suffering and greatly hindered in his ability to work.

It was proved that the carriage of the elevator at the time was at one of the upper floors, where it had been taken by some one, and that the door on the lobby floor was open. It was also shown that Mr. Troy, the inmate of the hotel, had been sick and confined to the house for about a week, and there were facts on evidence permitting the inference that it was the purpose of Troy in calling plaintiff into the building and of the two in going to Troy's room to play cards for money at a fine of 10 cents limit, involving a loss of 25 or 50 cents, etc. There were submitted the three ordinary issues as to the negligence of defendant, contributory negligence of plaintiff, and damages, and, the court having charged the jury, there was verdict for defendant on the first issue. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appealed, assigning errors.

Daniel & Carter, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

Robert Ruark, of Wilmington, Small, MacLean, Bragaw & Rodman, of Washington, N. C., and Wm. B. Campbell, of Wilmington, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] It is earnestly urged for error that his honor charged the jury in part on the first issue that, if they should find that Jones and Troy were on the way to Troy's room for the purpose of playing cards for money, they should answer the first issue for defendants; the objection being that such unlawful purpose, even if established could in no legal sense be considered as the proximate or contributing cause of plaintiff's injury. As an abstract proposition, considered entirely apart from the proprietary rights of the defendant as owner and in the management of the property, the position embodied in this objection should be upheld. In Sutton v. Town of Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 21, 9 Am. Rep. 534, Chief Justice Dixon, in an opinion of great force and learning, approves and sustains the principle that "the fact that plaintiff, at the time he suffered injuries to his person or property from the negligence of defendant, was doing some unlawful act will not prevent a recovery, unless the act was of such a character as would naturally tend to produce the injury"; that is, unless the very unlawfulness of the act would have that tendency. And the principle so stated is fully recognized in this state as in accord with the better considered authorities on the subject. Ferrell v. Railroad, 172 N. C.

682, 90 S. E. 893, L. R. A. 1917B, 1291; McNeill v. Railroad, 135 N. C. 682, 47 S. E. 765, 67 L. R. A. 227; Waters v. Railroad, 110 N. C. 338, 14 S. E. 802, 16 L. R. A. 834; Watson on Damages for Personal Injuries, §§ 230-237.

[2, 3] A judge's charge, however, must be considered and interpreted in reference to the material facts submitted for his decision, and on this record it appears that defendant is the owner and proprietor of the hotel where the incident occurred, and plaintiff is insisting upon the position that he was there at the time on the invitation of a guest of the hotel, and has been injured in breach of the duty owed to one in that position. In the case suggested and without more it is very generally held that such a one, termed an invitee, is entitled to the duty of ordinary care from the proprietor and his employees, but the principle does not extend to a claimant who enters a hotel for an ulterior purpose, and who, going beyond the scope and purpose of the invitation, wanders into some remote portion of the premises not covered by the same, and where there is no reason to expect him to go. Under such circumstances, he loses the position of invitee and the privileges incident to it, and is to be considered trespasser or mere licensee, towards whom no duty is owing except not to willfully or wantonly injure him. Money v. Hotel Co., 174 N. C. 508, 93 S. E. 964, L. R. A. 1918B, 493; Monroe v. A. C. L. R. Co., 151 N. C. 374, 66 S. E. 315, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 193; Quantz v. Railroad, 137 N. C. 136, 49 S. E. 79; Glaser v. Rothschild, 221 Mo. 180, 120 S. W. 1, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1045, reported also in 17 Ann. Cas. 576; Ryerson v. Bathgate, 67 N. J. Law, 337, 51 Atl. 708, 57 L. R. A. 307; Reardon v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 267, 21 N. E. 369; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 31 N. E. 128, 32 Am. St. Rep. 463; Zoesbisch v. Tarbell, 10 Allen (Mass.) 385, 87 Am. Dec. 660. And the principle as stated should clearly prevail where under the guise of an invitee the claimant has entered or remains upon the premises for an unlawful purpose, assuredly so where the proprietor has no knowledge of such purpose and takes no part therein. McGhee v. Norfolk & S. R. Co., 147 N. C. 142, 60 S. E. 912, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 119; Newark Electric, etc., Light Co. v. Garden, 78 Fed. 74, 23 C. C. A. 649, 37 L. R. A. 725; 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 969.

In this last citation the position is stated as follows:

"The distinction is that the person coming on the premises to whom this duty of care is due must not come as a mere trespasser or wrongdoer, but for some purpose lawful in itself and such as the owner or occupier might reasonably expect to bring him there."

[4] As applied to the facts of this record, therefore, his honor correctly charged the jury that, if claimant was going to the room for the unlawful purpose of gambling, they should answer the issue as to defendant's negligence "No," and he gave the right reason for it; "for in such case there would be no duty owing to him except not to willfully or wantonly injure him." Emory v. Navigation & Water Power Co., 111 N. C. 94, 16 S. E. 18, 17 L. R. A. 699. And he was correct also in holding that there were no facts in evidence to justify a finding of that character; there being no claim of willfulness and wantonness in this connection, being negligence so gross as to manifest a reckless indifference to plaintiff's rights. Everett v. Receivers, 121 N. C. 519, 27 S. E. 991.

The appellant excepts further that the court charged the jury as follows:

"The burden is on the plaintiff to satisfy you by the greater weight of the evidence that Shepard, the boy in charge of the elevator, or whoever was in charge of it, left the door open, or that, if opened by some one other than an agent or employee of defendants, that defendants knew it, or that it remained open long enough for them, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have discovered it, and if plaintiff has failed to so satisfy you of these facts, you will answer the first issue 'No.'"

The court is dealing here with the general question of defendant's negligence as involved in the first issue and on the assumption that plaintiff was an invitee on the premises and entitled to the duty of ordinary care. In this aspect of the case he so instructed the jury, and correctly charged them further that the burden of the issue was on the plaintiff, and in effect that he was required to establish a breach of duty towards him, the proximate cause of his injury. Going further and referring to some of the contentions of the parties, he gave the instruction excepted to as a further rule to guide the jury in their deliberations, and in this we think there was error to appellant's prejudice which entitles him to a new trial. It will be noted that his honor is here charging the jury as to the burden of proof, telling them in terms that to find the issue for plaintiff the burden is on him to show by greater weight of evidence either that the employee of defendant left the door open, or, if done by a third party, it had remained open so long that defendant should have discovered it.

[5, 6] In this aspect of the case there are facts tending to show, and they are without substantial contradiction, that on January 23, 1918, about 3:30 in the afternoon, plaintiff, an invitee on the hotel premises, walked into an elevator shaft opening on the lobby and fell to the cellar, 11 feet below, receiving permanent and painful injuries from which he still suffers, and disqualifying him to a great extent from active labor in his calling; that it was a dark afternoon, sleet was falling, and from this cause and the color of the paint and intervening obstructions to what light was prevailing on the outside the place was so dark that ordinary observation did not disclose the opening or absence of the elevator carriage; that the door leading into lobby where plaintiff was at the time had been left open, or was open, and the elevator carriage was at one of the upper stories. If these facts are accepted by the jury, and, as stated, they are not challenged in the record, a prima facie case of negligence is made out which would justify the jury in finding a verdict on the issue against the defendant without further proof. It is the accepted position here and elsewhere:

"That, where a thing which causes an injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant and the occurrence is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation by defendant that the accident arose from want of care."

This was held in the recent case of Stone v. Texas Co., reported in 180 N. C. 546-561, 105 S. E. 425, 12 A. L. R. 1297, and the principle has been approved and applied in many of our decisions on the subject. Fitzgerald v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 530, 54 S. E. 391, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337; Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 60, 50 S. E. 562; Womble v. Grocery Co., 135 N. C. 474, 47 S. E. 493; Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 321; Sweeney v. Erving, 228 U. S. 233, 33 Sup. Ct. 416, 57 L. Ed. 815, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 905; Cincinnati Traction Co. v. Holzenkamp, 74 Ohio St. 379, 78 N. E. 529, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 800, reported also in 113 Am. St. Rep. 980, with an informing and helpful note on the subject; Labatt on Master and Servant, § 834. In the citation to Labatt, quoted with approval in Womble's Case, it is said:

"The rationale of the doctrine, spoken of in the cases as res ipsa loquitur, is that in some cases the very nature of the action may itself, and through the presumption it carries, supply the requisite proof. It is applicable when under the circumstances shown the accident presumably would not have happened if due care had been exercised. Its essential import is that, on the facts proved, the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, without direct proof of negligence. The doctrine does not dispense with the rule that the party who alleges negligence must prove it. It merely determines the mode of proving it, or what shall be prima facie evidence of negligence."

And a clear and accurate statement of the position will be found in the case of Stewart v. Carpet Co., supra.

In Fitzgerald's Case the opinion cites an English decision on the subject as follows:

"In Scott v. Dock Co., 3 Hurl. & Colt, the plaintiff proved that, while conducting his duties as custom officer, he was passing in front of a warehouse in the dockyard and was felled to the ground by six bags of sugar falling upon him, and the principle is declared as follows: 'There must be reasonable evidence of negligence, but when the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation by the defendant that the accident arose from want of care.'"

And again a case from New Jersey is referred to with approval as follows:

"In Sheridan v. Foley, 58 N. J. Law, 230, it is said: 'It is urged, however, on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff was bound, in order to entitle him to a verdict, to prove affirmatively that the injury which he received was caused by the negligent act of the defendant or of his servants; that the mere proof that the plaintiff was injured by a brick falling from the head of one of the defendant's hod-carriers, or from a scaffolding upon which some of the employees of the defendant were engaged in laying a wall, does not, standing alone, raise any presumption of negligence; and that, as there was no evidence offered to show under what circumstances the brick fell, there was nothing in the case to warrant the jury in inferring that the injury complained of was the result of carelessness of the defendant or of his employees. While it is true, as a general principle, that mere proof of the occurrence of an accident raises no presumption of negligence, yet there is a class of cases where this principle does not govern—cases where the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, would not have happened if proper care had been used. In such cases the maxim res ipsa loquitur is held to apply, and it is presumed, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of reasonable care.'"

On the record, therefore, in charging the jury that in order to render a verdict for plaintiff on the first issue the burden was on him to show by a preponderance of the evidence either that the boy in charge of the elevator left the door open, or, if opened by some other than an agent of plaintiff, that defendant knew it, or it had been open long enough for them to have found it out in the exercise of proper care, the court, in our opinion, was putting on plaintiff a greater burden than is warranted by the proper application of the principle referred to. It no doubt made the impression upon the jury that, in order to a verdict on first issue, plaintiff was required to offer direct and affirmative proof of the facts suggested, whereas the jury, if they so determined, or in the absence of satisfactory explanation, were well warranted in finding negligence from the objective and attendant facts of the occurrence without such affirmative proof.

In many cases on the subject these passenger elevators are likened to railroad carriers of passengers in which there is a presumption of negligence arising from an unexplained injury. Edwards v. Manufacturers' Co., 27 R. I. 248, 61 Atl. 646, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 744, 114 Am. St. Rep. 37, 8 Ann. Cas. 974; Oberfelder v. Doran, 26 Neb. 118, 41 N. W. 1094, 18 Am. St. Rep. 771; Fox v. Philadelphia, 208 Pa. 127, 57 Atl. 356, 65 L. R. A. 214. But in this jurisdiction the objective facts similar to those presented here, as shown in Stewart's and Womble's decisions, only make out a prima facie case of negligence and justifying a verdict without further or direct and affirmative proof. Having undertaken to lay down the rule as to the burden of proof, it should have been done correctly, and no prayer for instructions was required. State v. Wolf, 122 N. C. 1079-1081, 29 S. E. 841; Bynum v. Bynum, 83 N. C. 632.

For the error indicated, plaintiff is entitled to a new trial of the issues, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

BARNHILL v. HARDEE et ux. (No. 185.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

Boundaries — 35(2)—Evidence of general reputation as to width of street held competent.

In an action against an adjoining landowner for trespass, evidence of the general reputation, for 30 or 35 years, beginning long before the litigation, and before either of the parties owned any of the land in controversy, as to the width of a street, 30 feet south from the corner of which and another street the disputed boundary line began, was competent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Devin, Judge.

Action by Haywood Barnhill against Richard Hardee and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

F. C. Harding and L. W. Gaylord, both of Greenville, for appellants.

Julius Brown and F. G. James & Son, all of Greenville, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action for trespass which turns upon the location of the dividing line of the adjoining lots of the parties in Greenville. Both claim under the same title. The plaintiff's deed from W. A. Taylor in 1907 describes his boundaries as follows:

"Beginning at the corner of Read and Second streets, and running south with Read street 30 feet; thence an easterly course parallel with Second street 59 feet, to the line of Miles Grimes; thence with the line of Miles in a northerly direction 30 feet to Second street; thence in a westerly direction to the beginning, being a part of lot No. 148 in the plan of the town of Greenville."

The description in defendants' deed executed by W. A. Taylor in 1914 is:

"Known as a part of lot No. 148 in the town of Greenville, beginning on the east side of Read street at a point 30 feet south of the intersection of Read and Second streets, it being the southwest corner of the lot which was conveyed to Haywood Barnhill by said W. A. Taylor and wife, and running from thence with Read street south 41 feet; thence east at right angles with Read street 59 feet; thence a northerly direction parallel with Read street, 41 feet to line of the lot now or formerly owned by Haywood Barnhill; thence a westerly direction with the line of the said Haywood Barnhill lot 59 feet to the beginning."

It will thus be seen that the controversy depends upon the location of the corner of Read and Second streets. The southern line of the plaintiff is described as "beginning 30 feet" from that corner and running east 59 feet, and the northern line of the defendant calls for the southern line of the plaintiff's lot.

If the corner on Second street is where the plaintiff claims, then the defendant has trespassed upon 7 feet of the plaintiff's lot eastwardly 59 feet, and the jury has found in accordance with the plaintiff's contention. There is but one exception which requires our consideration.

S. T. Hooker testified that he has lived in the town of Greenville 50 years, knows the reputation of the size of the blocks, and the width of the streets in said town; that his knowledge of this general reputation extends back 30 or 35 years; that he has no knowledge of the width of Second street, except from general reputation; that by the general reputation as to the width of Second street running back as far as 30 years the width of Second street is 49½ feet. He says that the streets of Greenville are of different widths; that he does not know the actual width of Second street below or east of Read street; that he never heard a question raised as to the width of Second street; that he lived on the corner of Second street. The judge permitted the witness to state, as above, the general reputation that the width of Second street was 49½ feet, and defendant excepted.

We think the evidence of the general reputation, 30 or 35 years old, as to the width of the street was competent under the rule laid down by this court in Threadgill v. Wadesboro, 170 N. C. 641, 87 S. E. 521; Sullivan v. Blount, 165 N. C. 7, 80 S. E. 892; Bland v. Beasley, 140 N. C. 628, 53 S. E. 443. He testified as to the general reputation which began long before this litigation, and before either of the parties owned any of the land in controversy.

No error.

STATE v. BROWN. (No. 89.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Criminal law  $\Leftrightarrow$  619 — Indictments consolidated for trial.

Two bills found by grand jury, one charging defendant with common-law crime of arson and the other with the statutory offense of houseburning, both of which arose out of the same transaction, were properly consolidated upon motion of the solicitor, and the defendant was properly tried over his objection on both counts at the same time, under C. S. § 4622.

2. Arson  $\Leftrightarrow$  37(1) — Evidence sufficient to sustain conviction of houseburning.

In a prosecution for common-law arson and the statutory offense of houseburning, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction of houseburning.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Kerr, Judge.

Bose Brown was indicted for arson and houseburning and convicted of houseburning, and appeals. No error.

The evidence for the state was as follows:
J. W. Brown testified:

Know Bose Brown. He is my half-brother. Lived with me a part of the time. We were living in the store; that is, it was a store building. I conducted a mercantile business in the front, and had in the store a stock of goods, wares, and merchandise, and there was also in the front of the store a barber shop, and outfit, and the front of the store was used for keeping and selling goods, wares, and merchandise, and for a barber shop. A partition wall about 25 feet from the front cut off the remainder of the building, and we lived in the back part, myself, wife, and three children. My store was burned Saturday night before last. My wife and children were in the bedroom at the time the fire began. My entire store, including part as the dwelling house, was burned. My losses were about $1,500. The house was all in one, with only partition wall. I left the store 15 minutes before 11 o'clock and it had not been to exceed 40 minutes when I looked out door and the house was on fire. It was on the right-hand corner front of the store. Fire started on the outside. I went out there and saw the fire burning on the outside. It was not burning on the inside when I first got there. Defendant had been living with us up to about three or four weeks before the fire, and had a dispute with my wife and children. Defendant used profane language, and my wife said he would have to go out of her house, she could not room and board him any longer, and I made him leave my house. This was about three weeks before the fire. Bose shines shoes mostly. For awhile he kept his chair in the store. Prior to this time he had taken it out and had asked me to let him return it. He did not put it back. He had also requested me to let him return to my home for room and board. I told him he would have to see my wife. He went to the back door and called. This was the night of the fire, and some considerable time before the fire. My wife did not answer. Bose said, "The next time he called her he bet she would answer, and be sorry she did not answer this time." I never heard Bose make any threats with reference to the burning. I used the right-hand corner of the store as you come out for barber shop. I did right much barbering and hair cutting on Saturdays and Saturday nights, and the floor was usually covered with hair, paper, and other debris. Defendant said, "If it was not for the electric chair he would kill me and my wife."

To the foregoing evidence defendant objects, as having no connection with burning. Overruled. Defendant excepts.

Ada Brown testified:

We lived in store in rear part which is separate from the main part of the store by partition wall. I was aroused by my husband on the night of the fire. I looked out door and fire was on the outside of building. Before I could get my children out fire had made its way from the corner to about 15 inches of my room door. My room door was about 80 feet from the corner. I told (defendant) if he could not behave he would have to leave. He talked vulgar chat to my children, and said he would destroy their property and said he would put lye in my eyes and in my children's eyes.

To the foregoing evidence defendant objects. Overruled.

The night of the fire he called me, and I did not answer. Prior to this he said he was going to kill me.

To the foregoing evidence defendant objects. Overruled.

I never heard him make any threats in connection with this or any other burning. It was about 15 minutes till 1 o'clock a. m. when I discovered the fire. My husband closed the store about quarter past 11. All the threats he made was to me and my children, the oldest being 9 years of age.

J. S. Simmons testified:

Met Bose Brown on street the night of the fire and before the fire about 25 yards from Mr. Myers' store. It was on the opposite side of street from house burned about 10 o'clock. He asked me to loan him $5. Said he was behind on his board bill. I had no money to loan. Said he would like to stay with me for a while. I had no room for him. Said John and Ada would not permit him to return to their house. He said they had lost one house by fire and you watch and see if they don't have something else to happen because they treat me wrong and the Lord punishes those who does wrong to others. This conversation happened on the night of the fire, and before the fire, and the house burned was in Cofield, near the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, and trains north and south were due to pass there during the early night and morning.

H R. Mitchell testified:

Did not see Bose prior during night of the fire. I saw him several days before and he said John and Ada were always after him and he had not done anything to them. Said they had one house burned once before and before three weeks they would get another burn. No; I have never sold Bose's monkey rum. Yes; I have been accused of it.

John Mountain testified:

Went out gate about 11 o'clock on Saturday night of the fire. It was before prosecuting witness had closed his store. Bose was alone at side window looking in, or near the window. I could see him by the reflection of the light through the window. The window was next to the bedroom door of prosecuting witness and wife.

Jack Perry testified:

Remember the night the store was burned. At 10 o'clock the defendant came into my store and bought a box of matches. That was nothing unusual.

Jim Boone testified:

Remember the night the store was burned. I saw the defendant at Wiggins' store about 25 yards away from the store that was burned. He was standing under the stoop at Wiggins' store. He stopped and talked to me. I asked him for a match, and he gave it to me. About 40 minutes later I saw the fire. I am 21 years old.

The question being asked why and what he was doing out at that hour of the night, he answered:

Can't tell you why I was out at 12 o'clock at night and so near the time of the fire.

John Copeland testified:

Remember the night the fire occurred. Three o'clock a. m., myself, John Mountain, and others went to look for the defendant. We found him asleep in a little house on the mill yard of the Cofield Manufacturing Company, one-quarter mile or more away. We called him and asked him about the fire. Defendant said he had not been out since 8 o'clock of the night of the fire. He was not asleep, and opened the door for us, and he was dressed, except he did not have his shoes on. You could see the reflection of the fire in the window to the room in which he was, and there was nothing to prevent his knowing about the fire. He was a short distance from it, but did not go to the fire.

G. E. Holloman testified:

I heard the case at the preliminary hearing. I warned the defendant any statement he made could not be used against him. He said he went to the mill yard about 8 or 9 o'clock and remained there until he was called. I asked him if he did not remember being in my store as late as 12 o'clock. He was in my store as late as 12 o'clock. He said he did not know, because he had no time piece, and no way to tell the time. I was one of the first to get to the fire. When I reached the store the fire was burning a little on the outside, just opposite the barber chair. Store was not celled. I did not get there when the fire first started, but when I got there the fire was mostly burning in the corner of near the barber chair. One of the window panes right near the chair was broken out when I got there and in less time than five minutes all the panes in the window were broken out by the heat. I know the defendant is not considered bright and is far below the average. I am quite sure he really did not know the time unless he was so advised by some one else. He had no watch. I don't think he could tell the time by a time piece. Unlettered and unlearned, and not much mind.

The judge fully recapitulated to the jury the evidence, and correctly laid down to it the law arising thereon, and recited the contentions of the state and defendant, and in addition to the other charge of the court, the judge, at the request of the defendant, charged the jury as follows:

(1) In the case at bar the state relies upon circumstantial evidence for a conviction of the defendant and before you can convict the defendant such evidence must be clear and conclusive in its combination, connection, and exclude all rational doubt as to the defendant's guilt; and the burden is on the state, and it must establish every circumstance upon which it relies beyond a reasonable doubt; and if the state has failed to so satisfy you, you will return a verdict of not guilty and acquit the defendant.

(2) The court further charges you that the state must prove each fact which constitutes a necessary link in the chain of evidence as clearly as if the whole case depended on it; and if the state has failed to so prove and satisfy your mind beyond a reasonable doubt, it is your duty and you should acquit the defendant.

(3) The court further charges you that, in relying upon circumstantial evidence for a conviction, such evidence is no stronger than its weakest link.

The court further defined circumstantial evidence to the jury, and reasonable doubt, and the crimes of arson and wanton and felonious burning of building used in carrying on trade, and properly charged the jury that the burden of proof was on the state to satisfy them from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, and, if they were not so satisfied, they would not convict defendant of anything, but they must acquit him, and find him not guilty. There was and is not exception to the judge's charge, except that he refused to give the following special instruction prayed by the defendant in apt time:

If the jury shall believe all the evidence in the case they will acquit the defendant.

The court instructed the jury that, under the bills of indictment, as it found the facts to be, applying the law as laid down to it by the court, they could render one of three verdicts: Arson, houseburning, or not guilty. The jury for their verdict found the defendant guilty of houseburning, and not guilty of arson.

On the coming in of the verdict of the jury, the defendant moved to set aside the verdict as being contrary to and not supported by the evidence, and against the law of the case. Motion overruled. Defendant excepts.

The court sentenced the defendant to serve five years at hard labor in the state prison. The defendant excepts to the judgment pronounced, and appeals to the Supreme Court.

Notice of appeal given in open court. Further notice waived. The defendant further excepts because the court refused to give special instructions as prayed, and because of the charge as given, and other errors committed during the trial. All of which was urged on motion to set aside the verdict and new trial.

Upon certificate of counsel and affidavit, the defendant is allowed to prosecute his appeal in forma pauperis. The court ordered the sheriff to remove the prisoner from the county jail to the state prison, without prejudice to his rights in this appeal.

Roswell C. Bridger, of Winton, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. [1] There were originally two bills found by the grand jury—one charging the defendant with the common-law crime of arson and the other with the statutory offense of houseburning, both of which arose out of the same transaction. Upon motion of the solicitor, the bills were consolidated, and the defendant was tried, over his objection, on both counts at the same time. This was clearly permissible under C. S. § 4622, which provides that—

“If two or more indictments are found in such cases (where they arise out of the same transaction), the court will order them to be consolidated.”

[2] The remaining exception, relied on by defendant, was to his honor's refusal to grant the motion for judgment as of nonsuit. The evidence was entirely circumstantial; but from a perusal of the record we think it was quite sufficient to support the verdict.

We have found no error, and this will be certified to the superior court.

No error.

SYKES v. FOREMAN-DERRICKSON VENEER CO., Inc. (No. 9.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

Appeal and error — 999(1)—Finding of jury conclusive.

Where a controversy deals only with questions of fact, the finding of the jury favorable to plaintiff is conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Allen, Judge.

Action by S. W. Sykes against the Foreman-Derrickson Veneer Company, Inc. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract wherein the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff 500 truck barrels to be used in moving and marketing a certain quantity of Irish potatoes. Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

“(1) Did plaintiff and defendant contract to buy and sell the barrels as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

“(2) Did the defendant breach the contract as alleged in complaint? Answer: Yes.

“(3) If so, what damages did the plaintiff sustain? Answer: $400.00.”

From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff the defendant appealed.

Aydlett & Simpson, of Elizabeth City, and H. L. Swain, of Columbia, for appellant.

W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, and T. H. Woodley, of Columbia, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The controversy between the parties to this action and here presented deals only with questions of fact. These the jury have answered in favor of the plaintiff. No new point of law is raised by any of the exceptions which would seem to merit an extended discussion. We have carefully examined the record and defendant's assignments of error, but no reversible or prejudicial ruling has been made to appear.

No error.

LEE v. LEE. (No. 114.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Divorce  $\Leftrightarrow$  36—Separation for more than five years because of insanity of wife held no ground for divorce.

Laws 1921, c. 63, amending C. S. § 1659, subd. 4, providing that suit by the party injured for divorce may be maintained where separation for five years has been by mutual consent or wrongful act of at least one of the parties, or by judicial decree, does not apply to separation from confinement in the state hospital for the insane because of insanity.

2. Divorce  $\Leftrightarrow$  36—"Party injured" means party wronged.

The party injured means the party wronged by the action of the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Injured Person.]

3. Divorce  $\Leftrightarrow$  36—"Separation" defined.

Separation in matrimonial law means a cessation of cohabitation of husband and wife by mutual agreement or in the case of judicial separation, under decree of court, to which is added by C. S. § 1660, subs. 1, 2, separation caused by desertion, abandonment or other wrongful act of the party sued.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Separation.]

4. Divorce  $\Leftrightarrow$  23—Not decreed for insanity after marriage.

Insanity accruing after marriage is not ground for divorce, in the absence of statute.

5. Constitutional law  $\Leftrightarrow$  70(3)—Grounds for divorce cannot be extended by the court beyond those of the statute.

Court cannot by judicial construction extend the grounds of divorce beyond those specified in the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Connor, Judge.

Action for divorce by A. R. Lee against Saphrony Ann Lee. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This is an action by the husband for divorce. The plaintiff and defendant were married May 31, 1896, and there were five children born to them. They lived together till 1910, when the wife was committed to the state hospital for the insane, and has not been home since. This is an action for divorce, alleging that "there has been a separation of husband and wife, and that they have lived separate and apart for 10 successive years."

Wellons & Wellons, of Smithfield, for appellant.

F. H. Brooks, of Smithfield, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] This appeal presents but one question. The court charged the jury that, though the plaintiff and defendant had lived separate and apart for more than 5 years (Laws 1921, c. 63, amending C. S. § 1659 [4]), such separation, having been caused by incarceration in the state hospital for the insane, is not such separation as is contemplated in the statute under which this suit is brought.

The appellant rests his case solely upon the statement in Cooke v. Cooke, 164 N. C. 275, 80 S. E. 179, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1034, that—

"This statute * * * is broad enough to include, and clearly does include, any kind of separation by which the marital association is severed."

But the judge in that case immediately added:

"And which may be made the subject of further judicial investigation. There is nothing in the law to indicate that the right conferred is dependent on the blame which may attach to the one party or the other, nor that the time which may be covered by a judicial decree of divorce from bed and board shall be excluded from the statutory period, nor which permits the interpretation chiefly insisted upon by the defendant, that the statute applies only when there has been a separation by mutual consent of the parties."

The court in that case was not extending the causes of divorce to instances in which the living apart was caused by insanity and immurement in the state hospital, but was combating the idea that the separation must be by mutual consent. It is very clear that the separation must be in contemplation of law a separation at least of the kind recognized by statute, and could not apply to cases where the party driving the other from the home, or who should desert the home, should be the party seeking to take advantage of his own wrong by pleading the separation which he had caused. It is true that in Cooke v. Cooke the majority of the court took the view that the application for the divorce was not required to be "by the party injured," but the statute has since been expressly changed, for this section (C. S. § 1659) does now require that the action must be by "the party injured."

[2] The party injured means the "party wronged by the action of the other." Where each party has been guilty of wrong, the defendant can plead recrimination. This statute goes no further than to allow a divorce where the separation has been by mutual consent or wrongful act of at least one of the parties, or by judicial decree, and has existed for five years.

It certainly was not intended that this statute should apply to cases where the separation was without fault on either side, and involuntary, as in cases like this of incarceration in an asylum for the insane.

[3] The word "separation" is thus defined in Black's Law Dictionary, 1073, "in matrimonial law it means a cessation of cohabitation of husband and wife by mutual agreement," or in the case of judicial separation "under decree of court." To these our statute contemplates the addition of "separation" caused by desertion or abandonment, or other wrongful act of the party sued. It certainly does not intend to give an action of divorce to the party who has caused the separation by driving the other from the home, or has voluntarily deserted it for the specified period. C. S. § 1660 (1) and 1660 (2).

It cannot be contended that the years spent by the wife in the hospital for the insane was desertion or a separation by mutual consent, or even a voluntary, much less a wrongful, act on her part.

[4] There are numerous decisions which hold that insanity accruing after marriage is not ground for divorce. Lloyd v. Lloyd, 66 Ill. 87; Powell v. Powell, 18 Kan. 371, 26 Am. Rep. 774; Pile v. Pile, 94 Ky. 308, 22 S. W. 215.

The grounds for divorce are entirely statutory, and vary in the different states. The status is thus summed up in 19 C. J. 71:

"In some states, insanity is made a ground for divorce by statute" [but it may be said that it seems this is confined to the state of Washington], "while in others a divorce is absolutely prohibited where either party is insane. In the absence of statute, insanity arising after marriage is not ground for divorce."

This state comes under the latter head.

[5] While it is in the power of the Legislature of this state to make the misfortune of either party a ground for divorce, it has not done so, and the court cannot, by judicial construction, extend the grounds of divorce beyond the statute. With us, the law-making power has adhered to the obligation of the marriage vow, that the parties "take each other for better or for worse, to live together in sickness and in health till death do them part," with the exceptions only where the misconduct of the parties, and not their misfortunes, are made by our statute to justify the divorce.

Certainly, the husband whose wife has been placed in the asylum for insanity has not been wronged by her, and he has no ground under our statute to a divorce from her, without any wrongful act on her part. Instead of insanity being a ground for divorce, the wife is still entitled to support from her husband, and to her dower as a support, should she outlive him, and to other rights of which an innocent and faithful wife would be deprived should the misfortune of insanity be imputed to the wife, as a ground for divorce. The same is true where the husband is the insane party.

No error.

SIMONDS et ux. v. CARSON. (No. 182.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Justices of the peace  $\S$ 161(1) — Appeal must be docketed by appellant.

One appealing from a judgment in justice court must docket his appeal in the superior court under C. S. § 660, and if he fails to do so by the next succeeding term of the superior court, the appellee may have the case placed on docket, and have the judgment affirmed.

2. Justices of the peace  $\S$ 25 — Not liable for damages for failure to send up papers on appeal.

Failure of justice of the peace to send up papers on appeal after appellant has paid his fee therefor, under C. S. § 1532, is a judicial duty, and is not actionable, and he is not liable in damages to the appellant, whose own duty it is to see that the appeal is properly docketed, and to apply for a recordari or to apply in time to the justice to make return.

3. Justices of the peace  $\S$ 27 — Not liable for negligent failure to perform offer to docket case in superior court for appellant.

Where one appealing from a judgment of a justice paid to the justice the appeal fee of 30 cents, together with the further sum of 50 cents for docketing the same in the superior court, which he agreed to send up with the papers on appeal, the offer of the justice to send up the fee and docket the appeal was purely a gratuitous offer, and his failure to docket the case in the superior court gave appellant no right to an action for damages, unless there was fraud or intent to defeat the appellant of his rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Horton, Judge.

Action by A. J. Simonds and wife against S. T. Carson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs' appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Ford recovered judgment against the plaintiffs in this action, who were defendants in that action, before S. T. Carson, a justice of the peace, the defendant herein. They gave notice of appeal to the superior court, and then and there paid to the said justice of the peace, the defendant, S. T. Carson, the appeal fee of 30 cents, together with the further sum of 50 cents for docketing the same in the superior court, which it is alleged he agreed to send up with the said papers on appeal.

The complaint alleges that the justice negligently and carelessly failed to send up said case, and failed to remit the fee for docketing the appeal, paid to him by the plaintiffs (defendants in said action), whereby the plaintiff in said action at August term, 1916, procured judgment dismissing said appeal because it had not been docketed in time. The court finds as facts that—

"The next term of the superior court of Pitt convened May 20, 1916, after said term of court, the justice of the peace having failed to send up the case with the fee for docketing."

The complaint further alleges that by reason of the dismissal of the said appeal the plaintiffs in this action were required to pay the said J. J. Ford the sum of $106.12, and that the plaintiffs had a good and meritorious defense to the action brought by Ford; he being indebted to the plaintiffs at that time more than the amount of said claim.

The plaintiffs paid off the Ford judgment, and brought this action in the county court of Pitt to recover the amount thereof, $106.12, and obtained verdict and judgment for the full amount, whereupon the defendant appealed to the superior court, in which the court nonsuited the plaintiffs, who appealed.

Albion Dunn, of Greenville, for appellants.

F. G. James & Son, of Greenville, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is a case of novel impression in this state, and presents the question whether a justice of the peace is liable in an action for negligence in failing to send up the case on appeal when he has been paid the appeal fee, and the clerk's fee for docketing, and can the injured party recover for damages resulting from such negligent failure?

[1] C. S. § 1532, requires the justice of the peace, within 10 days after notice of the appeal, to send up to the clerk of the superior court all the papers in the cause, provided his fee therefor is paid, which was done in this case. It is then made the duty of the appellant to docket his appeal in the superior court (C. S. § 660), and, if he fails to do so by the next succeeding term of the superior court, the appellee may have the case placed upon docket and have the judgment affirmed. It was the duty of the appellant to pay the docketing fee and have the cause docketed (Sneeden v. Darby, 173 N. C. 274, 91 S. E. 956, and cases there cited), and if the case is not docketed in time the appellee may have it dismissed (Barnes v. Saleeby, 177 N. C. 256, 98 S. E. 708, and cases there cited).

[2] The action of the justice in not sending up the papers was a judicial duty, and his failure to do so is not actionable. He is liable for a default in a public duty, but not in damages to the plaintiffs, whose own duty it was to see that the appeal was properly docketed, and if the papers were not sent up in apt time it was their duty to apply for a recordari, or to apply in time to the justice to make another return. Not having done this, they were in laches, and the appeal was properly dismissed. Abell v. Power Co., 159 N. C. 348, 74 S. E. 881; Tedder v. Deaton, 167 N. C. 479, 83 S. E. 616; Bargain House v. Jefferson, 180 N. C. 32, 103 S. E. 922, and cases there cited.

[3] The plaintiff contends, however, that the justice undertook and agreed to send up the 50 cents to docket the appeal, and that failure to do this was negligence in the discharge of a ministerial duty. But this was purely a gratuitous offer, a mere matter of courtesy or personal accommodation, based upon no consideration, and for the failure to discharge this the plaintiff is not entitled to an action, unless there were fraud or intent to defeat the appellants of their rights.

Besides the appeal was taken May 2 and the next term of the superior court was held on May 20, and it was the appellants' own negligence that they did not ascertain that the case was docketed and ready for trial at that first term as the statute requires. They should have ascertained that the justice had not paid the docketing fee, and have called on him to send up the record. This was not done, and there was no attempt to docket the case until July 8. The plaintiffs have suffered loss by their own negligence, and this action cannot be maintained.

The plaintiffs rely upon the expression at the end of the opinion in MacKenzie v. Development Co., 151 N. C. 278, 65 S. E. 1004:

"The payment of the clerk's fee to the justice cannot avail him [the appellant], for this should have been paid to the clerk, and its payment to the justice merely made the justice his agent. If [the appellant] has lost any rights, he has lost them through the carelessness of his agent and his own neglect to avail himself of the remedies of recordari and attachment that the law gives him."

The court was there referring to the analogy of the cases in which the transcript was not sent up in time and docketed in the Supreme Court by the neglect of the lawyer who undertook to attend to this, and the court has held in a long line of cases that as to such matter the lawyer is acting simply as agent for the appellant, and his neglect is the neglect of the appellant, and does not excuse him. Truelove v. Norris, 152 N. C. 757, 67 S. E. 487, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 804, 136 Am. St. Rep. 836, 21 Ann. Cas. 646, in which case the statement at the close of the opinion that the client would have an action for the negligence of lawyer as his agent is based upon the fact that the lawyer is acting under a consideration and liable to his principal for negligence. But in this case the justice was acting simply as a matter of accommodation, and under no legal liability, except, as has been said, when it is alleged and shown that his conduct was fraudulent or with intent to defeat the appellant of his right to have the case reviewed, which is not alleged here.

The court intimated in State v. Dayton, 119 N. C. 880, 26 S. E. 159, and Hewitt v. Beck, 152 N. C. 757, 67 S. E. 586, that where the clerk of the superior court failed to transmit the transcript in 20 days to this court he might be liable to indictment. Whether the clerk, who is acting, unlike the justice, ministerially, in sending up the record, would also be liable in an action for damages sustained by such default, is not a matter before us. The justice of the peace has no clerk, and his sending up the original papers is a judicial duty, unlike the clerk of the superior court, who makes a transcript of the record for this court, which is sent up by the authority of the judge in pursuance of a duty prescribed by law.

Affirmed.

WILSON v. BATCHELOR. (No. 186.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

1. Justices of the peace §90—No formality in pleadings.

Pleadings before a justice of the peace are not required to be in any particular form and need be only such as will enable a person of common understanding to know what is meant, under Consol. St. § 1500 (rule 7).

2. Justices of the peace §103, 174(17)—Defendant may be required to make counterclaim more specific.

If plaintiff so desires, he may call on defendant to make a counterclaim more specific, either in justice court, or on appeal in the superior court, under Revisal 1906, § 496.

3. New trial §56—No error in refusing for conduct of juror where prejudice not shown.

Where plaintiff appellant inquired of jury before they were impaneled if any one of them had retained the counsel for the defendant in the case in any pending cause and received no answer, it cannot be said that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a new trial, where it was discovered after verdict that one of the jurors had retained opposing counsel in a pending cause, but there was no suggestion of bad faith or corruption on the part of the juror, or that movant sustained any damage by his silence when the inquiry was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Horton, Judge.

Action by Frank Wilson against Roy Batchelor before a justice of the peace. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed to the superior court. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. No error.

Plaintiff sued before a justice of the peace to recover of defendant $126.19. He had employed the defendant as clerk in August, 1914, at $50 per month, and the defendant's services having proved satisfactory, the plaintiff contracted with the defendant for 1915 and 1916. The plaintiff contends that he was to pay the defendant for his services for 1915 $720, and for 1916 the sum of $800. The defendant contends he was to receive $800 for 1915 and $900 for 1916. The defendant had overdrawn his account by $126.19, about which there was a dispute, and contends that if he had received the proper salary credit it would leave the plaintiff indebted to him in the sum of $53.81; this being the difference between $180 due on his salary, and the store account of $126.19.

It was conceded at the trial that if the plaintiff sustained his contention he was entitled to recover the full amount sued for, and if the defendant sustained his contention that the plaintiff was entitled to recover nothing, and the defendant the sum of $53.81, and the case was tried upon this theory. The jury sustained the contention of the defendant, found that he was not indebted to the plaintiff in any amount, and rendered a verdict against the plaintiff for $53.81. Judgment was rendered accordingly, and plaintiff appealed.

W. F. Evans, of Raleigh, for appellant.
Albion Dunn, of Greenville, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff's position is that the defendant has not alleged in his counterclaim that the plaintiff had promised to pay him the sum of $900 for the year 1916, but that he would raise his salary if there was an increase in the business, and that there was a large increase, which reasonably entitled defendant to a salary of $900; but we are of the opinion that the oral pleadings contain a sufficient allegation. The pleadings were somewhat informal, it being an appeal from a magistrate; but in the superior court the following entry was made in the record, as appears:

"The defendant admits that the plaintiff's account as introduced is correct, except the salary credits; the defendant claiming that he is entitled to a credit of $800 for 1915 and $900 for 1916, instead of $720 for 1915 and $800 for 1916."

This gave the plaintiff fair notice of the nature of defendant's demand, and it was substantially a more definite statement of the latter's counterclaim.

[1, 2] We must construe the pleadings and proceedings liberally, and not allow justice to fail because of any mere informality, or irregularity, especially when we are dealing with pleadings before justices of the peace.

"Pleadings (before a justice) are not required to be in any particular form, but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is meant." Consol. Statutes, § 1500 (rule 7), vol. 1, p. 669. We said in Smith v. Newberry, 140 N. C. 385, at page 387, 53 S. E. 234, that—

"Large power of amendment is vested in the superior court, limited only by the condition that the amendment show a cause of action within the jurisdiction of the justice. Mfg. Co. v. Barrett, 95 N. C. 86; Planing Mills v. McNinch, 99 N. C. 517. * * * If the defendants had so desired, they might have called upon the plaintiff to make his counterclaim more specific, either in the justice's court or after the case reached the superior court upon appeal. Revisal, 496; cases cited in Clark's Code, § 261. In the absence of any more definite pleadings or any motion to make them so, his honor properly submitted the issue upon the cause of action which seemed to be and, as the jury found, was sustained by the evidence."

And to the same effect is Turner v. McKee, 137 N. C. (Anno. Ed.) 257, 49 S. E. 330. While the complaint, as it was briefly noted on the justice's docket, and return to the appeal, may state merely that if, in 1916, there was an increase in the business over that of 1915, the salary would be raised, the plaintiff made his promise more definite after he learned what the increase was by fixing $900 as the amount of the salary, and throughout the trial he was apprised of the true claim made by the defendant. There is no legal merit, in this exception, to the charge of the court that if the jury found that the plaintiff had promised to pay defendant $900 for the year 1916, they should allow the latter that amount, and deducting plaintiff's claim of $126.19 from the balance due defendant on his salary, calculated on that basis, which was $190, their verdict would be for the ultimate balance which is $53.81.

The plaintiff inquired of the jury, before they were impaneled, if any one of them had retained the counsel for the defendant in this case, in any pending cause, and received no answer. After the verdict was returned, defendant moved for a new trial because the said counsel had been retained by one of the jurors in a pending cause, and such was the fact. The motion was overruled, and properly so. We held in State v. Maulsby, 130 N. C. 664, 41 S. E. 97 (op. by the present Chief Justice), that a motion to set aside the verdict on account of relationship between the prosecuting witness and a juror, which was discovered after verdict—even if such relationship is ground of objection, as to which it is not necessary to decide—rested in the discretion of the trial court, and its refusal is not reviewable on appeal. This has been held where the relationship between a party and a juror is not discovered until after verdict. Spicer v. Fulghum, 67 N. C. 18; Bax- ter v. Wilson, 95 N. C. 137. The same ruling has been made where, after verdict, the juror was ascertained to be incompetent because a minor (State v. Lambert, 93 N. C. 618), or not a freeholder (State v. Crawford, 8 N. C. 298), or an atheist (State v. Davis, 80 N. C. 412), or a nonresident (State v. White, 68 N. C. 156), or for other causes, see State v. De Graff, 113 N. C. 690, 18 S. E. 507, and State v. Council, 129 N. C. 517, 39 S. E. 814, and cases there cited. And in State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 126, at page 128, the court said by Chief Justice Pearson:

"It was the misfortune of the defendant, that neither he nor his counsel had been sufficiently on the alert, to enable them to find out the fact in 'apt time' to make it cause of challenge, that one of the jurors was on the grand jury when the bill was found. This might have been a ground for his honor in the court below, to grant a new trial, if he had any reason to suspect unfairness on the part of the prosecution, but all suspicion of that kind was put out of the question, for it was stated by the juror, 'if he was on the grand jury he had forgotten it, when he was put on the petit jury.' How far this was satisfactory to his honor, was a matter for him. But we will say that we entirely concur in his conclusion. After a defendant has taken his chances for an acquittal, the purposes of justice are not subverted by hastening too readily to objections that were not taken in 'apt time.'"

And so in State v. Patrick, 48 N. C. 443, this court by Chief Justice Nash held that it is too late, after a juror has been taken and accepted by the prisoner and has served on the trial, to except to him for incompetency, and this was said, in a trial for a capital felony, to be the law, even though the objection to the juror, if taken at the proper time, would have been allowed as a good challenge for cause. In all legal proceedings, it was said, there is an apt time for every step in the proceeding, and every objection or privilege must be made or claimed at the proper time, or the party making it will be considered as having waived it. Briggs v. Byrd, 34 N. C. 377. The case of State v. Davis, 80 N. C. 412, is an instructive one on this point. It was there held (op. by Ashe, J.) that the objection to a juror after verdict came too late, and that learned justice said:

"It is well settled by English authorities, sanctioned by the uniform practice of centuries and by numerous decisions in this state, that no juror can be challenged by the defendant without consent after he has been sworn, unless it be for some cause which has happened since he was sworn. The challenge propter defectum should be made as the juror is brought to the book to be sworn and before he is sworn; if not then made, the defendant waives his right of challenge." State v. Seaborn, 15 N. C. 305; State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 126; State v. Lamon, 10 N. C. 175; State v. Griffice, 74 N. C. 316; State v. Patrick, supra; 1

Whar. Cr. L. 472; Joy on Jurors, § 10; Hawkins, P. C. c. 43, § 1; Hale, P. C. 274.

And in conformity to this rule of practice is the ancient formula used by clerks both in England and in this country in their address to prisoners before the jurors are drawn:

"Those men that you shall hear called and who personally appear are to pass between our sovereign (or the state) and you upon your trial of life and death; if, therefore, you will challenge them or any of them, your time is to speak to them as they come to the book to be sworn and before they are sworn."

It was there further held that—

"Where the ground of objection to a juror existed at the time he was sworn, but was not discovered until after verdict, the court may in its discretion allow the challenge and grant a new trial. Its refusal to do so is not reviewable."

To the same effect are the following cases: State v. Lipscomb, 134 N. C. 689, 47 S. E. 44; State v. Patrick, 48 N. C. 443; State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1014, 43 S. E. 830; State v. Perkins, supra; and Spicer v. Fulghum, 67 N. C. 18, which is directly in point. In the last-cited case it was held:

"Where the plaintiff's counsel, before the jury was impaneled, requested that any juror in the box who was related to any one of the defendants by blood or marriage should retire, and no juror retired or replied, held, that it was not error for the judge to refuse to grant a new trial, because after verdict and judgment it was ascertained that a juror was connected with one of the defendants; it being a matter of discretion"—citing State v. Perkins, 66 N. C. 126.

[3] There is no suggestion in this case of bad faith, or corruption, on the part of the juror, whose conduct is in question, or that plaintiff sustained any damage by his silence when the inquiry was made. For all that appears, he may have suffered no prejudice. In State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1014, 43 S. E. 830, a boy not under ten years of age had drawn the venire. The court, in the absence of bad faith or corruption, refused to set aside the verdict.

The other exceptions are merely formal. No error.

OVERTON v. COMBS. (No. 63.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Malicious prosecution — Want of probable cause and other elements necessary.

To recover for malicious prosecution, it must be shown that an action has been instituted by defendant without probable cause and from malice, causing damage for wrongful interference with the person or property of complainant, and that the former action has terminated in complainant's favor.

2. Malicious prosecution — 71(3) — Malice question for jury.

In actions for malicious prosecution, the question of malice is for the jury.

3. Malicious prosecution — 71(2) — Probable cause question of law on undisputed facts.

In malicious prosecution, the issue as to probable cause, on the facts admitted or as they may be accepted by the jury, must be decided as a question of law by the court.

4. Malicious prosecution — 25(3) — Judgment held conclusive on question of probable cause.

Where on a former suit the jury found in favor of the present defendant, sued for malicious prosecution, that plaintiff had attempted to dispose of property subject to mortgage, with the view of hindering, delaying, and defrauding defendant, the judgment is conclusive that there was probable cause for the action, although it was later set aside for irregularity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by C. W. Overton against S. M. Combs. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The action is one for malicious prosecution, involving the arrest of present plaintiff, and was determined for plaintiff on the following issues and verdict:

"(1) Did defendant, S. M. Combs, cause the plaintiff, C. W. Overton, to be arrested under process in the nature of an execution against the person in a suit brought by S. M. Combs against C. W. Overton in Tyrrell county, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Was such a process of execution against the person duly vacated and set aside upon motion of the plaintiff, C. W. Overton, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(3) If so, was said action instituted and such process issued wrongfully, maliciously, and without probable cause? Answer: Yes.

"(4) What damage, if any, is the plaintiff, Overton, entitled to recover of the defendant Combs? Answer: $250.00."

Judgment on the verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed, assigning errors, chiefly refusal of defendant's motion for nonsuit.

Meekins & McMullan, of Elizabeth City, for appellant.

W. L. Whitley, of Plymouth, for appellee.

HOKE, J. On the present trial there was evidence tending to show: That the present defendant had a note against plaintiff for $250, secured by chattel mortgage on an automobile and other articles of personal property, to wit, a cow and a mare and plaintiff's crops for the then current year, consisting of cotton, corn, potatoes, etc. That defendant instituted said former action, and filed his verified complaint alleging indebtedness. That said Overton had disposed of all the personal property included in the mortgage other than the Ford car, with the fraudulent intent to hinder and delay plaintiff in collection of his debt, etc. That at, or just before, suit entered, Overton had delivered the car to Combs, and same, having been very much damaged in use by said Overton, was sold on due advertisement for $70, and amount accreted on the note. That Overton, defendant in the former suit, failed to answer or resist recovery, although he was notified that there were allegations of fraud made against him in the case, and he should appear and defend himself. That on the hearing, the allegations presented by the pleadings were submitted to the jury, who rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? If so, in what amount? Answer: $250 and interest subject to credit of $70.

"(2) Did the defendant execute to the plaintiff a chattel mortgage as alleged conveying the property therein set out? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Did the defendant sell and dispose of the chattel property conveyed in the said mortgage without the consent and for the purpose of hindering and delaying the plaintiff in collecting the said mortgage and notes secured thereby? Answer: Yes."

On which said verdict, there was judgment in favor of Combs for the debt, less the $70. That if execution against property was returned unsatisfied, execution should be issued against the person of the judgment debtor. Execution having issued against property and returned unsatisfied, there was execution against the person as directed, under which process the arrest and detention of plaintiff, complained of in present suit, was had. The return of sheriff on this process May 23, 1919, was:

"Executed by arresting C. W. Overton, defendant herein named, and he, having given a good and sufficient bond, was released and not imprisoned as ordered."

It further appeared that after this release, on notice and motion, the execution against the person was recalled as having been improvidently issued and later at August term, 1919, on notice and motion, the portion of the judgment directing that execution issue against the person was set aside as being irregular. Thereupon the present suit was entered to recover damages for malicious prosecution and for the arrest and detention of plaintiff wrongfully caused therein.

[1] It is the accepted law, here and elsewhere, that in order to a recovery in an action for malicious prosecution it must be made to appear that an action has been instituted by the defendant without probable cause and from malice, causing damage by wrongful interference with the person or property of complainant, and that said former action has terminated in complainant's favor before suit brought. Carpenter, etc., v. Hanes, 167 N. C. 551, 83 S. E. 577; Humphries v. Edwards, 164 N. C. 154, 80 S. E. 165; Downing v. Stone, 152 N. C. 525, 68 S. E. 9, 136 Am. St. Rep. 841, 21 Ann. Cas. 753; Stanford v. Grocery Co., 143 N. C. 419, 55 S. E. 815; Railroad v. Hardware Co., 143 N. C. 54, 55 S. E. 422.

[2-4] And these, and authority generally, is to the effect that, while on the issue as to malice, its existence or nonexistence must be determined by the jury, on the issue as to probable cause and on the facts admitted or as they may be accepted by the jury, its existence or nonexistence must be decided as a question of law by the court. And in this state the cases on the subject hold uniformly so far as noted that, where in a former suit a trial court having jurisdiction has decided the essential issues in favor of the plaintiff on proper proof or admission, that finding is conclusive in plaintiff's favor on this question of probable cause, and he may not be held liable in a subsequent action for malicious prosecution. And the principle holds though the verdict or finding for plaintiff in the former suit is thereafter set aside or reversed on appeal or other ruling in the orderly progress of the cause. Thus, in Smith v. Thomas, 149 N. C. 100, 62 S. E. 772, action for malicious prosecution against the private prosecutor in a criminal charge before a justice of the peace, defendant pleaded guilty, and on appeal was acquitted of the offense in the appellate court. Held, action would not lie for that, though the innocence of the appellant had been established by the final judgment, the plea of guilty was conclusive against him on the issue as to probable cause.

A like decision was made in Price v. Stanley, 128 N. C. 38, 38 S. E. 33, where, the defendant having been convicted in the justice's court, on appeal the solicitor of the appellate court, finding that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the prosecution, entered a nol. pros. held the conviction before the justice conclusively established the existence of probable cause. And in Griffis v. Sellars, 20 N. C. p. 315, it was determined that:

"In an action for a malicious prosecution, a verdict and judgment of conviction in a court of competent jurisdiction, although the party convicted was afterwards acquitted upon an appeal to a superior tribunal, is conclusive evidence of probable cause, and precludes the plaintiff in the action for the malicious prosecution from showing the contrary."

Speaking more elaborately to the principle, Chief Justice Ruffin, delivering the opinion, said:

"This case differs from that which was before the court a year ago between the plaintiff's brother and the same defendant (19 N. C. 492) only in showing more explicitly the innocence of the plaintiff and the malignant motive of the defendant. But the same principle governs both, notwithstanding that difference in the detail of the circumstances. The principle is that probable cause is judicially ascertained by the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court thereon, although upon an appeal a contrary verdict and judgment be given in a higher court. Our opinion being, that probable cause is judicially established by those means, it follows that no evidence is competent to disprove it."

And further in the same opinion:

"So in the present state of the case, another ingredient of the action, namely, the want of probable cause, which is as essential to the plaintiff's action as is his innocence, is completely negated, because the proof that satisfied the jury and court then trying the plaintiff that he was guilty must, upon the ground already adverted to, be deemed by another court to establish that there was then probable cause."

This being the doctrine as it prevails under our decisions, we are all of opinion that it must apply in protection of defendant on the facts of the present record, it appearing that in action in the superior court, plaintiff had filed his complaint, alleging an indebtedness of $250, and, further, that defendant had disposed of an amount of personal property embraced in a mortgage held by plaintiff to secure the debt, with the view and purpose of hindering and delaying and defrauding plaintiff in the collection of same.

Under the supervision of a capable and learned judge, issues as to the debt and the fraud are submitted to the jury, verdict rendered on both in plaintiff's favor, and judgment on the verdict for the debt and for execution against the person in case of execution against property is returned unsatisfied. Consolidated Statutes, § 673. This was the condition of the record at the time execution was issued against person of defendant after one against his property returned unsatisfied, and the arrest made of which he now complains.

True that later, and before another judge, an order was entered that the execution against the person be recalled, and still later, a year or more, the portion of the judgment directing execution against the person was set aside. This, however, was because of alleged irregularity, and in neither of these subsequent orders, nor in other portions of the record, is there an entry or ruling that challenges, or purports to challenge, the facts established by the verdict, or which militates or weakens its force and effect on the question of probable cause. There are courts of the highest respectability and learning which hold that where a verdict and judgment has been set aside for fraud, collateral to the principal cause of action, and more especially where it is of such a nature as to have deprived the original defendant of his opportunity to disclose his case, such action will prevent the operation of the principle to which we have adverted. See a learned discussion of this subject in Crescent City Live Stock v. Butcher's Union, 120 U. S. 141-149 et seq., 7 Sup. Ct. 472, 30 L. Ed. 614; 18 R. C. L. tit. Malicious Prosecutions, §§ 21, 27.

Others, going further, have held that the position may be made available on allegations of such fraud with adequate proof to support them. But neither of these positions are open to plaintiff on the present record, where, as stated, the former judgment was disturbed on the ground of irregularity only.

On the record and for the reasons stated, we are of opinion that defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been sustained; and it is so ordered.

Reversed.

MONROE et al. v. HOLDER. (No. 116.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 28, 1921.)

Appeal and error  $\S$  104—Order affirming action of clerk in refusing to strike out order to examine defendant not appealable.

An appeal from an order affirming the order of the clerk of court refusing to strike out an order to examine defendant under C. S. § 900 et seq., will be dismissed in the absence of a showing that defendant will be prejudiced by the examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by J. M. Monroe and another against W. M. Holder. From an order affirming the order and judgment of the clerk of the superior court refusing to strike out order for examination before trial, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

The plaintiffs, desiring to elicit certain information, which they allege is not otherwise obtainable and is necessary and material to enable them to file their complaint, submitted the requisite affidavit and moved before the clerk for an order to examine the defendant as provided by C. S. § 900 et seq. This was allowed. Whereupon, the defendant entered a special appearance before the clerk and moved to vacate the order of examination on the ground that it had been improvidently and improperly granted.

Hoyle & Hoyle, of Sanford, for appellant.
Williams & Williams, of Sanford, for appellees.

STACY, J. It appearing that the order of examination, as entered by the clerk and approved by the judge, is based upon an affidavit, apparently sufficient in form and substance, and there being no denial of the facts or contrary showing by the defendant, we must dismiss the appeal as premature. Pender v. Mallett, 122 N. C. 163, 30 S. E. 324; Holt v. Warehouse Co., 116 N. C. 480, 21 S. E. 919; Vann v. Lawrence, 111 N. C. 32, 15 S. E. 1031.

It is true, in Ward v. Martin, 175 N. C. 287, 95 S. E. 621, the court, in its discretion, entertained an appeal from an order of this kind, because of the important questions presented; but, in the instant case, it does not appear that the defendant will be prejudiced or injured by the examination.

Of course, as said in Bailey v. Matthews, 156 N. C. 81, 72 S. E. 92, and repeated in Fields v. Coleman, 160 N. C. 11, 75 S. E. 1005:

"The law will not permit a party to spread a dragnet for his adversary in the suit, in order to gather facts upon which he may be sued, nor will it countenance any attempt, under the guise of a fair examination, to harass or oppress his opponent."

But these are matters which, in the first instance, must be committed to the wisdom and good judgment of those who grant the orders and supervise their execution. Until some right is denied or some wrong is done, the defendant should not be permitted to appeal and thus delay the trial of the cause. Holt v. Warehouse Co., supra.

Appeal dismissed.

PROCTOR et al. v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF NASH COUNTY. (No. 62.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 21, 1921.)

1. Schools and school districts § 97(3) — Bonds that cannot be paid under tax limitations not to be issued.

Bonds for school improvement purposes cannot be issued by county board of commissioners after a favorable election in a school district and on request by county board of education under Pub. Laws 1915, c. 55, when, under the tax limitations (Pub. Laws 1919, c. 84, § 3), they cannot be paid at maturity.

2. Schools and school districts § 97(3)—Statutory provision as to bond issues held to control over constitutional provision for six months' school.

Although authorities may provide for a six months' school as required by Const. art. 9, §

3, if they undertake to do so in the manner prescribed by Pub. Laws 1915, c. 55, they must comply with the terms of the statute, and the constitutional provision will not give them the right to issue bonds when, admittedly under the tax limitations, they cannot be paid at maturity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Connor, Judge.

Action by W. H. Proctor and others against the Board of Commissioners of Nash County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Error.

Civil action to determine the validity of certain proposed bonds. The facts are set out in the judgment of the superior court, which is as follows:

"This is a civil action wherein the plaintiffs are seeking a permanent injunction against the defendants against the issuance and sale of certain school improvement bonds of Oak Level school district, Nash county, N. C. A temporary restraining order was issued against the defendants by Bond, Judge, August 20, 1919, and notice issued to the defendants to appear before Devin, Judge, at Nashville, August 28, 1919, and show cause why said injunction should not be granted. The hearing thereof was continued from time to time without final disposition, and the same now comes on to be heard on this the 1st day of July, 1921, before his honor, Geo. W. Connor, resident judge of the Second judicial district, in chambers at Wilson, N. C., upon motion of the defendants to dissolve the temporary restraining order herein issued. After hearing the complaint and answer and the affidavits in the cause and the argument of counsel, it appears to the court, and the court finds as a fact:

"(1) That on or about April 7, 1919, the county board of education of Nash county filed with the board of county commissioners of Nash county a petition for an election within Oak Level school district in Nash county upon the question of issuing $20,000 of school improvement bonds for the purpose of building a schoolhouse in said district as provided by chapter 55 of the Public Laws of 1915 of North Carolina, and the said board of county commissioners thereupon ordered an election to be held in said school district for said purpose on July 22, 1919.

"(2) That said election was held as in said order and notice of election directed, July 22, 1919, and was declared carried; that the registration books were closed July 10th, whereas they should have remained open until Saturday night, July 12th; that between July 10 and July 12, 1919, J. B. Wallace and W. J. Bunn, qualified voters of said district, were refused registration by the registrar.

"(3) That there is no public high school maintained in said district.

"(4) That there is a community in said school district consisting of two stores and several residences known as Westrays; that by chapter 39 of the Private Laws of the Special Session of 1908, the territory embracing said community, known as Westrays, was incorporated under the name of the town of Westrays; that by said act John C. Lindsay was designated as mayor, M. J. Hedrick, J. B. Land, and J. S. Proctor as commissioners; that the said John C. Lindsay, J. B. Land, and J. S. Proctor have each, long since, moved from the territory embraced within said act, and M. J. Hedrick never lived within said territory and that said town has not for the past 10 years elected any officers or employees, levied any taxes, or performed any other duty or exercised any other privilege usually performed or exercised by towns; that said community has had no board of aldermen, nor other body, has held no election or meeting, or kept any minutes or records of same, and in no way held itself out to the public as a town, and has in no manner functioned or attempted to function as such.

"(5) That the total taxable property in said district for the year 1919 was $476,549, and the total number of polls was 177, and that the total amount of taxes that could be raised by the levy of the maximum amount permitted by said chapter 55, Public Laws of 1915, as limited by chapter 84, § 3, Public Laws of 1919, is $1,718.13, which amount is insufficient to create a sinking fund for the retirement of said bonds at maturity and pay the interest thereon.

"And upon the foregoing findings of fact, the court is of the opinion:

"1. That the irregularities, if any, in calling and holding said election and in the registration of voters, were cured by the provision of chapter 133, Public Laws of 1921, and that there was not a sufficient number of voters refused registration to affect the result of said election.

"2. That the community designated as the town of Westrays, within said territory of Oak Level school district, is an incorporated town within the meaning and purpose of chapter 55 of Public Laws of 1915.

"3. That the amount of taxable property within said district and the maximum amount of tax that can be raised thereon under the statute does not affect the validity of said bonds but only affects their marketability.

"Whereupon, it is ordered and adjudged by the court that the said temporary restraining order herein issued be and the same is hereby dissolved. It is further ordered that the plaintiffs pay the cost of this proceeding, to be taxed by the clerk of the superior court of Nash county. Geo. W. Connor, Resident Judge."

From the foregoing judgment, the plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

M. V. Barnhill, of Rocky Mount, for appellants.

Finch & Vaughan, of Nashville, and Thorne & Thorne, of Rocky Mount, for appellee.

STACY, J. This case presents for consideration the old but ever new question of taxation. It comes in the form of a proposed bond issue, and we are asked to pass upon the validity or legality of the same.

The following are the objective and controlling facts:

(1) By an election held in Oak Level school district, Nash county, N. C., on or about April 7, 1919, a bond issue of $20,000 for school-improvement purposes was approved by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters resident in said district.

(2) Chapter 55, Public Laws 1915, provides that, following a favorable election in such district, the county board of commissioners shall issue said bonds, when requested to do so by the county board of education, and further that said commissioners "shall thereafter levy a sufficient tax (which shall not exceed 30 cents on the $100.90 on the poll) to pay the interest on said bonds and create a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal and interest on said bonds when they fall due."

3. The total maximum amount of taxes that could be raised from the taxable property in the present district, under the above limitations, is insufficient to create a sinking fund for the retirement of said bonds at maturity and pay the interest thereon, as required by the law of 1915. Or, to state it differently: In order to meet the obligations which these bonds will impose, it would be necessary to levy taxes in excess of the statutory limitations.

[1] Upon these, the facts chiefly relevant, the question then arises: Will the law sanction the issuance of these bonds when admittedly, under the tax limitations, they cannot be paid at maturity? We think not.

A similar question was presented in the case of Bennett v. Commissioners, 173 N. C. 625, 92 S. E. 603, where the defendant commissioners of Rockingham county were sought to be enjoined from issuing bonds in excess of the county's ability to pay under the existing tax limitations. The authority to issue said bonds was denied, the court saying:

"In view of the constitutional provision and the decisions of the court construing the same, we are of opinion that the county commissioners of Rockingham county are without power to incur this indebtedness of $200,000, issue the negotiable bonds of the county in evidence of their obligation, and stipulate for a continuing tax to pay the interest and provide a sinking fund which is in excess of the established limitation"—citing Board of Education v. Com'rs, 107 N. C. 110, 12 S. E. 190; French v. Com'rs, 74 N. C. 692; Millsaps v. Terrell, 60 Fed. 193, 8 C. C. A. 554.

[2] We do not understand that article 9, § 3, of our state Constitution, is invoked as bearing upon the questions presented by this appeal; or, at least, it does not so appear on the record. But even if such were the case, it has been held with us that, where the Legislature has prescribed a method of procedure of this kind, and such procedure is sought to be followed, the statutory provisions on the subject are controlling. Hendersonville v. Jordan, 150 N. C. 35, 63 S. E. 167; Comrs. v. Webb & Co., 148 N. C. 120, 61 S. E. 670; Robinson v. Goldsboro, 135 N. C. 382, 47 S. E. 462. Indeed, in certain instances, the legislative method and requirements thereof, whether expressed in permissive or mandatory terms, are declared to be exclusive and binding upon those who are chargeable with the execution of such powers. Ellison v. Williamston, 152 N. C. 147, 67 S. E. 255; Wadsworth v. Concord, 133 N. C. 587, 45 S. E. 948.

The authorities, of course, may provide for a six months' school, as required by the constitutional provision above mentioned; but, if they undertake to do so in the manner prescribed by chapter 55, Public Laws 1915, they must comply with the terms of the statute. And it would seem that the statutory method is exclusive where district bonds are sought to be issued for such purpose. However, this latter question is not before us for decision, as the defendants are proceeding under the statute. Trustees v. Pruden, 179 N. C. 619, 103 S. E. 369.

In Com'rs v. State Treasurer, 174 N. C. 141, 93 S. E. 482, 2 A. L. R. 726, it was said that—

"An obligation of this kind imports a liability to taxation, and in case of a subordinate municipal corporation, it means that payment can be coerced [if the bonds be valid] and that all the taxable values therein may be made available on the claim."

In support of this position, the following was quoted with approval from People v. Township Board of Salem, 20 Mich. 452, 4 Am. Rep. 400:

"The exercise by a municipal corporation of the power to pledge its credit is an incipient step in the exercise of the power of taxation, and unless the object to be promoted be such as may be provided for by taxation, the power to make the pledge does not exist, and the Legislature cannot confer it."

And we may add that, where a bond issue is proposed in excess of the taxing power to care for the payment of said bonds, though for a legitimate purpose, the right to issue the same is not to be found within the pale of the law. The authority to issue bonds, or pledge the faith and loan the credit of a subordinate political subdivision of the state, is limited by its ability, under the law, to provide for the ultimate payment of said obligations. This is the point up to which it may be permitted to go, but beyond which the law does not sanction. To hold otherwise would be to assert a legal proposition which, to say the least, is doubtful in morals.

There has been no sale of the present bonds, and the appeal presents no question with respect to the rights of innocent third parties, or purchasers for value without notice. The legality of the issue is raised upon objection by plaintiffs who are residents and property owners in said district.

The case of Com'rs v. MacDonald, McKoy & Co., 148 N. C. 125, 61 S. E. 643, is not at variance with the principle here declared; for the chief question there debated and decided was whether a county, which had been authorized, with the approval of a popular vote, to issue certain bonds, could levy a tax, in excess of the constitutional limitation, to provide for their payment, with interest, in the absence of express legislative authority. But it does not appear that such a tax was necessary to meet the obligations incurred by said bonds. The fact was not there established as here admitted. This is made clear from the judgment of the superior court as set out in the record of that case, from which the following is taken:

"And (the court) being further of the opinion that the said board of commissioners have authority to levy tax sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds, and to provide a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, at maturity, and that said board can be compelled, by mandamus, to levy such tax, upon its refusal so to do," etc.

The bonds were declared valid; and it does not appear that a levy in excess of the constitutional limitation was necessary to meet payment, the court saying that a tax up to this limit might be compelled by mandamus, if need be. This restricted tax seems to have been sufficient. Hence, the crucial point now presented was not decided in MacDonald's Case, nor was it before the court in Trustees v. Pruden, supra. These cases are thus distinguishable.

We are not impressed with the argument, or contention, that the inability to provide for the payment of said bonds affects only their marketability and not their validity. The authority to issue the proposed bonds is derived from the statute, and its limitations are equally as effective and curbing as its enabling provisions are life-giving. Therefore, where the territory embraced in a given district is too small, under the limitations of the statute, to provide for the payment of the bonds, in the amount proposed, and this fact is affirmatively established prior to a sale of the bonds, we must deny the authority to embark upon such an enterprise. In the instant case, the amount of bonds proposed is too large, considering the taxable values within the territorial limits of the school district. The undertaking, as it appears on the record, is top-heavy and wanting in self-sufficiency, for which reason the law must withhold its approval.

Again, as said in Lang v. Land & Development Co., 169 N. C. 662, 86 S. E. 599:

"It is no answer to this position that, in the particular case before us, no harm is likely to occur or that the power is being exercised in a considerate or benevolent manner, for where a statute is being squared to requirement of constitutional provision [or where the contemplated action of a governing body is being squared to statutory regulations], it is what the law authorizes, and not what is being presently done under it, that furnishes the proper test of its validity."

The statute provides that an election of this kind may be held in any school district "which embraces an incorporated town or city, or in which there is maintained a public high school." It is admitted that the present district contains no high school; and it is very doubtful as to whether "Westrays" is such an incorporated town within the meaning and purpose of chapter 55, Public Laws 1915. But for reasons, otherwise sufficient, we do not now pass upon this point as it is unnecessary to do so.

Upon the facts as found, the temporary restraining order should have been made permanent, and this will be certified to the superior court.

Error.

(117 S. C. 44)

TEMPLETON v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO. (No. 10709.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 14, 1921.)

1. Trial  $\S$  178—Conflicting evidence not considered on motion to direct verdict.

On motion to direct verdict for defendant, only the facts fairly inferable from plaintiff's evidence, without regard to conflict raised by defendant's evidence, is to be considered.

2. Master and servant  $\S$  289(39)—Contributory negligence as proximate cause of injury to brakeman held question for jury.

There being evidence that cars put on a sidetrack were left without the brakes being set by order of the conductor, direction of verdict for defendant railroad in an action for injury to the brakeman from the cars rolling down to the main track, asked on the ground that his negligence was the sole proximate cause of the accident, was properly refused.

3. Trial  $\S$  178—Testimony not treated as unreasonable on motion for directed verdict.

Testimony of several witnesses, that the conductor ordered cars left on a sidetrack without the brakes being set, will not be disregarded as unreasonable on motion to direct verdict.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$  1050(1)—Admission of hearsay in view of its nature held harmless.

Admission, in action for injury to a brakeman in a railroad accident, of testimony of his witness that he heard a railroad man whom he did not know, say that, while he was not at fault, he expected to lose his job, was harmless, it being rather exculpatory, and not inculpatory of any one.

5. Evidence  $\S$  123(11), 317(8)—Testimony of what witness heard, said some time after the accident, hearsay, and not res gestæ.

Testimony of plaintiff's witness in an action for injury to a brakeman, that he heard the engineer 10 or 15 minutes after the accident say that the conductor caused the collision by an order he gave to plaintiff, was hearsay and not part of the res gestæ.

6. Appeal and error  $\S$  1031(3)—Improper admission of evidence of some probative force presumptively prejudicial.

Admission of improper evidence of some probative force on a material issue of fact is presumptively prejudicial.

7. Appeal and error  $\S$  1053(2)—Error in admission of evidence held not cured by direction to strike and disregard.

Error in admitting evidence of statement of engineer some time after the accident to plaintiff brakeman, that the accident was due to the fault of the conductor in calling plaintiff brakeman down from the car, on the establishment of which fact plaintiff's case depended, held not cured by the judge later directing the stenographer to strike out "such declarations as the engineer and conductor made" and then telling the jury, "Don't consider that testimony that I told the stenographers to strike out."

8. Appeal and error  $\S$  206(1)—Not appellant's duty to call trial judge's attention to insufficiency of withdrawal of evidence.

That appellant may complain that the prejudice from admission of improper evidence was not removed, it was not necessary that he should have called the trial judge's attention to the insufficiency of his withdrawal thereof from the jury's consideration.

9. Trial  $\S$  256(13)—Clearer instruction, if desired, should be requested.

If the instruction as to the rule for diminution of damages under the federal Employers' Liability Act (Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) in case of contributory negligence be thought not sufficient, request for further instruction should be made.

10. Negligence  $\S$  101—Recovery under federal Employers' Liability Act not barred by gross contributory negligence.

Under the federal Employers' Liability Act (Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), all recovery is not barred by the fact of the employee's contributory negligence being gross and that of the employer being slight.

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Allendale County; I. W. Bowman, Judge.

Action by Isaac Templeton against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

F. B. Grier, of Greenwood, and Harley & Blatt, of Barnwell, for appellant.

Henry C. Roney and J. J. Jones, both of Augusta, Ga., and J. Henry Johnson, of Allendale, for respondent.

COTHRAN, A. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of $5,000, entered upon a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, on account of personal injuries sustained by him in a collision between the engine upon which he was temporarily riding and a string of box cars, which had been placed upon a side track, and which ran down the side track, "side-wiping" the engine on the main line as it passed the switch. The injury occurred near Appleton, in Allendale county, on December 14, 1917. The trial was before Judge Bowman and a jury at Allendale, February 4, 1920. At the close of all of the evidence the defendant moved for a directed verdict in its favor upon the ground that the plaintiff's self-negligence (sic?) was the "direct and proximate cause of his injury." The plaintiff was, at the time of his injury, a brakeman employed by the defendant, and was then engaged in interstate commerce; facts that require the application of the Employers' Liability Acts of Congress (Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665).

The appeal involves three subjects of consideration: (1) The motion for a directed verdict; (2) the admission of certain testimony; (3) the judge's charge.

[1, 2] 1. The Motion for a Directed Verdict.—The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, with every reasonable inference in his favor that may be drawn therefrom, shows the following facts: The freight train with 30 odd cars left Augusta, Ga., on the morning of December 14, 1917, bound for Yemassee, S. C., with the usual complement of employees, the plaintiff being a brakeman; the train stalled at a hill a few miles from Appleton, a station between Augusta and Allendale; it became necessary to detach the engine and 12 cars, run them down to Appleton, pass the depot, and back them into a side track at a switch a few hundred yards beyond; the plaintiff went with the detached portion of the train; arriving at the switch the plaintiff turned it for the side track and the cars were backed in; the plaintiff mounted the lead car of the cut of cars for the purpose of fixing the brakes to prevent them running back on the main line; he had never worked upon this side track before, and knew nothing of the grade; as a matter of fact, the side track was on a down grade in the direction of the switch; as he had his hands on the brake wheel to put on the brakes, the conductor called to him that the cars would stand all right without setting the brakes—to hurry up and come down, that a passenger train was almost due, and they must get the part of the train left at the hill into the side track out of its way; in the meantime the engine had pulled out on the main line and stopped below the switch, that the switch might be turned to the main line for the return trip to where the other cars had been left; the plaintiff obeyed the direction of the conductor, came down off of the cars without setting the brakes, and, while in the act of boarding the engine as it passed the switch, was caught between the engine and the cars which had escaped, and, rolling down the side track, "side-wiped" the engine at or near the switch.

Many of the facts above detailed are disputed by the defendant, but the above statement is based upon the facts which are fairly inferable from the plaintiff's testimony, without regard being had to such conflict, as we understand the rule to be in such motions.

No question is raised in the ground of the motion as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, which, under the liability acts, could be so urged, nor as to the assumption of the risk by the plaintiff; the only ground for the motion is that the negligence of the plaintiff was the sole proximate cause of the injury.

Such a conclusion would be impossible from these facts if established to the satisfaction of the jury. The most that the defendant could possibly be entitled to would be the submission to the jury of the issue whether or not, upon the establishment of the truth of such facts, its negligence ought to be concluded by the jury; and, if so, the further issue whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence or assumption of risk, in obeying an order so obviously fraught with peril that a person of ordinary prudence would not have undertaken to obey it.

The conductor was the master of the train—the alter ego of the railroad company; it was the duty of the plaintiff to obey his orders; if he knew that the side track was on a down grade, he knew that without brakes the cars would roll down the track onto the main line; if he ordered the plaintiff not to set the brakes, it was an act of negligence; if the plaintiff knew these facts—knew of the defects and appreciated the danger—he assumed the risk, unless he acted upon the orders of the representative of the master on the spot, under circumstances which, as above stated, would not charge him with negligence in obeying a dangerous order.

Unfortunately for the defendant, so far as this motion is concerned, the inference of its negligence is against it, and the inference of the plaintiff's freedom from both contributory negligence and assumption of the risk is in his favor.

[3] We are asked to hold that the explanation given by the plaintiff of his failure to set the brakes is so absurd and unreasonable as not to amount to even a scintilla of evidence; that it is without even a probability that the conductor should have given such an order. The reasonableness or probability of the truth of testimony is not the test of its admissibility. The plaintiff and several witnesses testified that such an order was given by the conductor. It was denied by the conductor; and this is an issue of fact for the jury.

We think, therefore, that the circuit judge was right in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant.

[4] 2. The Admission of Certain Testimony.—The testimony objected to was that of two witnesses, Osie Bing and N. H. Walker, offered by the plaintiff. Walker was allowed to testify that he heard some one—a railroad man whom he did not know—say that, while he was not at fault, he expected to lose his job; that he would not have had the accident happen for $1,000. The circuit judge allowed the testimony, over the defendant's objection, with the reservation that he would strike it out if, upon consideration, he should determine that it was inadmissible. The defendant's objection to the testimony was that it was hearsay, and not a part of the res gestæ. While the testimony was clearly inadmissible, the substance of it was rather exculpatory of himself than otherwise, and not inculpatory of any one. The admission of it was therefore harmless, and need not be further considered.

[5] The testimony of Bing, however, was quite different. He was allowed to testify that he heard the engineer say, 10 or 15 minutes after the accident, that he was going to lose his job, that the conductor caused the collision by calling to the plaintiff to come down from the car. Before the testimony was allowed, the defendant objected, upon the ground that the declaration sought to be put in evidence was not a part of the res gestæ. The circuit judge sustained the position thus taken, but upon the suggestion of counsel for plaintiff, "Inasmuch as we charge this injury to the negligence of the conductor and the engineer, we contend that a statement made by the engineer as to whose fault it was is competent," he ruled: "I am going to let it come in right upon that point." No reservation was made by the circuit judge that he would strike it out if, upon consideration, he should determine that it was inadmissible, as he did with reference to the testimony of Walker.

Two other witnesses were put up by the plaintiff upon the facts of the case, and then the witness Walker was put up. After the conclusion of his testimony, in which the statements referred to above were allowed, the court adjourned for the night. Immediately upon convening the next morning the following occurred:

"The court: Mr. Stenographer, after considering the matter, I want you to strike out such declarations as the engineer and conductor made. I will rule it out. * * * Gentlemen of the jury, don't consider that testimony that I told the stenographer to strike out a while ago. That is out of the case."

The appellant takes two positions in reference to this matter: (1) That, the testimony being plainly inadmissible, the circuit judge should not have allowed it to go to the jury at all, and that the error was not cured by directing the jury the next morning not to consider it; (2) that in his remarks to the stenographer in the presence of the jury, and in directing them to disregard the testimony, he assumed as a fact that declarations had been made by the engineer and conductor.

The testimony was inadmissible and out of the case for three reasons: (1) It was hearsay, and not a part of the res gestæ (Alken v. Telegraph Co., 5 S. C. 869; Piedmont Co. v. Ry. Co., 19 S. C. 353; Petrie v. Ry. Co., 27 S. C. 64, 2 S. E. 837; Garrick v. Ry. Co., 53 S. C. 448, 31 S. E. 334, 69 Am. St. Rep. 874; Salley v. Ry. Co., 62 S. C. 129, 40 S. E. 111); (2) the circuit judge distinctly ruled that it was not a part of the res gestæ, and there is no exception to his ruling; (3) he subsequently ruled it out altogether, and there is no exception to that ruling.

[6] It follows as a legal presumption that the admission of improper testimony of some probative force upon a material issue of fact in the case is prejudicial. The question presented in this appeal is whether or not this presumption has been overcome. Has the error been cured by the effort of the circuit judge to correct it?
